was suggested when it was passed that it was very controversial. I was mindful of his comments. Indeed, I recollect that, although I was very young at the time, my late father expressed as a lawyer some disquiet about the legislation. It is precisely because I think that I can see where his disquiet may have been misplaced that I have certainly attempted to consider the Bill with the idea in mind of whether I could say in 20 years' time that I was mistaken. However, the profound difference between a religious belief and a racial identity inclines me to the view that I am not mistaken at all in taking the attitude that this legislation will, in fact, make no contribution to improving community relations in this country.

The Minister quoted my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition, and I agree with everything that he said. There is a language of hatred and it needs to be fought, but the best way to fight it is by the public expression of views that those who hate others on matters where they should not do so are wrong. The Government's attempt to introduce what is in effect a mechanistic system of what is and what is not appropriate, far from helping the situation, I believe, will make it worse. It is for those reasons that, although I appreciate the good intentions behind the Government's ideas, yet again, the Opposition are compelled to say that we cannot support the Bill on Third Reading. The improvements made to it are slight; the mischief that remains as a result of it is great.

If the Government really want to tackle this issue, they must get away from the promises made to various people of an equal playing field, accept that religion and race are different, start to look at the real nature of the problem and try to come up with some constructive solutions. We can all agree that it is undesirable that people should preach violence or words that lead to violence, but what the Bill will achieve is the prevention of the perfectly lawful expression of differences of view, which is the very foundation on which our democracy has been based.

9.25 pm

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): I have just voted in the Aye Lobby, so I feel that I owe it to my colleagues and the Minister to explain my background for doing so. I shall probably abstain on Third Reading.

The strength of our society lies with its tolerance, understanding and diversity. That has emerged over centuries, and although the overwhelming majority of people enjoy the benefits that it brings, there are those, for their own odious and self-interested motives, who want to take advantage of the system and abuse it. An inevitable defect of decency and tolerance is allowing those who do not share our views or values to speak out and have their say too, however unpleasant and unwelcome that is.

In May, I was returned in Keighley and Ilkley following a bitter, dreadful fight where hope triumphed over hate. Perhaps the most odious of characters, the chairman of the British National party, was soundly defeated into last place. With the defeat of extremism comes, I believe, a great responsibility to understand and address the reasons why it came to my constituency and to ensure that it never returns. One of the main reasons was the undercurrent of the feeling of unfairness and inequality that was able to take root. It is perceived that many minority groups are viewed differently and treated more leniently by the law as a result of their minority status. In essence, protection is offered from the full weight of the law for the fear of being branded a racist. That perception has crippled political, social and economic development in cities such as Bradford. Lord Ouseley, whose report was commissioned prior to the Bradford riots in 2001, spoke out about the fear of debate in Bradford and the need to have open and frank discussions. Some four years later, we are no further forward. The manifestation of the BNP in Bradford and Keighley is a result of that failure.

I am not suggesting for one minute that protection under the law should not be offered to those who are in danger of persecution or violence. However, I am simply not convinced that well-intentioned legislation that emphasises differences and identifies segregation provides that protection. It might, in reality, have the reverse effect.

In a rich society such as ours in which our diversity should be celebrated and encouraged, rather than concentrating on what makes us different, perhaps we should look more at what unites us: our humanity, social conscience, willingness to help others and steadfast faith in democracy, equality and achievement. Surely the celebration of our common values and beliefs must be the way forward, thus shifting away from an attempt to isolate or segregate any specific community or religion. That would be far more successful at encouraging integration, which is what I look forward to and work for.

Protection comes in many forms: the weight of criminal justice—which if applied is more than sufficient—argument, and education. All those offer powerful solutions. If I am described as an infidel because of my beliefs, do we want the accuser to be prosecuted, or do we want to engage with that perverse view and demonstrate how erroneous it is? One of the fundamental principles of any religious belief must be tolerance, so allowing prosecution is a dangerous path to tread.

How was the BNP defeated in Keighley and Ilkley? It was achieved not by prosecution, but by reasonable argument. Its members were exposed as liars and the party was shown to be the politically bankrupt group that it truly is. Opposition to the BNP was based on a broad coalition of trade unions, churches, mosques, voluntary groups and businesses—indeed, all the decent people of Keighley and Ilkley. The sheer weight of argument, concentrating on those issues that unite us, irrespective of colour, religion, age and sex, for example, expose extremism for what it is. Take away the fear from debate, and our common interests—humanity, decency, tolerance and equality—are allowed to shine through. Restrictions, however well intentioned, stifle that debate. How can we ever expect to rid our society of the horrors of honour killings if we are limited by those whose perverse understanding of their religion makes them believe that it is their entitlement and they may threaten prosecution?

Does the Bill take us in the wrong direction? Perhaps we should be looking in the opposite direction and remove the blasphemy laws from the statute book so that we are all of equal status. I cherish the diversity in my constituency and throughout the country. I am yet more determined to defeat extremism from wherever it originates. I want to have a constituency, and a country, that is comfortable with itself and its neighbours. That is my ambition. I am not convinced that legislation that encourages further segregation, however, well intentioned, will provide the protections that it aims to deliver.

Mr. Carmichael: It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer). I commend her on what I thought was a remarkably thoughtful and major contribution. I welcome her to the debate on the Bill.

Consideration of the Bill in Committee was a pleasure, principally because of the good humoured way in which the Minister handled the proceedings. It is often said that the Government are leading us into a nanny state. I suspect that there may be some truth in that, and I suspect also that we have in the Minister a new Labour Mary Poppins. He is the man who provides the spoonful of sugar to make the medicine go down. However, what he has provided us with in the Bill remains a pretty unpalatable medicine. It remains a medicine that is in search of an ill to cure.

As I understood the Minister on Report, he seems to be telling us that the Government are bringing forward this legislation and insisting on it because they have a wish to address a perceived anomaly in the treatment of Jews and Sikhs under existing legislation, and other religious groups. At the same time, he accepted that the nature of that cover was such that other groups were already covered to the same extent by existing legislation. Perhaps it was not intellectually the Minister's finest hour, if I might put it like that.

An interesting feature of the Minister's speech was his offer to provide draft guidance on good practice that would be used to implement the Bill's provisions. I welcome that. Such guidance will be useful. However, I wonder why we are hearing about guidance at this stage. What was the rush in introducing the Bill? Why have we had Second Reading, consideration in Committee followed by consideration on Report in such a short compass when we are in an 18-month Session? If the guidance is to be made available, surely it should have been provided to us at a time when we could have made proper use of it. The guidance might well have answered many of the objections that have been raised. We do not know because the refusal to publish it so far means that, effectively, the Government are asking us to buy a pig in a poke.

I am embarrassed that we are sending forward a Bill that is so bad even after we have spent so much time on it. I accept what the Minister says that whatever faults there have been in the Government's approach to this proposed legislation, lack of time has not been one of them. I suggest, however, that the Bill is ill conceived in its thinking. It will be dangerous in its execution and I am confident that we have not seen the last of it.

We, the elected House, should not be relying on the other place to give the Bill the sort of scrutiny and the sort of amendment that it so clearly requires. Come the vote on Third Reading, Liberal Democrat Members will be voting against it.

Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): I was startled by the suggestion from the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) that there had been a rush to judgment. He may not remember it, but the proposal was first introduced by the Government in November 2001 in response to representations from Muslims throughout the country, who felt that they were being targeted by people stirring up religious hatred against them after the evil events in New York and Washington. I was surprised and taken aback by comments that implied that, because the representations were made by Muslims and the Government responded to them, there was something wrong. We spend all our time in politics responding to representations—sometimes we reject them, at other times we take them on board. However, the proposal was introduced in response to reasonable representations.

The air of today's debate—and I know that there have been serious discussions in Committee—was characterised by some nice academic and philosophical debating points. However, it is not nice, academic or philosophical on the streets of my constituency at the moment, and neither was it in 2001. Women are taking their children to school and collecting them in fear because they wear a hijab or headscarf. I want to protect them against the hatred stirred up against them by hate-filled people who make them go about their ordinary day-to-day life in fear. We owe it to all our constituents to try to protect them against people who incite fear.

One objection to the Bill rests on the fact that it is acceptable to outlaw incitement to racial hatred, because race is innate whereas as religion is not—it is a matter of choice. Several Members, including the Minister, who made a very fine speech in response to an earlier debate, pointed out that most people are born into the religion in which they remain. I shall ignore that point, however, and urge people to pursue the logic of their argument: it is all right to try to protect people against incitement to hatred because of their race, which they cannot change, but it is not all right to try to protect people from incitement to hatred because of their religion, which they can change. To me, that practically amounts to an incitement to incitement. People can put themselves right with the hate-mongers by changing their religion or abandoning their beliefs. That is not a sound proposition to make in a democratic Parliament.

We have heard all this stuff about comedians whose freedom of expression will be curtailed, as they will be deprived of the right to incite people to hatred against others because of their religion. That is a rather extreme joke, and I am notorious for politically incorrect jokes myself. People will not fall foul of the provision unwittingly. Under the Bill, they must intend to stir up hatred or, in all the circumstances, be likely to do so. If comedians cannot manage to avoid that, I suggest that they shut up shop altogether.

Clearly the measure, like the law against racial hatred, has two effects. First, it has a genuine deterrent effect. The law against incitement to racial hatred has deterred a great deal of mouthing off, which was dangerous. That is indicated, in part, by the relatively low number of cases that have been brought. Secondly, it was a declaratory matter. We declared that incitement to racial hatred was wrong. That is an unusual concept in the common law. If we pass the Bill, we will be declaring that incitement to hatred of people because of their religion is wrong. That will be another step forward. Who needs the right, which we apparently want to maintain for them, to incite hatred of people because of their religion? I submit that no one requires that right, and if they feel they currently have it, we ought to deprive them of it.

Finally, this is no rush to judgment. This is a proposition that I was advocating before the Government introduced it in November 2001. On Second Reading I said that I hoped we would pass the law before there was a major terrorist incident, so that for once the law got in in advance of events. Sadly, we had the awful events of Thursday last week. Two of the explosions were in my constituency. We are not rushing to judgment. It is a total coincidence that we are changing the law on the Monday afterwards, but it is the right and proper thing to do.

The circumstances to which the Government proportionately and properly responded in 2001 have arisen again. If we take seriously the protection of all our fellow citizens, it is up to us to offer that protection. For all its possible shortcomings and difficulties, the Bill does that. I hope that the House of Lords leaves it alone—it does not need to come back to this place—and that we get a new law and implement it.

9.42 pm

Mr. Hogg: I shall be brief. I listened with great interest to the last debate. The flaw in the discussions in the House is not the distinction between racial hatred and religious hatred. I do not think that there is a distinction worth making there. The error lies in the concept of what should be made illegal.

I am the first to acknowledge that stirring up hatred is a thoroughly bad thing to do. It is quite wrong and immoral, but that does not mean that it should be illegal. When one is determining what is or is not to be made illegal, one must consider the consequences. The question that I ask myself is not whether what someone is doing is immoral or offensive, but whether it is disruptive to the state. I come to the conclusion that it becomes disruptive to the state only if the consequence of the emotion that has been whipped up is to cause serious peril to the state. That is why, in the course of a series of interventions on my hon. Friends and others, I have tried to associate the concept of hatred with conduct likely to cause violence or other criminal activity. I should like the House to stand back and to consider the definition of hatred, and to say that only that which is likely to cause illegal acts and violence to those who are being criticised should be rendered illegal. The fact that one may cause other people to be held in a state of hatred, moral contempt or whatever should not make the act illegal, albeit that I am the first to concede that it is immoral to do it.

I hope that those in the other place will consider the definition of hatred, whether in the context of religious or racial hatred, so as only to outlaw—by which I mean to render criminally unlawful—those things that are likely to result in acts of violence or criminal activities.

9.45 pm

Dr. Tony Wright: My right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) spoke powerfully about the need to do something. That is always a powerful call, and no one who has taken part in the debate has dissented from the proposition that there is an issue that needs to be tackled.

Our task when we turn to legislation is to decide whether the issue is being tackled in the most appropriate way. It probably would have been much better for the Government to introduce a separate piece of religious hatred legislation, not to piggy-back it on the top of existing racial hatred legislation. That is the source of much of the difficulty that we have experienced. That is why we have worried about the absence of a definition of religion or of hatred and about the fusion of issues of belief and believers.

It is not good enough simply to say that we should do something because certain people are under serious attack or pressure, because there is a line that it would be very dangerous to cross—the line that says, "You cannot properly and legitimately attack religious belief systems." It is fundamental to our kind of society that we are able to attack religious belief systems as we can attack political belief systems, cultural belief systems, and all other types of belief systems. Perhaps the Government said, as part of their conversation with the communities that came to them, "We want to do everything that we can to protect you, but you in turn must understand that it is part of this society that people are able legitimately to attack religious belief systems." Those things that are hateful should be hated; we should not be too squeamish about that.

I would caution those who have suggested that the events of the past few days contribute decisively to the arguments about the Bill. One could make the argument on both sides. One could argue that it is even more necessary to preserve the right to attack religious bigotry in all its forms, given that people use religion as a cloak for all kinds of extremism. It would be just as possible to argue that because whole communities may be victimised because of what has happened, we need to give them extra protection. Both arguments could be made, but it is not sensible at this moment to deploy either of them. We should try to keep our heads and get the balance right.

New clause 4, which I tabled, was, for some reason, not called. Perhaps I missed the moment. It meant that I was deprived of the opportunity of telling my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary that I intended to withdraw it. However, I was going to withdraw it on the basis that I am a gullible chap, he is a gentle and persuasive Minister and I therefore keep believing everything that he tells me.

My hon. Friend told me on Second Reading that he would table an amendment that would deal with our concerns and provide the appropriate balance. I was therefore disappointed when I discovered today that he had not done that. He has now told me that he will re-examine the matter and that my amendment was too weak. By implication, he wants a stronger amendment. He must therefore be prepared to consider the next stage and return with an amendment that covers our concerns and finds the correct balance. In that spirit, had I been given the opportunity, I would have withdrawn the amendment.

9.50 pm

Sir Patrick Cormack: I am sure that the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) feels, as I do, that, perhaps not for the first time, our hope lies in the Lords.

No one could impugn the good faith and intentions of either the Under-Secretary, who is an amiable and genuine chap, or the Government. However, not only the road to hell but that to legislative chaos is paved with good intentions. If there were time and it were in order, I could cite the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 and many other knee-jerk reaction Bills, which you and I, Mr. Speaker, have seen pass through the House and that subsequently either passed into oblivion or caused danger.

The right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) made a powerful speech. I am sure that he did not mean to imply that, if the Bill had been enacted four years ago, the events of last Thursday would not have happened, but it is important that people read his speech and my comments on it in that context because a careless listening or reading could give the wrong impression.

I was moved by the testimony of the hon. Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer). I am delighted—I am sure we all are—that she so thoroughly beat off the nasty challenge of the BNP. Her words deserve wide circulation and careful study because if we stand for anything in this place, it is freedom of thought and expression, unfettered freedom of speech and, of course, proper constraints and sanctions against those who do what my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) described: encourage people to violence and evil. They must be dealt with. No hon. Member would disagree with that.

However, the Bill is not the way to achieve that. I was unable to take part in the Second Reading debate because I was still fighting the general election. However, I received petitions, containing many hundreds of signatures, and many dozens of letters from churches and chapels in my constituency. They were from ordinary, decent people, who have as high a regard for their Muslim friends and neighbours as the hon. Member for Keighley and I do. I remind hon. Members, 10 years to the day after Srebrenica, that I was one of the few who spoke out against those appalling atrocities in Bosnia. However, my constituents do not believe that the Bill is the way to help their Muslim friends and neighbours.

My constituents are also concerned about the inhibitions that the Bill might place on them in proclaiming their beliefs and faith fearlessly and openly. We want a society where people can proclaim and defend their beliefs and, yes, attack those of others if they feel that they are wrong. We want a truly tolerant and free society. I am sure that the Government and the Under-Secretary want that. However, the Bill, which the Under-Secretary clearly took through the Committee with great good humour, is not the way to achieve that. I shall vote against the Bill without any qualms or inhibitions. I hope very much that, when it comes back from the other place, it will have been significantly improved, and that the points raised in new clause 4 and the other amendments that have been rejected, withdrawn or not moved tonight will have been inserted into it so that it becomes workable and manageable. In its present state, it manifestly is not.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) said on the last day in Committee something that rang a bell for me. He said that the Bill walked on eggshells. He was almost right. It certainly walks a tightrope between trying to maintain freedom of speech and trying to ensure that everyone in this land has an equal opportunity to express and enjoy their religion without suffering the fear that my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) described. That is why Labour Members' advocacy of the Bill has sometimes been cautious, rather than aggressive or over-assertive. Those who have argued against elements of the Bill, although they have expressed serious and important concerns, have also perhaps overstated them.

I support the Bill for the simple reason that, at present, a legal anomaly leaves a growing part of this country unprotected and uncertain of its relationship to society at a time when there is growing disaffection among many young Muslim people. I also support the Bill because of the potential for growing hostility towards people in this land who seem to be different by virtue of their race or their religion. It is important for the state to take action in these circumstances, even if that action is merely declaratory, as my right hon. Friend said earlier.

We shall need to do certain things in the near future to ensure that this legislation works effectively. For example, there should be greater protection under the law for places of worship, especially for Jewish and Muslim cemeteries. We should not rely on ancient legislation such as the Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Act 1860 in that regard. We should enact proper legislation to ensure that such protection exists for all religions. I also happen to agree with the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) that we should abolish the blasphemy law, and if I thought for an instant that this legislation would result in an advancement of that law, I should not be able to vote for it. There are other hate crimes in this land, some of which are perpetrated by people who hold very strong religious views, and I hope that the Equality Bill will give us an opportunity to deal with those crimes as well.

9.57 pm

Mr. Streeter: We all agree on one thing here tonight, and that is that the Minister is a well-intentioned person. However, in the end we are judged not on the width of the Minister's smile but on the quality of our legislation, and this is a bad Bill. If we pass it into law, we shall be doing the nation a disservice. The Bill is unnecessary and, although the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) made a powerful speech, he did not put forward the other side of the story.

The Bill is cloaked in uncertainty: it does not define religion or hatred. If we pass it into law, people out there will still not know what they are free to say and what they are not. The Bill is also likely to have unintended consequences. We all want tolerance, harmony and respect between the religious communities in this country, but the Bill is likely to provoke the opposite. The Government have said that they will listen to reasonable objections, but they have done so with closed ears. If the Bill becomes law, we shall stumble into darkness and uncertainty, and I urge the House to reject it.

Lynne Featherstone: It is a great irony that the Bill will penalise those whom it seeks to protect. I have never been worried about jokes or comedians in this regard, but I am worried now. Religion is not some cosy thing that people do. It often preaches hatred and incites people to share such views, even though we might wish that it were otherwise. One of the reasons that there were 2,000 or 3,000 religious leaders outside here today was that they were concerned that they would no longer be able to practise their religion freely in this country. It is a great irony that, in seeking to achieve that freedom, the Government might prohibit it. I am also concerned that in the current climate of terrible attacks on Muslims, such a Bill is the wrong answer. The answer is education. Declaration is not enough.

Because I must finish, I will simply say that legislation will not stop hatred, and legislation will not stop incitement to hatred. It will simply and sadly contribute to it.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—

Hepatitis C

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.— [Mr. Dhanda]

10.17 pm

Mr. Bob Laxton (Derby, North) (Lab): In the last Parliament, I was an officer of the all-party parliamentary group on hepatology, which produced a report on hepatitis C in March of this year. My hon. Friend the Minister will have had a copy. Yes, it was hard hitting; it was hard hitting because it deserved to be.

The action taken so far by the Government is failing and will continue to fail those who carry the disease, fail the standards of care that we have come to expect of the welfare state after the second world war and fail to head off a largely preventable disease load described authoritatively by a former US Surgeon-General as a "timebomb" until they recognise that this is a serious threat to public health that has to be prioritised.

Colleagues will not be surprised to learn that I do not often read The Sun, but last week its health writer Jane Symons did an interesting piece that reflected the fact that anyone can catch hepatitis C, including Pamela Anderson from "Baywatch", who caught it sharing her husband's tattoo needle. There are a number of ways hepatitis C is transmitted—from sharing needles to blood transfusions that took place before 1991 and sharing razors or toothbrushes with someone who has the virus.

There are estimated to be between 200,000 and 500,000 people who are HCV positive in the UK, but nobody knows exactly how many, although the so-called "Action Plan on Hepatitis C" published in 2004 promised, in the future tense, to develop modelling techniques to assess future numbers of patients requiring treatment. Perhaps my hon. Friend could let me know how far we have come since then on defining numerical parameters of the disease. We know that the great majority of those carrying the infection—80 to 90 per cent. of the total—do not know that they are incubating the disease and are storing up future problems for themselves and for society.

The Government's overall approach could be described—charitably, in my view—as "watch and wait". Actually, it is more like wait, because with 90 per cent. of infections undiagnosed, watch is hardly applicable. Besides, there are no plans for any of the proactive screening programmes that are recommended in the report. With the best will in the world, how can we expect to identify the HCV-positive population otherwise? Perhaps the Government have targets to identify that population. If so, let us hear them today to assess how ambitious and realistic they are and to measure future progress against them.

Watch and wait also fails on two other counts. First, there is increasing evidence from the American Association for the Study of Liver Diseases and from the European Association for the Study of the Liver that the earlier and younger that patients are treated—even if they have perfectly normal liver enzyme levels—the more likely we are to achieve a sustained virological response indicative of a cure. Effective treatments involving ribavirin and pegylated interferon are available and can cure some 60 per cent. of the patients who take them.

Secondly, while watch and wait saves expenditure on cures in the short term, it costs so much more in the long term. Eventually, without treatment, 20 to 50 per cent. of HCV-positive people will develop very unpleasant liver disease—blighting and shortening their lives and placing an extremely heavy burden on the NHS as the number of people with this infectious and transmissible condition grows. I hope that the Treasury has no hand in this short-termism.

No doubt the Minister has been studying our report, which makes 13 recommendations. They would bear repetition in a longer debate, but it would be helpful to know now whether the Government are minded to accept any of those recommendations. My hon. Friend may find it more convenient to write to me at length with her evaluation of the points made. There are, however, two areas that I would particularly like to stress.

First, I was disappointed by the skimpy, one-page chapter in the hepatitis C action plan, which boldly set the question, "International Outlook: How do we Compare?" It proceeded not to answer that question. Basically, this underwhelming chapter tells us something of the incidence of the disease in other countries but nothing—absolutely nothing—about the lessons that we can learn from their successes and failures.

For instance, in France, where the challenge and burden of disease is even greater, 50 per cent. of the HCV-positive population has been identified and a target of 85 per cent. identification set. Where are the targets for England? Closer to home, it is quite clear that the Scots have addressed this issue with more seriousness and speed than we have in England. Some 36 per cent. of the HCV-positive population have been identified—approximately double the 19 per cent. claimed as diagnosed in England in the action plan. I should say that that depends on the Government's low estimate of 200,000 HCV-positive people being correct. All the specialist hepatologists that we spoke to felt that the number was closer to the top of the range—500,000. In that case, the proportion diagnosed in England falls to something like 8 per cent.

It is also clear that Scottish data collection and thinking on screening is in advance of the position in England. Health Protection Scotland is producing an annual report on its Hepatitis C action plan. Where is the English equivalent? Is it not time that we in England set the old exam question of compare and contrast so that officials absorb and apply the lessons from elsewhere?

I hope that my hon. Friend will join me in congratulating the Hepatitis C Trust, which has listened to the recommendation of the report and commissioned a comparison study between what is happening here and what has been done in France, Germany, Italy and Spain. Surely, in such an important area of public health, the Government should be working in partnership with the voluntary sector and taking advantage of its expert knowledge and networks to provide a clear picture of how other countries are dealing with the condition. The compact between the Government and the voluntary sector commits the Department of Health to forge long-term strategic partnerships with the sector and involve it in the planning and delivery of treatment and services. However, in this case it appears that the Department is happy to leave the Hepatitis C Trust to it.

Secondly, I am convinced that we are not adequately addressing the challenge of the disease in UK prisons. Prisons are certainly reservoirs, if not hotbeds, of the disease. I have written to the Minister already about that to give her some advance warning of the matter. A study of a Scottish prison in the American Journal of Epidemiology showed a rising incidence of hepatitis C in inmate cohorts the longer they remain in jail. The most likely explanation for that is injecting in prison. The Scottish study found an initial incidence of 16 per cent. infection among inmates in 1999–2000. That is considerably higher than the percentage quoted to me from some now rather aged statistics of 1997–98, which was 9 per cent. among adult men in English prisons. We appear to have a significant proportion of male prisoners in the UK who are HCV positive, with prisoners more likely to emerge HCV positive than when they went in, with the most likely cause of the rising incidence being injected drug use.

The Minister will no doubt say that responsibility is delegated and that patient care trusts bear responsibility for the treatment of prisoners. The reality is that the prison population is transient and inmates can be moved from one end of the country to the other with little or no warning. Unfortunately, the response time for securing treatment is seldom as swift, resulting in halved treatment regimes for some and an absence of treatment for others. It is shocking that prisoners, who are in society's care, should appear to be more likely to emerge from prison with hepatitis C than when they went in and that effective and available methods of preventing that are not being deployed. Action is needed to ensure that the punishment for prisoners with hepatitis C is not an irreparably damaged liver.

Prisoners are not routinely screened for hepatitis C. They should be, because they are a clearly identifiable high-risk population that would be easy to target. We are missing a significant opportunity to address a problem, which will only grow to be far more damaging, by effectively ignoring it. As a former senior medical officer, Dr. S. Hopkins wrote in The Daily Telegraph on 24 August 2004:

"The crisis is no longer in waiting. It is here now, fermented in prisons and released in a continuous stream into the general population."

It is a crisis that should be addressed rather than ignored.

I believe that the Government should be doing more, particularly on public education. Hepatitis C is preventable, but unlike HIV/AIDS it is not a virus that many people know much about. Because of the common absence of symptoms, many people tend to be unaware that they have a hepatitis C infection until some time afterwards. For instance, 30 per cent. of people diagnosed with hepatitis C do not display any symptoms and are often unsure of where they caught the virus. A public education programme or campaign should focus on how hepatitis C is caught and, for anyone who already has the virus, how to avoid transmitting it. General practitioners should also be given more support in the treatment of viral hepatitis, perhaps as an enhanced service. A small pilot with specially trained GPs supported by a helpline and a clear set of referral guidelines would be useful.

[Mr. Bob Laxton]

Prevention is better than cure, and that certainly applies to hepatitis C. Allowing the problem to fester only stores up bigger shocks for the future. Different people react differently to hepatitis C. The lucky ones will suffer from chronic fatigue and not have the ability to live their day to day lives as fully as they would like. The unlucky will die of liver disease.

I previously presented a debate on childhood anaemia, a condition that has long-lasting problems in adulthood if left untreated. Hepatitis C is the same. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider the points that I have made and very much look forward to her response.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Laxton) on securing the debate, and I agree with absolutely everything that he said. He and I are fellow officers of the all-party group on hepatology, which was formed in July 2003. We are very grateful for the advice we have been given by the Hepatitis C Trust, which has such diverse patrons as Robbie Williams, Miss Emilia Fox, the Marchioness of Bute and the former Eurovision song contest winner, Miss Sandy Shaw.

As far as the all-party group is concerned, this is a very big problem. It is clear that the Government have accepted that it is a problem. It is certainly encouraging that the Government launched a public awareness campaign in December, but I and other Members are unclear about whether the Government also see it as a big problem. Certainly, the Government are not running a big awareness campaign. There are no billboards and no messages on television or radio. Nor has there been any serious attempt to reach ethnic minorities, although the high prevalence of the disease in countries of origin suggests that those communities may contain many undiagnosed sufferers. Can the Minister tell us what the Government's plans are, apart from translating English information leaflets into other languages?

At the launch in December, the chief medical officer promised that the awareness campaign would be effective, and it is vital—literally, because the lives of those hundreds of thousands of young, undiagnosed people are at risk—that it be effective. Can the Minister assure the all-party group that a full evaluation will be made and that the results will be published?

The campaign is for two years, but I believe that the issue is too important to wait until then to assess its effectiveness. When will the market research exercise by the Minister's Department commence and will it be repeated? What can the Minister tell the House about the first results of the national outcomes indicators, such as the total number of laboratory confirmed hepatitis C infection reports for 2005? I believe that she answered a question put by my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) a few months ago on that point.

If the campaign is ineffective, hundreds of thousands of people will remain undiagnosed and may become seriously ill. Many of them will need liver transplants. How will the Government cope, given that the liver transplant service is already stretched? I have one constituent who, according to the consultants attending him, is No. 1 on the list for a liver transplant, but he has been in that position since just before Christmas. The shortage of livers for people who need transplants is very serious. If the Minister does not have time to reply to those points tonight, I hope that she will write to the all-party group and tell us what the Government plan to do in the next few months.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Laxton) on his success in obtaining this debate. I commend him for his work as the vice-chair of the all-party parliamentary hepatology group, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on his work as chair of the group.

Despite what my hon. Friend has said this evening, I hope that I will be able to assure him that the Government recognise the importance of hepatitis C as a public health issue, both globally and nationally. The Hepatitis C Trust and others in the voluntary sector will continue to lobby Government, because that is their function, but I can assure my hon. Friend that we have good working relationships with the trust and other voluntary sector organisations and, indeed, we provide grant funding for some of their activities. Officials also have regular contact with the trust and have sought to involve it in the awareness campaign. The trust will no doubt continue to press for more, as that is part of their remit.

We are fortunate to have, but are not for one minute complacent about, a relatively low prevalence of hepatitis C compared with other developed countries and many other parts of the world. Even so, hepatitis C represents a major challenge in terms of preventing new infections, reducing the level of undiagnosed infections and ensuring that patients with the disease get the care that they need.

My hon. Friend mentioned the chief medical officer's work to try to highlight the issue in the health community through his infectious disease strategy, "Getting Ahead of the Curve". Demonstrating that the condition was an infectious disease problem required intensified action. Subsequently, in 2002, we published the hepatitis C strategy for England for consultation, with proposals to improve prevention, diagnosis and treatment. Last year, we followed that up with a hepatitis C action plan for England.

I have listened carefully to what my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Southend, West said this evening. I shall not be able to answer every point, but I am open to meeting representatives of the all-party group to go through its report and recommendations and to discuss the issues further. I hope that we can offer some reassurance that we have begun work in several fields. The four key areas are surveillance and research, increasing awareness and detecting undiagnosed infections, high-quality services for people with hepatitis C and prevention.

Raising awareness is an essential part of the campaign, and in July 2004, after we launched the action plan, we sent all general practitioners and practice nurses in England a comprehensive hepatitis C information pack for health care professionals. We also sent it to a range of other relevant health professionals because, unfortunately, the knowledge base among those at the front line of our services was quite low.

We also established a new hepatitis C awareness website for health care professionals and the public: www.hepc.nhs.uk. These are still early days, but I am pleased that use of the website is growing; currently, there are about 4,500 visits per month, with a 56 per cent. increase in June 2005 compared with the previous month. That is to be welcomed.

We have supplemented those resources with features in a range of health care journals for professionals and through exhibition stands at conferences. The public awareness campaign for hepatitis C began last December with the introduction of the new NHS hepatitis C telephone information line, which provides confidential information and advice through personal communication and will complement the website and the more general service offered by NHS Direct.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): As my hon. Friend is aware, there are two prisons in my constituency. Is there information for inmates and for staff to warn them about the consequences of hepatitis C and how contagious it can be?

Caroline Flint: I am sure that there is, but I will check. In my former position at the Home Office, I had responsibility for the national drugs strategy and it is important that such links be recognised. Injecting drug users are a vulnerable group, which is why the strategy refers to drug agency teams and multi-agency working. I hope that will include prisons to ensure that effective work is done. As primary care trusts will have a greater role in prison health, they will be looking into those points. As Members will be aware, new legislation introduces drug testing on charge and arrest and mandatory drug assessments, so we shall be addressing hepatitis C and other issues with such people even before they get to court. Home Office officials have assured us that that is part of the package of support given to people whose use of drugs leads to their offending behaviour. I have three prisons in my constituency, and I am aware that the issue is important; the risks are high for people in prison, especially from the shared use of needles.

We are closely monitoring usage of the telephone helpline. In March, for example, there were 242 calls. About six in 10 callers were women and only four in 10 were male, which is interesting given the prevalence of hepatitis C. About eight in 10 callers were calling for themselves, a family member or friend. More than four in 10 calls were for information and advice about the different ways in which hepatitis C can be spread and nearly three in 10 calls were about hepatitis C testing. More than half the callers were aged between 26 and 55. More than one fifth of calls resulted in a referral to another agency—a general practitioner or a specialist voluntary organisation—so that people could take up the support they needed. So I hope that that gives an indication of some of the work that we are doing through the awareness campaign to provide practical access to advice for those people who seek it.

Another aspect and a novel activity in the public awareness campaign is the open-air exhibition of photographs of people with hepatitis C taken by a professional photographer who herself has been successfully treated for hepatitis C. The first exhibition took place in Leicester square in March and has recently begun to tour regional cities, starting in Nottingham last week. The exhibition provides a helpful focus to say that these are people like us and to find another way to reach a wider community in city centres. That approach involves the strategic health authority, primary care trust and others, so where the exhibition takes place, the local health services are geared up to respond to the demand for services or information.

Local and regional media are also involved, and the combination of those three factors has given a tangible sense of focus to the photographic exhibition campaign. We are keeping an eye on the nature and scale of that campaign and how it has worked, as well as anything else that we may be doing. We are not waiting to the end of the programme to decide what works and what does not; we are trying to make assessments as we go along to see what is working. Obviously, we have to look at what is not working as well.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North mentioned improving surveillance of hepatitis C, and I agree that it is important to improve the evidence base as a way to measure progress. We have funded the Health Protection Agency, which is responsible for the national surveillance of hepatitis C, to carry out several projects so that we can get better estimates, identify any trends and model the possible future disease burden to help in the planning of services. For example, the HPA is running a project to improve the data collected when people are tested for hepatitis C, including clinical and risk factor information.

Of local interest to my hon. Friend will be the Trent cohort study of patients infected with hepatitis C, which is co-ordinated by Nottingham university. That study, which the Department is also funding, is investigating the natural history of hepatitis, trends of referral in the region and the effect of antiviral drug therapy on the long-term outcome of hepatitis C-related liver disease. Derby city hospital is participating in that study.

My hon. Friend asked whether, as is proposed by the Scottish Executive, there should be a national database in England to collect information. We will consider the benefits and feasibility of establishing such a database in England when the output of the Scottish system becomes available next year. However, we must judge that against the Trent work to find out what added benefits we would achieve by extending the database even further.

Injecting drug users are an important target group, as they are at greatest risk of hepatitis C. We provided the National Treatment Agency for Substance Misuse with £1 million for local projects to increase the hepatitis C testing of injected drug users and related activities. About 45 local projects were funded, including one by the Derbyshire drug and alcohol action team to develop a new hepatitis C service for drug users in north Derbyshire. Those projects should help forge local partnerships and, we hope, drive up good practice and prevention. We are also funding the NTA to carry out a national audit of needle exchange schemes—one of the actions in the hepatitis C action plan for England. The drug interventions programme, as I said, gives us another opportunity to capture a group of people for whom hepatitis C is a real possibility and certainly to screen and test them and get them appropriate treatment for the future.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for giving me an opportunity to participate in the debate and to the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Laxton) for initiating it. I have a constituent by the name of Barry Fitzgerald who must go to Paris and then Milan to get a fibre scan test carried out. I wrote to the Minister to establish how many of those fibre scanning machines we have in the UK. They provide, as she may be aware, a less intrusive way to establish the extent to which hepatitis C has infected the body. The machines cost an individual about £40 to use. I understand that there are no such machines in the UK, so I wonder whether the Minister can clarity whether there is any intention to introduce one in this country.

Caroline Flint: I am afraid that I will have to write to the hon. Gentleman on that issue. I cannot recall whether I have dealt with that letter. I understand that issues about treatment are important and PCTs must look at them in considering how they commission treatment, but I would prefer to write to him in detail about that, rather than respond this evening.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North asked about developing modelling techniques to help to project the numbers of patients. The Trent study will help us to do that and the Department of Health has also funded the Health Protection Agency to allow it to work with the Medical Research Council's biostatistics unit to provide estimates of the future burden of hepatitis C-related liver disease. The results from that ongoing study will be submitted to a peer review journal for publication later this year. Again, such information helps not only Ministers, but hon. Members, because they can raise issues with their PCTs and others about the cost-benefits of work in the area and the way in which larger future costs to the health service can be prevented in the future. The outcome will thus be interesting.

The hon. Member for Southend, West raised a point about targeted awareness. We have plans to implement that, especially for minority ethnic communities. That will start later this year and will form an important part of what we should do. There should not necessarily be a one-size-fits-all approach to campaigning. We must determine how to reach different groups and also decide what each group's concerns might be, because they may vary from one group to another.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North asked about proactive screening. We have published information and guidance for health professionals and the public that highlights those who are thought to be at risk of hepatitis C infection and should thus consider being tested, or be offered testing. That forms part of the awareness campaign. There is a continuing programme to raise awareness of hepatitis C among the public and those at risk. We hope that the awareness website, the telephone service and the regional road shows and photographic exhibitions will all contribute to that.

The prospects for people diagnosed with hepatitis C have improved markedly over the past decade. Antiviral drug therapy has been recommended by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence and has good success rates. NICE is currently considering the case for treating patients with mild hepatitis C in the light of research funded by the Department. Further guidance on that is expected next year, which is why it is important to diagnose people with hepatitis C.

We recognise the importance of hepatitis C as a public health issue. Alongside unprecedented increases in NHS funding, we have provided central support for specific aspects of the implementation of the hepatitis C action plan for England. We have asked strategic health authorities to ensure that local arrangements are in place to provide appropriate services, which will involve collaboration with their primary care trust, clinicians and agencies such as the National Treatment Agency for Substance Misuse, the Health Protection Agency and voluntary sector organisations—

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Equipment Loans

1. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): What estimate she has made of the cost to the NHS of the failure to return equipment loaned to patients in the last year for which figures are available. [11240]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): As I am sure all hon. Members would want me to do, speaking as Minister with responsibility for the health service in London, may I first pay my own tribute and express my deepest gratitude, which I know we all share, to the health and emergency services for their response last week?

Now to perhaps more prosaic, but none the less important matters—the Department has not estimated those costs. It is for the local national health service and social care bodies to determine how best to provide equipment to meet the needs of individuals. Some equipment can be reused, subject to its condition and to any need to decontaminate it.

Andrew Selous: I am sure that the Minister will agree that public money is precious money, and I hope therefore that she will follow up the concerns of one of my constituents, a retired civil servant, who has brought to my attention the fact that many patients are loaned equipment on a short-term basis, such as chair and bed raisers, stools, helping hands and so on; that there is no follow-up for the return of that equipment—that is purely left to the conscience of the patient; and that the providers of that equipment are making money out of the NHS by the continual loan of such equipment. Will the Minister undertake to look into that to ensure that there is no waste of precious NHS resources across the country?

Jane Kennedy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this issue. He may be aware that in 2000 an initiative called integrating community equipment services was undertaken, through which we have placed greater emphasis on refurbishing and recycling equipment and, as he suggests, tracking the equipment that is loaned. He suggests that that is not working in his location. I would be grateful if he wrote to me specifically about that matter so that I can look into it in the detail that he is obviously requesting.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I endorse the remarks of the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous). There is certainly a problem in the east midlands, not unrelated to the fact that there appear to be no computer systems to track items that are not hugely costly individually, but are very valuable to people on the waiting lists for them. Will the Minister please investigate whether there is some way in which either a regional system or some other means could be developed to track, in particular, wheelchairs and equipment of that kind, which can lie gathering dust while other people could use them?

Jane Kennedy: I understand that the majority of services now pay particular attention to encouraging the return of such equipment and that those services have improved their decontamination, repair and maintenance systems. My hon. Friend will be pleased to hear that improved tracking systems are both enabling services to trace equipment and facilitating its return. However, given the concerns that have been raised today, I will undertake to look into this matter in some depth.

Ethical Recruitment

2. Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): What measures are in place to ensure that the NHS abides by its code of practice on ethical recruitment. [11241]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Compliance with the code of practice is monitored by NHS Employers, an organisation that works closely with strategic health authorities and trusts to ensure that the NHS abides by the code.

Mr. Lilley: Can the Minister confirm that, none the less, this country imported some 15,000 nurses, largely from developing countries, in the last year for which we have figures, while exporting 8,000 nurses that we trained, largely to developed countries? Are we not at risk of being accused of hypocrisy if we spend a lot of time saying that we should give more aid to Africa, which should help its health service and train its nurses to cure the sicknesses and diseases that we deplore, when it is actually subsidising our health service by sending nurses to this country who, despite the measures that the Minister referred to, end up employed in the NHS?

Ms Winterton: We are the only developed country that has an ethical international recruitment policy. There are about 150 countries from which we do not actively recruit, including all the sub-Saharan African countries. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that it is difficult for us to stop people applying for jobs in this country and to prevent them from coming here. All sorts of human rights issues would be raised if we were to do that. However, we are clear that the NHS does not actively recruit in developing countries that say they have problems, and we have recently extended that to cover the independent health care sector as well.

Paul Clark (Gillingham) (Lab): I welcome the Minister's response as there is a need for a strong recruitment code in the NHS in respect of developing countries. Does she agree that there is a need for the NHS to share its expertise with such countries and those that are developing their own services? To that end, will she welcome the work of the Kent and Medway strategic health authority, which is currently hosting 10 Iraqi psychiatrists with the aim of enhancing their skills and knowledge, so that they can return to Iraq to develop their own home-grown mental health services?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right on two points. First, many people who come to this country to work in the NHS return to their own countries, taking with them new skills and expertise. Indeed, many Governments encourage workers from their countries to do that. Secondly, the NHS has many contacts with international organisations and other countries to help to train people and improve their expertise. I have met the 10 Iraqi psychiatrists to whom my hon. Friend referred, so I congratulate his trust on facilitating that programme by working with the Department of Health. The programme was greatly dependent on the commitment of Dr. Sadik, who initiated it. It will make a real difference to the development of services in Iraq and I know how much the psychiatrists appreciate the work that is being done.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I hope that the Minister will accept that I recognise the difficulties that she faces in controlling the flow, given what she said. Has she considered the British Medical Association's argument that there could be some form of restitution to countries? We know how many nurses are coming in from these countries, albeit not through active recruitment by the NHS, so could we not propose a scheme through which NHS workers could be funded on NHS salaries to volunteer—I think that they would be willing to do so—to go out in equal numbers to compensate those countries and provide their skills?

Ms Winterton: An active programme of work is under way to do just that. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right that it is important for us to help developing countries to develop their health care systems in exactly that way. Much of the work is carried out through the Department for International Development, which recently put about £580 million into assisting the development of health care systems. DFID has worked jointly with the Department of Health and volunteers from the NHS. Some 40 per cent. of NHS trusts now have international links to allow volunteers to go to other countries and join in with Government-funded programmes, which are proving to be extremely successful.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): Although we recognise that this is a difficult area and that some progress has been made, there is no shortage of evidence to suggest that much more still needs to be done. For example, more than 10,000 work permits were granted last year to health workers from more than 80 countries on the Department of Health's proscribed list. No wonder the BMA has called on the Government to end the rape of the world's poorest countries. Given that the NHS is only commended to use recruitment agencies that comply with its code of practice, will the Government take a further step forward and give their policy real teeth by banning the NHS from using recruitment agencies that have not signed up to the code of practice?

Ms Winterton: We do—absolutely. Let me explain. Virtually everyone in the independent provider sector recently signed up to the code of practice. It is clear that if NHS employers find out that a trust has employed someone who has been recruited through an agency that has actively recruited in a developing country on the list of banned countries for recruitment, the agency will be removed from the trust's list. That extremely important development has taken place recently.

Returning to the question of work permits, I should say that the policy was changed recently so that work permits could not be extended from the time of training. For example, if people have work permits for the period during which they are training as doctors, they are expected to return to their home countries and reapply for a permit if they wish to work full time for the NHS. The changed work permit policy thus reflects some concerns expressed about people moving from training straight into full-time employment in the NHS. As I have explained, we continue to keep the policy under review, but the many recent changes have led to a 28 per cent. fall in the number of nurses recruited from South Africa, for example.

MRI Scans

3. Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the use of the private sector in the provision of MRI scans in the NHS. [11242]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): May I add my tribute to all our NHS staff who performed with such heroism last Thursday, and also to the staff and members of the British Medical Association, who gave immediate help to those injured in Tavistock square? I am sure that the whole House will join me in thanking them for their outstanding work.

By 2008, we will be investing in an extra 900,000 MRI scans for NHS patients, doubling the number performed last year. About a quarter of the total number of scans will be carried out by the independent sector, all of them for NHS patients, free at the point of use.

Mr. Jones: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. What would she say to the chief executive of the University hospital of North Durham, who wrote to me recently saying that the new MRI scanner in his hospital is considerably underemployed and has been for some time, and that if the money given to the private sector company, Alliance Medical, had been directed to the hospital, he could have increased the number of scans and reduced the waiting list to zero?

The chief executive goes on to say:

"We are not alone. There are a number of hospitals up and down the country that have spare capacity."

Is not this the economics of the madhouse, or is it simple ideological dogma to increase capacity in the private sector when there is underutilised capacity in the NHS, and when my constituents have to travel 30 miles to access private health care in Middlesbrough?

Ms Hewitt: I say to my hon. Friend, and through him to the chief executive, that it is not a question of choosing between NHS hospital capacity and independent sector capacity. We need both to reduce the unacceptable waiting times for scans and to meet our target of a maximum of 18 weeks from GP referral to hospital treatment by 2008.

Furthermore, well before 2008, but certainly by then, University hospital of North Durham will need to use its capacity to the full, either by employing extra staff—and there is a shortage of radiologists and radiographers, which we are investing to overcome—or by making even more effective use of the NHS staff that it has. By 2008, NHS and other centres will provide an extra half a million MRI scans. The funding for that extra capacity is already pledged in the system.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): The use of the private sector is designed to cut waiting times. The NHS chief executive, Nigel Crisp, said in a recent meeting with MPs that he was confident that by 2008 the NHS will meet the target of no one waiting more than 18 weeks. As the Government do not routinely collect data on waiting times for diagnostic tests, will the Secretary of State undertake to publish the information on waiting times that enables the Department to be confident that the target will be met?

Ms Hewitt: The target for 2008 starts with the GP referral and ends with the hospital treatment. It will therefore involve measuring and reducing the hidden waiting times, which were never counted by the Conservatives, for diagnostics. By March next year at the latest, we are confident that the maximum wait for a CT or MRI scan will be 26 weeks. By March 2007, the maximum wait for all scans will be no more than 13 weeks. We are making good progress and can see the benchmarks. As more information becomes available, we will, of course, publish it.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend may recall that I raised this question with the Prime Minister some months ago, and I echo entirely the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones). Luton and Dunstable hospital is in the same situation. If my right hon. Friend is concerned to maximise the use of scans, why is funding not being provided to the hospital so that it can staff its own scanners, which are coming on stream?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is aware that we have more than doubled our investment in the NHS. By 2008, that funding will have increased to an unprecedented £92 billion a year. That includes additional funding for MRI scans and the other diagnostics that are needed.

I stress again that it is not a question of choosing between an increase in NHS MRI capacity and an increase in independent MRI scans. We need both. The additional capacity for MRI and other scans that is being made available to NHS patients from the independent sector is over and above what the NHS can provide. That is made possible in particular by using radiologists and other staff from other parts of Europe and South Africa to supplement the staff available to the NHS in our country. It is good news for NHS patients that we are cutting the MRI waiting times.

NHS Hospital Trusts

4. Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): What the overall financial status of NHS hospital trusts in 2003–04 was; and if she will make a statement.

[11243]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The Government have delivered record increases in investment for the NHS—funding that has been used to deliver substantial improvements across a range of services. In 2003–04, the NHS recorded a small surplus of £73 million. In the same year, 204 NHS trusts were in financial balance or had a surplus and 65 trusts posted a deficit.

Sir George Young: The Secretary of State will know that many NHS trusts and primary care trusts, particularly those that do badly out of the funding formula, have been able to reach NHS targets and deliver improved levels of care only by running up substantial financial deficits. Will the right hon. Lady give the House an absolute assurance that the new financial imperatives under which the trusts are now working will not result in unacceptable levels of patient safety?

Ms Hewitt: I know that the right hon. Gentleman will welcome the fact that his primary care trust has had an increase in its allocation from £1.4 billion in 2002–03 to £2.3 billion in 2007–08. There are enormous and unprecedented amounts of money going into the NHS. The reforms that we are making to the system, including money following the patient as patients are enabled to exercise greater choice and control over their health care, will improve patient safety and care rather than damage it.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that foundation status has brought great freedoms to some hospitals, including Homerton hospital in my constituency, which has excellent financial management and excellent leadership? I would be glad if she were to comment on her recent visit to that hospital.

Ms Hewitt: I had the opportunity recently to visit the excellent Homerton hospital in my hon. Friend's constituency. I am delighted that she has given me the opportunity to place on the record my admiration for its chief executive who, together with her staff, is delivering superb patient care. I especially welcome the fact that the hospital has taken advantage of its new status as a foundation trust to make a rapid decision to invest in and build a new perinatal centre to deal with the fact that in my hon. Friend's constituency, and more broadly in Hackney, there is a high level of premature births, with all the consequential effects that that has for the life chances of those children. Excellent work is being done.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): Is the right hon. Lady aware that when the Princess Royal hospital in my constituency merged with the Brighton and Sussex NHS Trust, it did so with a substantial debt? The trust has not recovered from that debt, and because of a number of changes that have been made and a difficult financial situation, it finds itself in some difficulty. Will the right hon. Lady consider the position and when trusts merge ensure that careful attention is given to whether debts should be written down to enable a new trust to start with a clean sheet of paper?

Ms Hewitt: I am not aware of the specific situation of the two trusts before and since the merger to which the hon. Gentleman refers. Given the substantial increase in NHS investment that has taken place in every part of England, it is important that all NHS trusts live within their means. I will look at the specific situation of the hon. Gentleman's trust and write to him about that. I would not generally favour a writing off of historic debts before or after a merger, for the simple reason that that would have to be carried by other parts of the NHS, where services might well suffer as a result.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): Will the Secretary of State come to Hemel Hempstead and visit our excellent hospital, which I am sure is just as good as the Homerton hospital? Sadly, we have been snubbed with funding. This year alone, as the right hon. Lady knows, we will be £30 million in debt. Doctors, nurses and clinical staff will be made redundant. Will she come to Hemel Hempstead and explain to my constituents why the Government are doing this to them?

Ms Hewitt: I am in fact meeting the hon. Gentleman and several of his colleagues from Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire later this afternoon to discuss the position in more detail. The national health service in his constituency and right across Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire is receiving, again, unprecedented increases—a 7 per cent. increase in funding over the past year alone. There are serious financial problems right across the health service in Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire. Those must be addressed by the local trusts, and my Department is working with the strategic health authority and the local trusts to resolve those financial problems.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): Under patient choice, if a hospital trust loses business it will get into financial difficulty. When the Department is asked whether the Secretary of State will allow a trust, in extremis, to go to the wall, the answer has been uncertain. Sometimes she has said yes, in extremis a trust can go to the wall. On other occasions it has been said that if there is an accident and emergency department attached, perhaps the casualty department will be kept going. I shall give the Secretary of State the opportunity to make the position clear now, because trusts need to know where they stand. Will trusts, in extremis, be allowed to go to the wall—yes or no?

Ms Hewitt: As a Labour Health Secretary, I shall certainly not force patients to use services that they do not want to use, nor will I allow any part of our country to find itself without accident and emergency services or other health services that people need. The detailed guidance, both on patient choice and on payment by results, will be published in due course, but there will be departments that patients do not want or need to use and those, I have no doubt at all, will either close or be reorganised as a result.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Opposition Members join the Secretary of State and the Minister in a warm appreciation of the magnificent response of NHS staff to the tragic events last Thursday. I think of hospitals such as University College hospital and St. Mary's, which I have visited in the past year, and, indeed, the Royal Free—they all have financial pressures with which they have to deal.

This is an important issue for many those hospitals. In 2003–04, 106 NHS bodies ended the year in deficit, up from 71 the year before. Can the Secretary of State say how many NHS bodies were in deficit at the end of the 2004–05 financial year? She says that much more money has gone into the NHS—but as we need more capacity in the NHS, can she explain why front-line services are being cut not just in Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire, but in Leeds, Bradford, South Teesside, Suffolk, Hampshire, Surrey, Sussex and Cornwall?

Ms Hewitt: All over the country national health services and care for patients have been improving, compared with what we inherited in 1997. I note that eight years ago there were 384 people waiting in Hinchingbrooke Health Care Trust for more than nine months. Today, that figure is zero. With regard to 2004–05, we are anticipating a deficit of around £140 million. That is the total picture. It is around 0.2 per cent. of the total NHS budget. It will be considerably more serious than that for individual trusts, but we will not publish the details of which trusts are in deficit until the 2004–05 figures have been audited.

Mr. Lansley: There are two essential questions: where is all the money going, and does the Secretary of State know how bad the problem is? The National Audit Office said that auditors expressed concern about the financial standing of one third of NHS trusts. A dozen strategic health authorities are reported to have overspent in the last financial year. Leaving aside the net figure of £140 million that she has just cited, what does the right hon. Lady expect to have been the aggregate overspend in the last financial year? It was £366 million in the 2003–04 financial year. I have received reports that that figure has more than doubled, and that it is £800 million in 2004–05. What level of financial support has been provided by the Department, directly or through the NHS bank, to offset those burgeoning deficits?

Ms Hewitt: Every year, all kinds of wild figures are published in various places about the overall deficit. I have just given the figures that have been audited for 2003–04, and we will give the detailed figures for 2004–05 when the audit is complete. The net figure, however, is less than a quarter of 1 per cent for the total

NHS budget. The hon. Gentleman seems determined to ignore the unprecedented increase in national health service funding that we have made available across the country. The minority of trusts with serious financial problems are now being helped to put the necessary financial recovery plans into place, where necessary with the help of the NHS bank.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Would the Secretary of State mind if I said something controversial? Listening to that exchange, it occurred to me that one problem that is not discussed, particularly by the two Front-Bench teams, is the fact that since 1975 there have been 27 reorganisations of the national health service. What people want most of all is a settlement. When people paint the Forth bridge, they normally finish the job before they start again. Under both Tory and Labour Governments we have altered the NHS. When a new Minister comes in, he undoes what his predecessor did—but what patients want above all else is a settlement and an agreement. The two Front-Bench teams should get together and agree at least some norms to achieve a settlement of the NHS so that we get a better product.

Ms Hewitt: I agree most warmly with my hon. Friend. At least we can agree on the need for long-term sustained increases in funding for our national health service. That is exactly what we have been delivering, and those record increases in funding will continue until 2008 and, indeed, beyond. I hope that my hon. Friend will join me in welcoming that increased support and the stability of funding that we are making available to the NHS. I only regret that the Opposition are unable to do so.

In-patient Admissions

6. Mr. Shahid Malik (Dewsbury) (Lab): What changes there have been since 2000 in the number of patients waiting more than six months for in-patient admission. [11245]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The national health service is continuing to make huge progress in providing faster access to hospital care. In May 2000, 282,397 patients were waiting more than six months for hospital operations. That has now been reduced to just below 50,000 patients. By the end of this year, there will be no patients waiting more than six months for in-patient treatment.

Mr. Malik: Can I commend and congratulate my right hon. Friend on the progress thus far on waiting lists? I welcome the target of 18 weeks for waiting lists, which is obviously very different from the position when the Tories were in power, when it was 18 months. Does my right hon. Friend agree that public accountability is central to public confidence? In that context, how does she propose to deal with hospitals that fail to meet their obligations vis-à-vis targets?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point about accountability. We are strengthening the accountability of NHS hospitals and other trusts to their local communities through the membership and governance structure of foundation trusts and other means for other NHS trusts. May I take the opportunity to congratulate Dewsbury and District hospital in my hon. Friend's constituency? I recently visited the hospital where, in direct response to requests from women in the community, a midwife-led midwifery unit is doing excellent work and has recently won a modernisation award.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): What does the Secretary of State think will be the effect on waiting times for in-patient treatment in the New Forest and in Romsey if the cottage hospitals that are under threat of having their in-patient beds closed after a bogus consultation by the local primary care trust do in fact lose those beds? May I thank her for the response given by the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) to the Adjournment debate on this subject last week, and ask her, on behalf of cross-party MPs from the New Forest and Romsey area, for a meeting to discuss this truly desperate situation?

Ms Hewitt: I understand that a consultation is taking place and that a close look is being taken at how best to provide services, particularly for elderly patients, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and nearby. I will take the opportunity to have a look at the record of the Adjournment debate, which I have not seen, and I will ensure that he and his hon. Friends are seen, if not by me, then by one of my ministerial colleagues.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the progress that she has outlined on reductions in patient waiting times. Does she think that we would have made that progress had we allowed NHS funds to be diverted from the NHS to subsidise people to jump the queue and go private by adopting the Conservative proposal for a privatising patients' passport?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We will leave that question alone. I call David Burrowes. [Interruption.] Order. The hon. Gentleman has withdrawn his question.

GP Contract

8. Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): What assessment she has made of patient satisfaction following the implementation of the new general practitioner contract. [11247]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): There is no doubt about the success of the new contractual arrangements. Patients are receiving better care, quicker access to GPs and nurses, and more services delivered locally. GPs are more satisfied because they are better rewarded for offering more services and for delivering better care.

Mr. Fraser: Does the Minister accept that patients registering with the practice rather than with a specific GP causes concern, as my constituents want their personal care delivered by someone whom they know and ask for?

Mr. Byrne: The new contract underpins some important changes in primary care. As I outlined, that care involves better and faster treatment, as well as delivering more specialisms and wider services locally. Part of the reason for ensuring that registrations are often with practices as opposed to individuals is that more GPs are engaging in sub-specialisms. There are now 1,400 GPs with a sub-specialism. We promised to deliver 1,000 under the NHS plan by 2004, and we achieved the target a year early.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): Patients in Snodland are delighted with the new contract. Indeed, I opened a £2 million new medical centre in Snodland just the other day. On the same day, there was a ground-breaking ceremony for a £5 million new medical centre. What else is my hon. Friend going to do for my constituency?

Mr. Byrne: I congratulate my hon. Friend on that excellent news. As he says, the new GP contract is underpinning a revolution in primary care. It is absolutely essential in helping GPs to play their part in cutting mortality rates. It is no accident that death rates from cancer are down by 12 per cent. and that death rates from coronary heart disease are down by 27 per cent.—it is because the policy is right and is backed by the investment that patients such as those in my hon. Friend's constituency rightly deserve.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): Would the Minister concede that there is huge dissatisfaction in rural areas with the delivery of the out-of-hours service? What steps has he taken to ensure its effective and efficient implementation?

Mr. Byrne: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that question. I know that he has some expertise in the subject and I welcome the speech that he made, to which I listened carefully.

It is worth pointing out that before the new GP contract was introduced, fewer than 5 per cent. of GPs provided their own out-of-hours cover. The new arrangements will ensure that the skills mix and team working that are well established in both primary and secondary care apply out of hours, accessed through a single call to NHS Direct.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): The national Hepatitis C Trust has informed me that several patients have approached it after being either misdiagnosed by their GP or waiting an inordinate amount of time to be referred for either a biopsy or treatment. What processes exist to link patient feedback to GPs' continuing professional development? How will the new GP contract and appraisal system aid that activity?

Mr. Byrne: The hepatitis C action plan is an important part of that, but it is up to primary care trusts to ensure that their contractual arrangements are audited effectively so that remedial action is taken when quality is found not to be up to the standard that it needs to be.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): There is a question about responsiveness. Following the previous question about flexibility, how flexible is the contract? Can it change to reflect the increased prevalence of other chronic conditions such as hepatitis C? What role do patients and the feedback from patients play in that?

Mr. Byrne: Primary care trusts are the local health professionals responsible for ensuring that needs in their communities are addressed. That is why they have a responsibility to audit the care that general practices provide in their area and to take remedial steps whenever they find that it is not up to the mark.

I stress that the new GP contract is delivering some important gains for constituencies throughout the country. The fact that 99.9 per cent. of people see a GP within 48 hours or a primary care professional within 24 hours is due to the new contract. Achievement in the quality in outcomes framework exceeds 95 per cent. Again, that is down to the new contract. Those changes are important. I am sure that that is why the chair of the British Medical Association's General Practitioners Committee said:

> "I believe the introduction of the new GP contract marks the beginning of a change that will be better for patients and better for everyone working in general practice."

That includes people in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): The Under-Secretary knows that one aspect of traditional primary care that is most highly valued by patients is GP support for community hospitals. Yet following the introduction of the new GP contract, GPs' out-of-hours cover for community hospitals has been greatly reduced. What assessment has he made of the threat to community and cottage hospitals following the introduction of the new contract? What will he do to ensure their long-term survival?

Mr. Byrne: As the hon. Gentleman knows, about 50 community hospitals were announced as a manifesto commitment.

However, I want to be clear about the impact of the new GP contract on out-of-hospital care. The Department of Health has made it clear that primary care trusts must fulfil national quality requirements when they put arrangements in place. We can be confident that those arrangements will be satisfactory only because of the unprecedented investment that the Government are putting into primary care, not only the £54 billion that is available for local management through primary care trusts but the £322 million extra that was provided to ensure adequate out-of-hours cover.

Cancelled Operations

9. Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): How many operations were cancelled in (a) Worcestershire NHS Acute Trust and (b) England in the last year for which figures are available. [11248]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): The Department of Health collects figures on operations that have been cancelled for non-clinical reasons on either the day of admission to hospital or after admission, on the day when the patient is admitted. There were 943 operations cancelled at Worcestershire NHS Acute Trust during 2004–05. Nationally, the figure was 68,576.

Miss Kirkbride: Is not the Minister remotely ashamed of the figures that she has just announced, given the human misery that they represent? Does she realise how upsetting it is for hospital staff to have to ring people on the day of a cancelled operation to say that they should not come in, despite their acutely painful condition? Does she appreciate the trouble that it causes the people involved, who might well have suffered a sleepless night and made extensive arrangements with their friends and family to cover their time in hospital? Does she not accept that the Government's focus on targets, targets, targets, instead of clinical priorities makes those figures so shameful?

Ms Winterton: It would be interesting to know which targets the hon. Lady would like to scrap. I would have thought that she would be congratulating her local NHS staff on reducing the number of cancelled operations from about 2.3 per cent. in 2004–05 to 1.9 per cent. now. That figure is still higher than the national average, but her local staff—whom I hope she will support—are working on the issue of bed management within the local trust. One of the difficulties has involved increased admissions through accident and emergency units. The purpose of the work is to ensure that people are discharged early from hospital and not kept there inappropriately, and that there are no inappropriate admissions through A and E. I would have thought that the hon. Lady would congratulate her local NHS staff on that work, because they are working very hard to give the highest quality services to patients.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend explain how the number of cancelled operations in Worcestershire would have been reduced if the Conservatives had won the last election and taken £1 billion out of the national health service budget—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not worth answering.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): The Minister will know that the Worcestershire Acute Hospitals NHS Trust is under great financial and practical pressure, and that it regularly operates at or beyond its designed capacity, hence the problem with cancelled operations. In that context, will she explain how the proposal to close two wards at Evesham community hospital, to transfer services away from that hospital and to remove GPs from caring for patients there will result in the increase in capacity that Worcestershire's health economy so desperately needs?

Ms Winterton: First, I should point out that the local PCTs in the hon. Gentleman's area have received about £43 million extra funding this year. I understand that the issue that he has raised is still being considered. I know that it has been the subject of an Adjournment debate, and I gather that it has been under consideration since that time. I am perfectly prepared to write to the hon. Gentleman to update him on the situation if that would be helpful.

Patient Choice

10. Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): If she will make a statement on policies to increase choice for NHS patients. [11249]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): From the end of this year, national health service patients will be able to choose from four or more hospitals when referred by their general practitioner. By 2008, they will be able to choose from any health care provider that meets NHS standards and prices.

Mr. McFadden: I thank the Secretary of State for her reply. Does she agree that, where choice has been introduced so far—for example, in offering patients a shorter waiting time in exchange for having their operation done somewhere other than their local hospital—it has been a success? Does she also agree that while choice will not operate in exactly the same way in the public and private sectors, it is essential that as the Government increase investment in the NHS to record levels, it should be matched by the empowerment of patients to ensure that they have increased control over the timing, nature and location of their treatment?

Ms Hewitt: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Patients are telling us very clearly that they want more choice and more control over their health care. We can see the policy of increased patient choice working very well in the city of Wolverhampton in my hon. Friend's constituency. For example, since the beginning of this year, patients there have had a choice of two or more hospitals for cataract operations, which has helped to bring the maximum waiting time for such operations down to three months, four years ahead of the target that we set in the NHS plan. Similarly, since April, NHS patients in Wolverhampton have had a choice of two or more hospitals for heart treatment and cardiac surgery, which improves the quality of care available to them.

David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that choice for NHS patients will be dramatically reduced if the food supplements directive is introduced in its present form? A decision on that matter was upheld by the European Court today. What will she do to secure an opt-out from the directive? Does she agree that many hundreds of safe nutrients will be taken off the shelves as a result of its introduction? The measure is deeply unpopular and the Government have done nothing like enough to get involved and to stop it.

Ms Hewitt: I discussed this very matter with Commissioner Kyprianou some two weeks ago, and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), discussed it with patients' representatives and the industry just last week. We will continue to press for the lightest touch possible implementation of the directive, and we will ensure that the providers who are already making available a wide and growing choice of vitamin and food supplements to the public in Britain and elsewhere can continue to do so. That is what the providers want to be able to do, it is what the public want, and we will ensure that they can continue to get it.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend intend the choice agenda to apply to patients suffering from mental health conditions? If so, how does she envisage that it will work?

Ms Hewitt: The commitment that we have made in relation to choice, such as the choice of four or more hospitals by the end of this year, applies specifically to in-patient treatment. As my hon. Friend will be aware, there is rightly a growing emphasis in the treatment of patients with mental illness on treating them wherever possible in their own homes and in the community. There is a much wider agenda, however, to ensure that people with depression and other mental illnesses can exercise more choice and control over their treatment, for instance by having a range of different therapies available to them. That is widely welcomed, not only by users of mental health services but carers and families of mental health patients.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): A year ago, my constituents had the choice of going to see their GP on a Saturday morning. When will they get that choice back?

Ms Hewitt: Following the negotiation of the new GP contract, primary care trusts are making available to patients and users a range of out-of-hours services, including those provided by our ambulance service and emergency care practitioners. The new GP contract responded to the strongly expressed views of most GPs that they did not want to continue being responsible for providing that out-of-hours service themselves. That is why it is essential that primary care trusts in the right hon. Gentleman's constituency and elsewhere ensure that there is proper provision for out-of-hours service. It is also why we are continuing to expand NHS walk-in centres, which are available every day of the week, every day of the year.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): With respect to patient choice in the NHS, may I raise with my right hon. Friend the case of my constituent, Lynne Burton, who suffers from advanced breast cancer? At the moment, Lynne cannot be prescribed Herceptin, the drug of her consultant's choice, because she does not meet the rather restrictive criteria, and if she did, local funding might be problematic. When will the Department relax those criteria and license Herceptin for early-stage breast cancer to give women a better choice and a chance of fighting that terrible disease?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend raises an extremely important point. We are already urgently considering referring Herceptin to NICE for appraisal in relation to use in early-stage treatment of breast cancer. We have also asked Professor Mike Richards, our national cancer director, to consider the issues surrounding the introduction of Herceptin across the national health service, including managing the potential gap between licensing the use of the drug for early-stage treatment and publication of a NICE appraisal. He will report back to us in the autumn, and we will then make appropriate decisions.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): May I remind the Secretary of State, before she seeks to rewrite history, that it was her Government in 2001 who signed up to the food supplements directive lock, stock and barrel, without questioning any of its contents? May I also remind her that it is only due to the all-party group, the Opposition parties and the help of Carole Caplin that the Government have sought to get involved at this late stage? Given that we now hold the presidency of the EU for six months, is not it time for her to act on her Prime Minister's instructions and start to fight for Britain's interests and for those hundreds of thousands of people who need and rely on food supplements and vitamins, rather than pretending that the fault does not lie at her Department's feet for doing nothing for four years?

Ms Hewitt: It was, of course, this Government who helped to establish the four-presidency, now six-presidency, initiative to ensure that regulation in the European Union was proportionate, appropriate and light-touch in its implementation. As a user of vitamin and food supplements myself, I certainly intend to ensure that we—as holder of the presidency of the European Union for six months and, separately, as representative of the United Kingdom's interests—secure the implementation of the directive, which has now been upheld by the European Court of Justice, in a sensible and light-touch manner so that users and the public here in Britain can continue—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) asked a favour of me: he asked me to allow him to put a supplementary question. Now he interrupts the Secretary of State when she replies. That is bad manners, and I will not allow it. Has the Secretary of State finished her reply?

Ms Hewitt: I wanted to make one more point, Mr. Speaker.

The industry has already submitted 500 dossiers on different food supplement products with no great difficulty.

Alzheimer's Disease

11. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): What drugs are available on NHS prescription for Alzheimer's disease patients. [11250]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): This is a bit of a low blow. It is only because I have a high regard for the hon. Gentleman that I do not simply refer him to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) last month.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, four drugs are licensed for the treatment of the effects of Alzheimer's disease: Aricept, Exelon, Reminyl and Ebixa.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: What a lovely answer from a most charming Minister. May I ask her, however, why the draft guidance from the National Institute for Clinical Excellence states that those four valuable drugs, which could bring great benefit to those suffering from Alzheimer's disease, should not be prescribed on the national health service?

Two meetings were held here last week, in which the Alzheimer's Society was involved. At both, horror and condemnation of the guidance were expressed. Given that professional psychiatrists were not allowed to sit on the appraisal panel and that the advice of those who sent the panel evidence has been ignored, will the Government intervene immediately and insist that the drugs be prescribed to these vulnerable people on the NHS without delay?

Jane Kennedy: The original assessment of the drugs, issued in 2001, still applies, and patients already receiving them will continue to do so. NICE employs a very transparent process for the appraisal of drugs. It gives stakeholders, including patients' groups such as those that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, an opportunity to make representations on the economic model as well as commenting on the proposals themselves. I would expect NICE to take careful account of all such comments before making its final appraisal.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): I am grateful to the Minister for that information, but I remind her that last week was Alzheimer's awareness week. Many Members will have visited local Alzheimer's societies, as I did. There is considerable apprehension as they await NICE's decision, which I understand is imminent. May I ask the Minister again to use whatever influence she has to try to ensure that those drugs remain available to Alzheimer's sufferers on the NHS?

Jane Kennedy: As I said last time the subject was raised, NICE has an international reputation. It will decide on the form of its final guidance taking account of all views expressed to it as part of the consultation, and we trust it to make informed, fully considered recommendations on the drugs. I know that there will be intense interest in the matter, and I am sure that we shall return to it in the future.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): When taking into account the health professionals who use these drugs, will the Minister acknowledge that little research that is applicable to daily use has been undertaken since the original guidance was issued, and that it was a complete surprise when a different decision was taken? If, as is widely expected, the NICE decision is negative, will she allow the drug to be available for an ongoing period, in order to enable an in-depth study that will prove once and for all whether these drugs are effective? Such a study has not yet been undertaken.

Jane Kennedy: I do not accept the premise on which the hon. Lady's question is based. I repeat that the existing guidance, produced in 2001, remains in place until the final guidance has been issued. She should not jump to conclusions about what that final guidance should be. We should wait and allow NICE to take its time, and to reach a decision on the proper advice and guidance that it will issue in due course.

Waiting Times

12. Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): What the difference is between average waiting times of those referred for treatment (a) by their local general practitioner and (b) elsewhere within an NHS trust in (i) London and (ii) England; and if she will make a statement. [11251]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): Waiting times for referrals other than those made by a general practitioner are not collected centrally. Average waiting times for patients waiting for their first out-patient appointment following GP referral have fallen to seven weeks, from 7.7 weeks, in March 2000 nationally, and to 7.5 weeks, from 7.9 weeks, in London. By 2008, no patient will have to wait more than 18 weeks for hospital treatment, starting from referral to point of treatment.

Simon Hughes: Will the Minister consider that those in Southwark who are referred by their GP to the orthopaedic department at Guy's and St. Thomas' have to be treated within 13 weeks, but that there is no time limit for those who are referred from elsewhere in the hospital? In the words of the chief executive, that does not "ensure equal access to patients regardless of source of referral."

Such an arrangement is clearly inequitable and not based on clinical need. Will she do something about it?

Caroline Flint: I am pleased to say—perhaps the hon. Gentleman did not listen to my earlier reply—that we are doing something about it. We are able to introduce for patients a wait of no longer than 18 weeks from first referral to treatment, which means that we can cut out the hidden waiting lists that often emerge within our health system. Because we have not only reformed the health service but resourced it, we are confident that we can achieve that.

Computer Misuse

3.32 pm

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Computer Misuse Act 1990; and for connected purposes.

In moving this motion, may I first of all pay tribute to the work undertaken by the all-party group on the internet, which carried out a thorough review of the Computer Misuse Act 1990, and whose recommendations form the basis of the Bill that I present today? I want particularly to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt). He presented a similar Bill to the House in March of this year, but in the end it was defeated by the timetable for the general election.

My Bill will revise the 1990 Act to take account of commitments made in European instruments in respect of combating and effectively punishing attacks against computers, and it will update the Act in other areas. It will amend section 1(3) to increase the term of imprisonment for a related offence from six months to two years. It will amend section 3(7) to increase the term of imprisonment for a further related offence from five years to 10 years. It will amend section 3 in order to clarify that all means of interference with a computer system are criminalised. In particular it will ensure that adequate provision is made to criminalise all forms of denial-of-service attacks. It will also give effect to article 6(1)(a)(i) of the convention on cybercrime, which requires criminalisation of the distribution of, or making available of, a computer password through which a computer system is capable of being accessed, with intent to commit an offence.

This Bill will, I hope, meet with the House's approval. It contains only six clauses, has no financial implications, implements measures that have been approved by Ministers and Parliament and is, I hope, relatively simple. As last year's report by the all-party group on the internet demonstrates, these measures already have cross-party support. I trust this will remain the case after I finish my speech. As the report pointed out and as every Member of this House will doubtless accept, the worldwide web has changed out of all recognition in the past 15 years, as has the nature of cybercrime. The media like to imagine that hacking, virus proliferation and denial-of-service attacks using e-mail are the product of bright but lonely and socially challenged teenagers sitting in their bedrooms. That is an outdated, inaccurate and, I think, dangerous notion. Those who regularly and increasingly hold website operators to ransom are more likely to be members of an organised crime syndicate than the school computer club. It is time that cyber crime was recognised for the serious crime that it is.

Following the recent sentencing of teenager Joseph James McElroy to 200 hours of community service for breaking into a US Government laboratory system, detective chief superintendent Len Hynds, the former head of the national hi-tech crime unit, called on the Government and the courts to reform sentencing policy to reflect the damage caused by hackers breaking into government and private sector computer systems. He said:

"The internet has grown up and we need to say to people who think its fun to rifle through people's private files that they are actually committing a crime".

My Bill seeks to specify a new offence of denial of service. A denial-of-service attack occurs when a deliberate attempt is made to stop a computer performing. Examples include attempts to flood a network, thereby preventing legitimate network traffic; attempts to disrupt the connections between two machines, thereby preventing access to a service; attempts to prevent a particular individual from accessing a service; and attempts to disrupt services to a specific system or person.

Denial-of-service attacks can essentially disable one's computer or one's network. Some denial-of-service attacks can be executed with limited resources against a large, sophisticated site. For example, an attacker with an old PC and a slow modem may yet be able to disable much faster and more sophisticated machines or networks. One form of such attack could mean a large number of remote computers being orchestrated to attack a target at the same time. In some cases, the attacks overwhelm the connecting links to a machine rather than the machine itself. That can result in significant collateral damage that extends beyond the machine being attacked. Denial-of-service attacks are extremely common on today's internet. At the lower end of effectiveness, the blips in traffic are hardly noticeable, but we are told of cases at the other end in which large university networks have been made unusable for hours at a time.

The chief constable of Greater Manchester, Michael Todd, was bombarded with thousands of threatening e-mails in a denial-of-service attack shortly before the May Day bank holiday this year. At one point, 2000 e-mails were being sent every hour. The purpose of the attack was to crash the force's computer systems through the volume of e-mails being sent. Cambridgeshire police were subject to a similar denial-of-service attack almost two years ago, when thousands of spam e-mails told recipients that their credit cards were about to be charged for an iPod that they had purchased unless they phoned a customer service number. The customer service number turned out to be the switchboard at Cambridgeshire police, which was deluged by thousands of people who had received the hoax e-mail. Closer to home, a gun control website contacted me two years ago to complain that one of my constituents, a gun enthusiast, had bombarded the site with so many e-mails over a short period of time that their server had crashed.

The Computer Misuse Act 1990 came into force on 29 August 1990 and specifies offences for attacks against computer systems or data. Criminal denial-of-service attacks are regularly made on gambling websites both in the United Kingdom and elsewhere. Such attacks are invariably accompanied by demands for amounts between £10,000 and more than £100,000 in order to make the attacks stop. The impact on gambling businesses has been severe. The national hi-tech crime unit has become involved in the investigations, but the perpetrators are believed to be based abroad, which sets some limits on what can be achieved quickly.

The second part of the Bill deals with the length of sentences. At present, offences under section 1 of the Computer Misuse Act 1990 can be dealt with only in a magistrates court, where the maximum penalty is six months in prison and/or a fine of £5,000. A conviction in a higher court currently applies only to offences defined in sections 2 and 3 of the Computer Misuse Act. In those cases, the maximum penalty is five years in prison or an unlimited fine.

By increasing the tariff on these crimes, the House would be sending a message to the courts and the public prosecution service that these crimes must be taken seriously and that, where appropriate, custodial sentences must be applied. Home Office figures show that, when an offence under the Computer Misuse Act is the principal offence with which someone is charged, only about a third of those found guilty are given custodial sentences. When such an offence is not the principal offence, the proportion is very small indeed.

It is regularly claimed that the cost of cleaning up virus or worm attacks runs into billions of pounds. The current level of sentences does not reflect the seriousness of such offences. This Bill would therefore raise the maximum sentence for a conviction under section 1 of the 1990 Act to two years. That would have a number of indirect benefits. It would make an offender subject to extradition procedures, and also make it possible to prosecute for a criminal attempt, even where such an attempt had not succeeded.

Before I conclude, I wish to draw the House's attention to a recent NOP survey conducted on behalf of the national hi-tech crime unit. It estimates that the minimum cost of the impact of high-tech crime on UK-based companies with more than 1,000 employees is no less than £2.5 billion every year.

As the worldwide web grows both in size and in its influence on all our daily lives, the threats posed to all of us by cybercrime also grow. Although high-profile denial-of-service attacks have been made against e-commerce and, especially, gambling sites, the UK Government and the country's critical infrastructure are also vulnerable. It is essential that we have a law in place to make prosecution possible when offences are committed, because that will send the strong and unambiguous message that e-crime will be treated with the utmost seriousness.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Tom Harris, Mr. Ian Austin, Mr. John Spellar, Gordon Banks, Michael Gove, Jessica Morden, Ms Emily Thornberry, David Mundell, Derek Wyatt, Charles Hendry, Mr. Alan Reid and Michael Fabricant.

COMPUTER MISUSE

Mr. Tom Harris accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Computer Misuse Act 1990; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 2 December, and to be printed [Bill 42].

Opposition Day

[5TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Tax Credits

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.42 pm

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House commends the Parliamentary Ombudsman and the Citizens Advice Bureau on their reports on Tax Credits; notes with concern their conclusions that many thousands of low income families are suffering financial hardship as a result of the serious problems with the administration of tax credits; further notes the huge cost to the taxpayer of these problems; calls on the Government to implement as soon as possible all the Ombudsman's recommendations to improve the tax credit administration; in particular calls on the Government to adopt the Ombudsman's recommendation to set up a statutory test for recovery of excess payments of tax credits consistent with the test that is currently applied to social security benefits, with the right of appeal to an independent tribunal and calls on HM Revenue and Customs to suspend all recovery of tax credit overpayments until this reform has been completed; and calls on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain the Government's failure to provide low income families with the service they deserve; and requests that he conduct a fundamental review of the structure and administration of tax credits, as recommended by the Ombudsman.

This is my first opportunity in the House to express my sadness and sorrow to the victims of last week's murderous bombs, and to the injured who continue to suffer. I have just seen pictures on the television news of those who died. That brings home in a very graphic way how many lives have been so cruelly snatched away from us. I think that is an appropriate opening to an Opposition day debate, as democratic debate must continue undaunted.

Today's debate is about people like Mr. Crow and his family, from Dover. They have two kids, a mortgage and no spare cash. Mr. Crow recently took a job as a carer and became entitled to tax credits. When his pay rose, he did what he was supposed to do and informed the Inland Revenue. He was told that the increase in his pay was to be disregarded. A year later, he has been told that he has been overpaid and that he now must pay back the difference. His working tax credit has been reduced from £35 a week to £2.44 for the entire month. That family has been forced to go into debt or lose their home.

This debate is also about people like my constituent Helen Thompson, a single mother. She contacted the helpline and was told that she could keep an overpayment of £3,000, even though she had offered to pay it back immediately. Out of the blue, the Revenue demanded that money back, with the result that she could not meet her child care costs. She faced losing her job, and only the intervention of my constituency office caused the Revenue to change its position.

This debate is also about people like the lone parent in the report by Citizens Advice, who received no tax credit payments whatsoever for the last few weeks of the financial year. She had to resort to Salvation Army food parcels to feed her children.

[Mr. George Osborne]

Every Member of the House knows that, sadly, those are not isolated examples. Citizens Advice handled 150,000 cases in the last year alone. The parliamentary ombudsman now spends a quarter of her time on tax credit cases, and the Revenue has recently admitted to me in writing that it is dealing with 51,000 complaints, 9,000 of which were referred to it by Members.

The blunt truth that the Government have to confront is that the tax credit system

"is failing the very families most in need of extra money, causing hardship that the system is designed to prevent, and making it more difficult for people to save or to hold down a job, rather than supporting saving and employment."

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Osborne: I am delighted to give way to the architect of tax credits, as I have just read out a quote from Citizens Advice.

Ed Balls: Tax credits have helped to reduce child poverty by a million since 1997, and the Government are committed to the goal of halving child poverty by the end of the decade. Does the Conservative party share that goal?

Mr. Osborne: I am absolutely delighted that the hon. Gentleman intervened; I suspected that he might be in the Chamber today. In his constituency, 4,100 of his constituents received the wrong award, which was 41 per cent. of the people who applied. In his constituency alone, £2.9 million was overpaid to people he represents. If he is happy with that record, so be it; I do not think he should be. On child poverty, I know that he likes to do his homework so perhaps he should read the report from the Institute for Fiscal Studies, "Poverty and Inequality in Britain: 2005", produced earlier this year, which states that owing to the administrative problems with the new tax credits there was an increase in child poverty by 90,000 after housing costs and 80,000 before housing costs. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman has read that document, but I suggest that he does so before he intervenes again.

Ed Balls rose—

Mr. Osborne: Oh, the hon. Gentleman has already read it.

Ed Balls: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. I shall rephrase my question. Child poverty rose by 4 million between 1979 and 1997. As a result of the working families tax credit and the introduction of child tax credit, child poverty has now fallen by a million since 1997 and, because of tax credits, is forecast to fall further. The Government are committed to halving child poverty by the end of the decade and to abolishing it in a generation. Is the Conservative party committed, like the Government, to the abolition of child poverty and to halving child poverty by the end of the decade? It is a simple question: yes or no?

Mr. Osborne: We are committed to policies that reduce child poverty. We are not committed to policies that have increased child poverty. As the IFS said, the introduction of the new tax credits has led to an increase in child poverty by about 90,000 after housing costs and 80,000 before housing costs. The hon. Gentleman says that the system has helped all those families, but he has obviously not read the reports that we are debating today—for example, the CAB report, which states that the tax credit system has plunged many below the breadline and into mounting debt; or the parliamentary ombudsman's report, which talks of families having to borrow money from family and friends to support their children, using up their life savings or running up credit card debts to pay for child care costs, buy food and get to work.

Ed Balls rose—

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Osborne: I will happily give way to the other Ed, the other architect of the tax credit policy. Is the hon. Gentleman proud of a system that has plunged many below the breadline?

Edward Miliband: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. We are asking for simple intellectual honesty from him. Under the tax credit system, child poverty has fallen by about a million. Does he acknowledge that, and does he acknowledge the responsibility of tax credits in cutting child poverty? It is a simple question—yes or no?

Mr. Osborne: No, I do not acknowledge that the present tax credit system has helped in the reduction of child poverty, because I have in front of me the IFS report, which states that the administrative problems with the new tax credits led to an increase in child poverty by 90,000. That is in the document.

Edward Miliband rose—

Mr. Osborne: Unless the hon. Gentleman has read the document—[Interruption.] He has? Then I will give way.

Edward Miliband: The hon. Gentleman says that the present system of tax credits has not helped to tackle child poverty, but One Parent Families said in its Budget submission in 2005:

"Tax Credits have delivered substantial improvements in the levels of income delivered to lone parents, and evidence suggests that they will have helped achieve the impressive expected reduction of child poverty by a quarter by 2004/05."

That organisation is saying that we have helped to tackle child poverty through tax credits.

Mr. Osborne: The hon. Gentleman obviously has not read the words of the Child Poverty Action Group—if he wants to trade organisations—which says that the way that the tax credit system operates has created, rather than prevented, hardship. I know that the hon. Members for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) and for Normanton (Ed Balls) are fiercely keen to defend their reputation and that, to an extent, their reputation depends on the success of tax credit policy—we will see how that fares over the next couple of years—but they should own up to the mistakes. The very fact that they do not own up to them shows how out of touch many Labour Ministers and those who advise them have become with the problems that their tax credit system has created. The person who is more disconnected from that reality than anyone else is the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself: the man who has put tax credits at the heart of his empire.

We understand that the Chancellor is in Brussels today, but he must be as disappointed as we are that he has missed yet another chance to defend his policy to the House, for he invented tax credits—no one else. He made them complicated and intrusive—no one else. He presided over his own Department's errors and incompetence—no one else. Yet when it comes to admitting his mistakes, it is anyone else but the Chancellor. When it comes to explaining how the Government are sorting our his fiasco, it is anyone else buf the Chancellor. Above all, when it comes to apologising to the thousands of families who are suffering hardship as result of his chaotic administration of tax credits, it is anyone else but the Chancellor.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman mentioned figures of 50,000 or 150,000 complaints. My understanding of tax credits is that they have helped—or changed the income of, to put it in more neutral terms for his purposes—6 million families. With a back-of-an-envelope calculation, that suggests an administrative problem of about 3 per cent. on his figures. The Government admit in their amendment to the Opposition motion that there are administrative problems. All hon. Members admit that there are administrative problems. First, will he say what percentage of administrative problems he thinks is acceptable for any Department? Secondly, to change the focus, will he say whether he supports tax credits, because he is arguing that they are putting families into poverty, yet his own motion does not pursue the logic of that and suggest that they should be abolished?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Shorter interventions would be helpful.

Mr. Osborne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will catch your eye later, so that he can explain that the error rate is not 3 per cent. He should consider his own constituency. Of the 8,200 tax credit awards there, 1,100 were unpaid and 2,600 were overpaid. That is very considerably more than 3 per cent. Indeed, in total the overpaid and underpaid awards come to almost half the entire tax credit awards in the country. We are not talking about small amounts of administrative error.

We have finally managed to bring Browne to the Dispatch Box, but with respect to the Chief Secretary, we have got the wrong Mr. Browne. The Prime Minister has said sorry and the Paymaster General has said sorry, but we have not heard a word from the architect of tax credits himself. Indeed, the last time that the Chancellor answered any questions on tax credits in Parliament was more than a year ago, and he has had plenty of opportunities to do so.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Osborne: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will apologise on behalf of the Chancellor.

Mr. Austin: I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman three simple questions. Does he accept that child poverty trebled when the Conservative party was in power? Does he accept that it has been cut by 1 million under this Government? Will he tell us—with a straight answer, yes or no—whether he supports the Government's objective of halving child poverty by the end of the decade?

Mr. Osborne: The hon. Gentleman has obviously not listened to the earlier exchanges. Of course any party that believes in a civilised and compassionate society wants to reduce child poverty. The point of the debate is that many tens of thousands of families have been plunged into child poverty as a result of the tax credit system fiasco. If he has not yet become aware of that in the couple of months that he has been a Member of Parliament, I suggest that he hold more constituency surgeries and he will discover what is going on in his constituency.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Will my hon. Friend tell us later how much the implementation of the tax credit system has cost the country? Bearing in mind that it is fundamental to a lot of people, how much will all the complaints and the wrong awards cost the nation? How much of the money that we want to go to people who need it is thus not arriving there?

Mr. Osborne: My right hon. Friend does not have to wait for the rest of my speech because I am happy to tell him now that the cost of the administration of tax credits has increased tenfold to more than £400 million. More than 3,000 people are now employed just on the helpline. We are all, as taxpayers, paying for the mess that the Chancellor has created.

How did we get into this mess? We all know that the introduction of tax credits in 2003 was shambolic. No one who was an MP at the time is likely to forget that. Hundreds of thousands of families were left without the financial support on which they relied. At the height of the crisis, there were 1.7 million attempts in a single day to contact the Revenue helpline—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Normanton is muttering. I suspect that he had a special phone line in the Treasury when he was working there, but none of the 1.7 million people who were trying to contact the Revenue got hold of his number—perhaps they would have shouted all sorts of abuse at him if they had.

It took four months before the system was stabilised. Thanks to the work of the Public Accounts Committee, we now know that the testing period for the new information technology system was cut significantly before it went live. We do not know who ordered it to be cut, so perhaps the Chief Secretary to the Treasury can tell us today. We also still have not seen the Government's gateway review, which said that the IT system was going to work well, so will the Chief Secretary publish that without further excuse?

Since the initial fiasco, we have had one software problem after another. Some 500,000 families received duplicate payments and 82,000 households had to find the cash to repay the Revenue for its own mistakes. In the past financial year, 60,000 people who told the Revenue that their income had changed found that their partners' income was reduced to zero as a result. They were then overpaid tax credits that were clawed back from them. The Revenue might think that the mistakes have been rectified, but families are still living with their consequences, as the reports that we are examining today make clear.

One mother facing an overpayment of £5,000 told the ombudsman:

"we are in the process of remortgaging our house to cover payments for credit card and loan repayments. My husband and I are at breaking point due to the pressure and stress."

I am sure that the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) has heard similar examples in his constituency surgery.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is generous in giving way. Of course we have heard about mistakes and many complaints have been made. Any MP who holds surgeries will know the number of people who come to them with problems, but allowing for that, everyone in the Chamber will recognise that child poverty must be something that we put into history. Will the hon. Gentleman make it clear whether the Conservatives would, if elected, scrap tax credits? His answer to that question would address a lot of the issues today.

Mr. Osborne: With the greatest respect to the hon. Gentleman, I shall get to the future of the tax credit system later in my speech, so I shall happily take an intervention then. Again he talks about isolated cases, but of the more than 11,000 people in his constituency who receive tax credits, half were made an incorrect award. He cannot seriously be happy with that as the Member for Chorley.

Mr. Hoyle: Never once have I stated that I am happy when judgments are wrong—far from it. I am the first to complain to the Minister and to take up issues on behalf of my constituents. I hope that other hon. Members also do that. We do not need any lectures from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Osborne: I was not giving the hon. Gentleman a lecture, but merely filling him in with the details about his constituency.

The Paymaster General gives the impression that the difficulties are teething problems that are on their way to being resolved. However, as we all know from our surgeries—this is probably as true in Chorley as it is in Tatton—the problems continue. We know of families who found that eligible children were simply deleted altogether from a tax credit award. We know of people whose repeated attempts to inform the Revenue of overpayments have been ignored. We know of mothers whose Sure Start maternity grants have been refused because the system said that they were not in receipt of child tax credit, although in fact they were. We know of people who have received multiple award notices on the same day, each saying something completely contradictory.

When people try to get in touch with the Revenue to ask for help, what do they find? In the words of the ombudsman, their experience is a "very dismal one". People phone, write, complain and appeal, but they still fail to get a satisfactory response for months, despite the fact that, as I pointed out to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), more than 3,200 people now work on the helpline and more than 400 people are dealing with complaints. That is the system today, not during the crisis of the initial launch or the computer errors that affected hundreds of thousands, but now, two years after the tax credits system was launched. It is all documented in the damning independent reports of the parliamentary ombudsman and Citizens Advice.

Mr. Austin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Osborne: I gave way to the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) and I now want to make progress.

How could the Paymaster General have possibly told Parliament:

"The system has been stable and performing very well . . . for well over a year"?—[Official Report, 7 February 2005; Vol. 430, c. 1254W.]

The parliamentary ombudsman certainly found it puzzling. She says in her report:

"the cases I have investigated lead me to the conclusion that such reassurances"

by the Paymaster General

"did not give a complete picture of what has been happening".

That is a devastating and, as far as I am aware, an unprecedented rebuke of a Minister by Parliament's watchdog. Why did the Paymaster General say that the system has been performing very well? Did she not see what every other MP sees in their surgeries, or did she choose not to tell Parliament the whole story? I hope that she gives a full account of herself today.

What hundreds of thousands of low-income families want to know is not how the Government got into the mess but how they are going to get out of it. That is the second issue. The Paymaster General told us on 26 May this year that she was taking steps to sort out some of the ongoing problems. It was at least a recognition that we were no longer dealing with teething problems. I welcome those proposals—for example, making the award notices more intelligible and improving the helpline service—but frankly the reforms go neither far nor fast enough.

Citizens Advice agrees with that, as the Paymaster General knows. It explains that even the modest proposed changes could take up to 18 months to implement. That is 18 months of poor information, more bad advice and more inadequate support. It is not acceptable. The Chief Secretary should confirm—I assume by his presence that he is now in charge of tax credit policy—that the Government are going to implement in full the 12 specific recommendations in the parliamentary ombudsman's report. They go much further than the changes announced by the Government and include clearer information about overpayments and additional tax credits, training for staff to recognise cases of hardship, and automatic payment of additional tax credits to overpaid families in receipt of income support.

Will the Chief Secretary also immediately suspend plans to move a further 800,000 of the lowest income families who currently receive their tax credits from Jobcentre Plus to the Treasury's chaotic systems until the problems are resolved? No one else should be subjected to yet more misery and hardship at the hands of this Treasury.

There is a specific recommendation on the recovery of overpayments that is particularly important. The ombudsman says that she does not consider that "the present internal system for determining whether sums should be repaid operates in a fair and transparent manner."

That is why she suggests introducing a statutory test for the recovery of overpayments and a right of appeal to an independent tribunal—in other words, a test that puts the onus on the Revenue to get the awards right in the first place and that is consistent with that which has long been applied to social security benefits, which everyone but the Chancellor of the Exchequer knows are the same as tax credits.

I agree with the ombudsman on that statutory test. It is why it is part of the motion. So does the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) who, with other Labour MPs, has tabled an early-day motion on the subject. Will the Chief Secretary confirm that the Government will introduce that statutory test and whether he is going to implement the other recommendations in the ombudsman's report?

That brings us to the third issue. In the absence of a statutory test, what is the Government's position on reclaiming overpayments? We have finally discovered that, in the first year of operation, the Revenue overpaid an astonishing £1.9 billion to 1.9 million people. When my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) asked the Prime Minister about overpayments, he said:

"the Paymaster General has said already that we will not seek to get the money back if the error is on the part of the Inland Revenue."—[Official Report, 22 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 798.]

That is what the Prime Minister said at the Dispatch Box. In case people think that it might have been a mistake, he repeated it a week later at Prime Minister's questions. That is not consistent with what the Paymaster General is telling us. She says that overpayments caused by errors by the Inland Revenue will only be written off if the claimant could not possibly have spotted the error themselves. Indeed, we are now told—perhaps the Chief Secretary can confirm this—that 98 per cent. of overpaid tax credits have been automatically reclaimed. Is that correct? If it is, it is very different from what the Prime Minister promised people from the Government Dispatch Box.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): It might help the hon. Gentleman if I say that I received a letter from the Prime Minister only yesterday confirming that, although the policy is to write off overpayments where there is an official error, he would like to clarify that this is only where the claimant should have reasonable cause for thinking that they were paid the right amount. In other words, it is not a change of policy but exactly as it was before.

Mr. Osborne: There we go. Perhaps the Prime Minister will be seeking an early opportunity to make that clear to the House. It seems like another battle between No.10 and No.11 that No.10 lost.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman has misquoted my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Osborne: I did not misquote the Prime Minister. If the hon. Gentleman turns to column 798 on 27 June, he can read the Prime Minister's words, which I repeated in full. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will join me in calling on the Prime Minister to explain why he misinformed the House not only on one occasion, but twice.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Can my hon. Friend throw any light on why so many mistakes have been made by the Inland Revenue? Is there a common theme to this litany of error and what steps, if any, have the Government been taking to ensure a higher level of competence?

Mr. Osborne: My hon. Friend, with great prescience, brings me to the last section of my speech. He asks whether there is a common theme. There is a common theme in a number of different ways. For example, there is a common theme with the computer projects that the Government have introduced throughout Whitehall. There is a common theme with the various pet projects that the Chancellor has dipped his fingers into, such as individual learning accounts, stakeholder pensions or pension credit. One of my favourites—it is little known—is the link-up between Cambridge university and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology that the National Audit Office had to crawl all over. I can see that this is all bringing back happy memories for the hon. Member for Normanton.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman says that he is coming towards the end of his speech. I hope that before he resumes his place he will answer one question that poses in a different form questions that have already been asked. No one can say that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not keen to redistribute income. Taxpayers have given up a 5p reduction in the standard rate of tax to finance tax credits. If the hon. Gentleman were Chancellor, would he use the money in exactly the same way or in a different way?

Mr. Osborne: That is an entirely fair question and it is literally a matter to which I am turning. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman, who has a bit more patience than some of his right hon. and hon. Friends, will listen for a second. As he knows, there is a growing body of opinion that says that we need a far-reaching review of the tax credits system. In her review, the ombudsman says that it is rightly a task for Parliament and the Government—not for her—to address the "fundamental question as to whether, for people on modest incomes who have to budget and plan their finances carefully to manage their lives, the inbuilt instability or uncertainty really works."

The chairman of the Inland Revenue, the man charged with administering tax credit, thinks that we need a review. In the Financial Times last week he said:

"if there are real problems in discharging the policy"—

on tax credits—

"... then you'll have to debate what the right policy is."

We know that the Prime Minister would probably support a review. It is an open secret that he has never liked the Chancellor's tax credits. If we read the Westminster Hall debates that have been held on this subject, it is clear that a growing number of Labour Members have called for a review. Even the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), who, I understand, is one of the Chancellor's henchmen, has called for a fundamental, root-and-branch review. All those Members are right. We need that fundamental root-and-branch review. We need to ask whether the current system of annual payments can ever meet the needs of people whose income and circumstances can change week by week. We need to ask whether people on low incomes will ever have the flexibility in their budgets to repay the overpayments that are an inherent part of the current tax credit system.

[Mr. Osborne]

We need to ask whether we should consider moving to a system where payments are fixed for longer and require fewer changes. That is something to which I am attracted, but it is something that should be reviewed before we come to a definite conclusion. We need to ask whether it is right that hard-working families on average incomes are paying taxes to fund means-tested benefits for people earning £66,000 a year. That is something that a review should consider.

Tax credits were designed to tackle child poverty, but as I have said repeatedly, the Institute for Fiscal Studies has shown that their administration has plunged people and their children into poverty. There could hardly be a greater indictment of the Chancellor's policy. Families have been pushed below the poverty line by Government incompetence. Single parents have been forced to rely on Salvation Army food parcels to feed their children. Tens of thousands of people have been driven to despair and hardship.

Ed Balls rose—

Mr. Osborne: With the greatest respect, I am about to finish my speech.

Is that really what we want from a 21st-century welfare system? Is it not time that that the Chancellor and his minions took a long hard look at his cherished tax credits? Is it not time that he had the courage to take the rap for his own mistakes?

4.10 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): I beg to move, leave out from "House" to end and add

"supports the Government's strategy to make work pay and provide financial support to families through tax credits; welcomes the fact that over 6 million families and 10.5 million children are benefiting from tax credits, with first year take-up of around 80 per cent., compared to just 57 per cent. for the Family Credit system inherited by the Government; recognises that far more families than ever before are benefiting from help with childcare costs; notes that tax credits are central to the Government's goal of abolishing child poverty; further notes that tax credits have helped ensure there are 1.5 million fewer children in poverty and have helped 275,000 lone parents into work; recognises the need to balance the demands for a simple system with the need for a system that responds to people's changing circumstances, giving most help to families when they need it most; acknowledges the IT and administrative problems that accompanied the early stages of implementation; and welcomes the measures announced by the Government for improving the administration of the system."

May I echo the entirely appropriate words of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) about the sad events and consequences of the terrorist attack in this great city last week? We have all been moved and impressed by the dignity and resilience of the people who were tragically affected by those events. Our thoughts continue to be with them, and I am grateful to the shadow Chancellor for his words as, I am sure, are all hon. Members.

The shadow Chancellor made two allegations about my right hon. Friends misleading the House, whether inadvertently or otherwise. The accusation that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General misled the House about the stability of the IT system is incorrect. I accept that the shadow Chancellor relied on the ombudsman's report for his assertion, and that he was reporting it to the House. My right hon. Friend, however, did not mislead the House. There has not been a failure of the tax credit computer system since tax credits were introduced in April 2003. The Paymaster General made a statement about the performance of the IT system, its speed and reliability over the previous year. I am happy to confirm that the system has been performing well in terms of speed and availability for that period. There were, of course, well-publicised problems—we will come on to deal with some of them—in the early days when the system did not perform as expected. With a system of this size and complexity, there are occasional glitches, but I am happy to refute the assertion that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General misled the House.

As for the assertion that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister misled the House by saying that overpayments due to error would be written off, that is not the case. Both the Prime Minister and the Chancellor reported accurately the policy that Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs write off overpayments where there is official error. There is, however, a long-standing principle that official error requires both a mistake on the part of the Revenue and reasonable belief on the part of the claimant that they were being paid the right amount. Neither the Prime Minister nor the Chancellor were doing anything other than reporting the long-standing principle.

Mr. Laws: Does the Chief Secretary expect us to take that response seriously? When the Prime Minister was asked in the House whether there would be an amnesty in each and every case where the Treasury was responsible for an overpayment, he said that

"we will not seek to get the money back if the error is on the part of the Inland Revenue."—[Official Report, 22 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 798.]

What does the Chief Secretary think people in the country would have understood by that?

Mr. Browne: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to restate the position. Of course, that was an expression that there would be a write-off if there was official error. He knows—

Mr. George Osborne: An error by an official.

Mr. Browne: Well, an error by an official. I do not want to be pedantic. The hon. Gentleman reads the quote to me and it contains the phrase, "an error by an official". As I understand it, that is otherwise official error, is it not? I think I am right.

Official error has a long-standing definition, which includes a mistake on the part of the Revenue and the claimant reasonably thinking they were being paid the right amount. The qualification is necessary to strike the right balance between fairness to claimants and fairness to taxpayers as a whole. I shall come later to the question of the extent to which the overpayments could or could not have been known to individuals, but it could not possibly be the case that it would not matter to what extent a claimant knew that the error had been made.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): The Chief Secretary's defence of the Prime Minister is based on the proposition that there is a long-standing definition of the concept of official error, which includes the implied terms to which the Chief Secretary refers. If the definition is so long-standing, can the right hon. Gentleman point to any previous example of a Government claiming that in their defence?

Mr. Browne: I am not in a position to do that, but I suspect that, in the context of decisions as to whether or not errors are official errors, these tests are regularly applied. I shall research the matter and if I am in a position to do so, I shall write to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to the Chief Secretary for at least being straight with the House. I give notice that I shall table a question to the right hon. Gentleman and give him the opportunity to set before the House the precedents that he is claiming.

Mr. Browne: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that opportunity, but I have already said that I would do that.

Mr. Laws: I wish to clarify the fact that the words "official error" were not part of the Prime Minister's response. He said that

"we will not seek to get the money back if the error is on the part of the Inland Revenue."—[Official Report, 22 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 798.]

How does the Chief Secretary explain the statement that the Chancellor of the Exchequer made on 23 June to GMTV, when he said:

"Where there's been a mistake by the Inland Revenue and where we are to blame as a Government then we will not take the overpayment"?

There is nothing in that about official error at all.

Mr. Browne: I rest my case on the position as I have explained it to the House. I have made my position clear and I shall follow up with the further research that I have undertaken to conduct. In my remarks to the House this afternoon, I intend to answer each of the points made by the hon. Member for Tatton, the shadow Chancellor, but—

Rob Marris: Perhaps the situation is different in Scotland, but when I practised as a solicitor in England, there was the concept of mistake of law and mistake of fact. If someone was overpaid by some body, part of the test that the court would apply was whether they could reasonably have realised that that overpayment was an overpayment. That has been an inherent part of the English legal system for decades.

Mr. Browne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his contribution to this part of the discussion. I do not think other hon. Members would thank me for continuing it. I have made my position clear. I ought to be able to provide the information that the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) seeks. I will try to do that, to support it. Having practised law in Scotland, I am very familiar with the sort of principles to which my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) refers.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Browne: No, I think I have said enough on the matter. I intend to make some progress with my speech.

As I said, I intend to answer each of the points made by the hon. Member for Tatton, but I find it extraordinary that in the speech that we have just heard, there was barely any mention of the benefits that the Government's system of tax credits is bringing to millions of hard-working families right across Britain. Even when the shadow Chancellor was given the opportunity to comment on what is now accepted in relation to child poverty, he could not bring himself to concede that that progress had been made.

Six million families now benefit from tax credits. As a result, 10.5 million of the nation's 13 million children now receive more generous support—that is 10,000 families on average in each of my right hon. and hon. Friends' constituencies; indeed, in each right hon. and hon. Member's constituency. The shadow Chancellor is no doubt armed with figures from my constituency, as from everybody else's, about the number of overpayments or underpayments that may have been made, but the fact is that on average, across the United Kingdom, 10,000 families in each of our constituencies are benefiting from this policy.

In the first year of the new system, take-up of tax credits was around 80 per cent., compared with just 57 per cent. for the family credit system that we inherited when we came to power in 1997.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: As my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) pointed out, in many constituencies up to half of all claims are calculated wrongly and underpaid or overpaid. Does the Chief Secretary think that that level of error is acceptable and, if not, what level of error does he think acceptable?

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman anticipates part of the speech that I wish to make. I do not accept that all those calculations are in error, and it should become clear to him, as I develop my remarks, why that is. On a pedantic point, the figure of 50 per cent. as regards the calculations involving overpayment and underpayment is not entirely correct—although it is not far short of correct.

As a result of the Government's strategy to make work pay and to provide financial support for families through tax credits, there are now 1.5 million fewer children in poverty, and 275,000 lone parents have been helped into work. Reforms since 1997 mean that by October this year families with children will, on average, be better off to the tune of £1,400 a year in real terms; and those in the poorest fifth of the population will be, on average, £3,200 a year better off. While it is right that we should debate the effectiveness of the administration of the system—I shall come to the specific points made by the shadow Chancellor in due course—the extent to which hard-working families have benefited from credits and the contribution that credits have made to tackling poverty is the proper context in which today's debate should be seen.

Before I deal with administration, I want to remind the House why we introduced the tax credits system and what it replaced. The family credit system that we inherited had several problems, as identified in the 1998 report on work incentives by Martin Taylor. In particular, four areas gave us considerable concern: first, it acted as a disincentive to finding work; secondly, it was an insufficiently generous award; thirdly, it was fundamentally inflexible and unable to take into account changes in circumstances; and fourthly, it gave too little assistance with the costs of child care provision.

I might point out that the Liberal Democrats accepted that analysis at the time, and it was further supported by their then spokesman, the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb).

Mr. Laws: I presume that the right hon. Gentleman is going to describe the whole series of amendments that my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) tabled, including on having a statutory test and dealing with the problem of overpayments.

Mr. Browne: I have no such intention, because most of those amendments were withdrawn after debate and explanation of the way in which the system would work, and after the hon. Member for Northavon had expressed satisfaction with those explanations.

At some stage, it might be useful to hear from the Liberal Democrats why they changed their minds on the analysis of the support that working families need, as reflected in their recent manifesto. It will be interesting to hear the reason for that change of heart.

We introduced the working families tax credit six years ago to deal with some of the issues that the Taylor report—and, indeed, the Liberal Democrats—raised. That was the start of the necessary process of reform. We tried to ensure that work paid more than being on benefits, that take-up increased and that we gave proper support for child care costs. Today, the child tax credit and the working tax credit continue that approach and deliver the desired outcomes more effectively.

The credits also offer the chance of paying the child tax credit directly to the main carer, mainly the mother. For the first time, tax credits can be adjusted to reflect changes in the number of children in the family, working hours, child care costs or family income. That means that we can provide the greatest support to families who need it most when they need it most.

We need to acknowledge the value of tax credits and the help that they provide in people's everyday lives. Today's system replaces an inflexible and unfair approach that did little to incentivise people into work and little, if anything, to lift children out of poverty.

Despite the criticisms, support for the approach came not only from the Liberal Democrats but from the recent Citizens Advice report. Part of our disadvantage as Members of Parliament is that when we refer to such substantial documents, we cannot all read them, and they are capable of supporting different views. The first paragraph of the Citizens Advice report states:

"We firmly support tax credits as a vehicle for directing substantial extra money towards lower income families."

The Government share the organisation's ambition for the system to work effectively for all who are entitled to extra help.

Let me read part of the foreword to the health service ombudsman's report, to which the shadow Chancellor referred so freely. The third sentence of the foreword states:

"This report does not suggest that the new tax credit system is in general disarray; on the contrary it recognises that, given the scale of the undertaking, its introduction has been broadly successful".

Hon. Members might be surprised that that was the ombudsman's view, given the shadow Chancellor's deployment of selective quotations from her report.

Mr. Laws: I would not want the Chief Secretary to mislead anyone about what Citizens Advice has said. I presume that he has seen its latest briefing note to hon. Members, which states that it is misleading to claim that Citizens Advice was strongly in favour of moving to a more responsive system of tax credits and that it was concerned that overpayments would be made under the new system. Does the Chief Secretary agree?

Mr. Browne: I have not seen the document to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Mr. Laws: It was circulated.

Mr. Browne: It was not circulated to me. I do not know whether that was deliberate or an error.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am reluctant to interrupt the proceedings. However, although I appreciate that, so far, the word "misleading" has been used for documents, I ask hon. Members to be careful about using the term when it relates to an hon. Member. I am just firing a warning shot at this stage.

Mr. Browne: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) asked me whether I agreed that the quotation that he read out from a document from Citizens Advice that I have not seen was correct. I have no way of knowing, but I trust him, and I do not think that he would read it incorrectly. So I accept that he has read it correctly, if that is the answer that he is seeking from me. He has achieved what he was seeking to achieve.

Ed Balls: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, far from misleading the House, the shadow Chancellor made very clear his unwillingness to commit the Conservatives either to halving child poverty by the end of the decade or to continuing with the tax credit system in order to achieve that? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government remain committed to halving child poverty by the end of the decade and to maintaining the tax credit system as the best way to achieve that?

Mr. Browne: I have no difficulty in agreeing with my hon. Friend on that. As he knows, that is the mainstay of our social policy. I shall explain in a moment why it is significant that the shadow Chancellor is unprepared to commit himself or his party to that objective, which might help us to understand why he is so critical of the system.

The House will be pleased to know that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has recently had meetings with the authors of the reports that I have just quoted, namely, the office of the ombudsman and Citizens Advice. She has also had a meeting with the adjudicator who also prepared a report. They all reiterated their support for our policy of supporting working families and children through the tax credit system.

In an economy in which people move between jobs more often, and in which their circumstances change more quickly, our challenge is to adjust child tax credits to respond to changing income patterns as quickly as possible. I should like to put that challenge into context. Three million people shift jobs each year in the United Kingdom labour market, and their income changes are often substantial. In addition, some 700,000 children are born each year, each of whom receives a rate of tax credit in accordance with their individual family circumstances. This fast-moving environment requires a balance between flexibility and certainty, while avoiding undue complexity and information overload.

That is why one of the decisions that we took at the outset—after consultation, I might say—was to set a disregard for increased income up to £2,500. Claimants do not have to tell Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs if their income rises in one year by less than £2,500 and, importantly, if their award is not affected by such a change. This allows a cushion, provides incentives and spares people who see some changes in income unnecessary paperwork. It has been suggested—I think that the hon. Member for Yeovil has encouraged the suggestion—that the disregard represents a written off overpayment. That is a bit like describing the personal tax allowance as a failure to collect income tax. It is simply not the case.

Our families need flexible support such as this to help with the demands of the modern globalised labour market. Tax credits have made a real contribution to halving child poverty by 2010, and to the successful performance of our labour markets, which are the envy of the world. Because of this contribution, those who criticise tax credits need to make clear whether they actually support the stated policy. They must make a choice between a less responsive system that cannot respond to changes in income—which admittedly would be easier to run—or the current approach, which can respond but generates greater complexity.

We still do not know whether the Opposition are supportive of working through those challenges, or whether they share our aim to lift more children—indeed, all children—out of poverty through the use of tax credits, among other things. We do not know whether they will continue to refuse to face up to the difficult decisions required to achieve that aim, or whether that is their aim at all. It is really quite simple. If they believe that the idea of tax credits is wrong, they should say so. We could then debate the positive and negative impacts of that policy along appropriate lines. If they think that tax credits are right, our purpose today should be to work constructively to improve their administration, not to undermine a programme that has benefited many people, and particularly many children.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Much of the debate so far has focused on the incidence and consequences of overpayments. We should not, however, neglect the issue of underpayments. Given that in the hundreds of thousands of such cases there has necessarily been an increase in hardship and indebtedness, will the Chief Secretary confirm that in each and every case, when people get their due, the payment of commercial interest on top will be included as a minimum and, better still, the payment of a substantial sum in compensation for distress and anxiety caused?

Mr. Browne: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that undertaking, although I accept entirely why he should ask for it and think that that payment should be made to those who have been underpaid. Underpayments are much rarer than overpayments, however. People are much more likely to report changes in circumstances that they think will result in an increase in their tax credit than it appears that they are to do the opposite. That is why the retrospective balancing needs to be done at the end of the year. My information is that the system reacts quickly to such claims of changes in income circumstances, and that there is no necessity for us to build into it a system of compensation when the Revenue already has a compensation mechanism that can be triggered as appropriate.

John Bercow: I shall have a second stab at a different aspect of the issue. The Chief Secretary had a spat earlier with my hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor and the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) on the issue of the responsibility of the claimant to know if he or she was being overpaid. Does he agree, as he is part of the architect team for the policy, that there is a difference between someone who, by computer error, finds that he is paid £20,000 for the year rather than £2,000, and someone who is paid perhaps a few hundred pounds more? Does not he accept that it is not the responsibility of the citizen to be able to work out the complex minutiae of what goes on in the Chancellor's mind?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Before the right hon. Gentleman answers, may I say to the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) that I live in hope that his stabs will become progressively shorter?

Mr. Browne: We would all be the less entertained were that the case, but that might be an objective that the hon. Gentleman would seek to achieve. The fact is that he makes an important point. I accept entirely that we ought to share an objective in terms of the administration of the system achieving his desired outcome. I will come in due course to the implementation of the proposals made by my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General on 26 May. There is a recognition that communication between the Tax Credit Office and the claimant is important, and we are taking steps to improve that. I accept that there are circumstances in which the onus ought to fall more on the Tax Credit Office than on the individual, but since the likelihood of underpayment more probably arises from a reduction in a person's income, that information is more likely to be known to the claimant than to the Tax Credit Office, and the onus ought to rest firmly on the claimant to report that change of circumstance. I am sure that he understands that this is not a straightforward matter, and that it is yet another one of the complexities that flexibility generates. We need to get to grips with those complexities if we are agreed—as I suspect that he might be—that flexibility in the system is important.

Mr. George Osborne: This is an opportune moment to ask the Chief Secretary about the statutory test, which we have called for, which is in the parliamentary ombudsman's report, and about which the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) has tabled an early-day motion. Such a test would help to establish on what grounds money should be reclaimed when there has been an overpayment. Will he give us a clear answer now as to whether the Government will introduce a statutory test?

Mr. Browne: On the basis of our current advice, we have no intention of introducing a statutory test. If the hon. Gentleman will be patient, I shall deal with the question of appeals and how we handle overpayments in due course.

As I was saying, the problem is that we simply do not know the Conservative party's true position. More people than ever before are receiving tax credits to help with the costs of bringing up their children, but the Conservatives cannot bring themselves to support that.

The proportion of workless households with children had fallen from just over 16 per cent. in the spring of 1997 to a little over 13 per cent. by the autumn of 2004, and the lone parent employment rate rose from a little over 45 per cent. in 1997 to nearly 56 per cent. in 2004. Tax credits have played their role in helping parents move into work. There is clear evidence from respected independent commentators such as, ironically, the Institute for Fiscal Studies that our policies to make work pay have helped to boost the number of lone parents in work and, consequently, to lift a significant number of children out of poverty. How can anyone seriously seek to undermine a policy that contributes to such improvements?

I do not and will not downplay the problems that administrative difficulties have caused many people with their overpayments. On behalf of the Government, the Prime Minister has tendered an apology which I am happy to repeat. I know that this has been a difficult time for some people. The Government are determined that the tax credit system will deliver what it is meant to achieve, because it plays such a significant role in our ambition to lift the children of this country out of poverty and to continue to allow our labour markets to work as they have, to the benefit of our economy.

My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General acknowledged the challenges faced by the tax credit system in her statement to the House on 26 May—before, I should add, the publication of the reports that prompted the Opposition to table their motion. On that occasion, my right hon. Friend focused on six measures to improve the operation of the tax credit system.

First, from April 2006 a much-improved awards notice will be issued, and we will review the information that we give claimants to help them to understand the system better. It is all very well for others to say that that will take time. Of course it will. We are dealing with millions of claimants and, potentially, millions of notices, and it is best to take the time and get the system right. Secondly, from this week we are running pilot schemes, contacting customers and encouraging them to report changes. That is relevant to what was said earlier about proactive engagement with claimants. Thirdly, we intend to improve the service from the helpline. We want to stop people from being passed from one department to another, and to ensure that they are given answers within a reasonable time. Fourthly, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs will speed up its identification of IT system problems, which will mean quicker repairs. Fifthly, we will work more closely with the voluntary sector to give more active support to the most vulnerable claimants. Finally, we will spell out more clearly how we define hardship, and we are testing options for suspension of the recovery of disputed overpayments.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): In the case of one of my constituents, the payment award was correct but was withdrawn. Having contacted the helpline, my constituent was advised to contact the local Member of Parliament. I have heard of that practice anecdotally, and have been told of it by a constituent. Will the Chief Secretary confirm that that was the wrong advice, that the problem should have been resolved, and that the first point of resolution is not contacting the Member of Parliament?

Mr. Browne: I have no difficulty in agreeing that that was not the right advice. A helpline is there to help people, not to refer them to another source of help that, presumably, must then contact the helpline itself. I too am a constituency Member of Parliament.

The distinct advantage in respect of tax credit cases is that calls are recorded. That is a very helpful tool in determining the credibility and reliability of people's recollection of such calls, but it is also a helpful training tool, in that it allows us to identify those working on the helpline who perhaps need further support and training. If the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie)—or any other Members who are tempted to intervene to describe examples of such behaviour—bring to my attention, or to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, the detailed circumstances behind such anecdotes, we can examine whether a particular helpline helper or official is giving proper advice. If they are not, we can then assist them. However, I have no difficulty in agreeing with the hon. Gentleman that the advice that was given was not appropriate in the circumstance that he described.

Mr. George Osborne: I return to an issue about which I twice asked the Paymaster General at Treasury questions. According to the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, some helpline staff and some tax credit staff have advised people to borrow money on credit cards to meet the overpayments. Does the Chief Secretary consider that good advice?

Mr. Browne: No, I do not, and such advice should not be given, but I say to the shadow Chancellor what I said to the hon. Member for Dundee, East—if he brings to my attention the detail of such calls—[Interruption.] With due respect to the shadow Chancellor, the fact that something is in the report means nothing; it does not mean that it happened or that it is anything more than an anecdote. If it did indeed happen, it should not have, but it would help if those who have information supporting such assertions were to make it available. We have the advantage that these calls are recorded, and that the official who dealt with a particular call can therefore be identified. As a result, we can look at the circumstances of the relevant part of the conversation, and determine the advice given and whether it was properly understood by the caller. I am not disputing that the report says what it says; I am simply pointing out that if we are given the details of a particular case, we can chase it up.

Mr. Dorrell: Will the right hon. Gentleman reflect on what he has just said? Surely he cannot be arguing that if the parliamentary ombudsman has examined a particular constituency case and quoted the evidence emerging from his inquiries, he, as a Minister, can ignore such evidence. That cannot be right.

Mr. Browne: I hear what the right hon. Gentleman is saying, and if that is what I said I accept entirely his admonition; I should reflect on it and I will do so. I should point out in my defence that in answering the shadow Chancellor's question, I did not understand him to be saying that this assertion emanated from the ombudsman's report. I do not recall it being in that report; that said, I do not pretend to recollect the report comprehensively. However, if the facts that instruct the right hon. Gentleman's admonition are correct, I accept it and I will deal with it.

Mr. Laws: Will the Chief Secretary give way one last time?

Mr. Browne: Yes, but it will be the last time.

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to the Chief Secretary. Before he winds up his opening speech, can he clarify whether the Treasury accepts the ombudsman's second, very important recommendation, which is that the Revenue should not seek to recover an overpayment until it has decided whether the excess amount should be recovered in accordance with the code of practice? Has a decision been reached on that point?

Mr. Browne: This issue formed part of the discussion between my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General and the authors of the report. I have no difficulty in agreeing with the hon. Gentleman that that proposal should be accepted, and it will be accepted.

All of the proposals put before the House in my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General's statement of 26 May are in hand. I will say, however, that the system has been through only one full cycle. By that, I mean one cycle in which people applied for the credits, were assessed and received them and had their accounts adjusted to reflect current circumstances—in other words, only one cycle in which the flexibility of the system has been fully applied. The essence of the policy means that, across the system as a whole, there will necessarily be an element of overpayment and underpayment. As it is a system of retrospective adjustment, it shows the value of a flexible system.

Let me reassure the House that two thirds of the total overpayment figure is due to rises in family income—rises that the House should welcome as further evidence of labour market improvements and employment opportunities today. Nearly £1 billion of the overpayment—around half—is due to increases in income of more than £10,000 a year. In many such cases, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs were notified not during the year, but at the end of the year for the reconciliation process. Clearly, our next challenge is to ensure that claimants inform us during the year of any changes to their circumstances on that scale. So while this is not a perfect system and we do want to make it work better, it is neither broken nor in chaos, as some commentators and Opposition Members may have claimed.

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): Is the Minister aware that people are frequently phoning the Department and being told to leave it until the end of the year? That is one of the problems. It is an administrative problem and I have considerable evidence of people being told not to supply their information, but to wait until the end of the year so that it can be sorted out then.

Mr. Browne: In some circumstances, that is appropriate advice, but only when the increase comes in underneath the £2,500 disregard; otherwise, it would not be appropriate advice. I say to my hon. Friend as I have said to other hon. Members that if he can bring the details of the individual calls to our attention, we will look into them and ensure that the training for the helpline takes such problems into account.

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): I wonder if I am alone in listening to this debate without knowing which of the ombudsman's 12 recommendations are not being accepted. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) asked a specific question and the Minister said that he accepted that particular recommendation from the ombudsman, so will he tell us which of the recommendations are not being accepted?

Mr. Browne: We have already explained the position on complete write-off and, as I have already told the House, there is an ongoing discussion between the Paymaster General and the authors of the report. My right hon. Friend met Citizens Advice and the ombudsman separately on 5 July to discuss the recent reports. I have already referred to her statement of 26 May and said that the Revenue and Customs were taking matters forward. The Paymaster has agreed to provide a formal response to the ombudsman's recommendations and that will be issued in due course. I am not in a position to provide the House with that information today. However, the matter of complete write-off, which I understood the hon. Member for Yeovil to be raising, has already been explained.

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to the Chief Secretary for giving way again, because I do not want to conduct debate on the basis of an undertaking that proves not to be accurate. Will he confirm again whether the Government have now accepted the ombudsman's second recommendation on page 8 of the report?

Mr. Browne: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, all the ombudsman's recommendations are currently under discussion. In due course—[Interruption.] I thought that I had already indicated to the shadow Chancellor that I was not presently minded to concede the issue.

Mr. Laws: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Browne: I want to make some progress and take the opportunity to announce plans for providing child support through child tax credits for claimants on income support or jobseeker's allowance.

On 22 June, my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General told the House that, following her statement of 21 October 2004, she continued to keep under review the planned migration to child tax credit of those families still receiving support for children through income support and jobseeker's allowance. Since then, she has considered very carefully the reports from the ombudsman and NACAB. She has also considered the views expressed by many hon. Members, for which we are grateful.

I confirm that it remains the Government's firm intention to migrate all income-based support for children into a single, seamless stream of support, delivered through child tax credit. However, after consultation with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has decided that, subject to further review and consideration over coming months, the migration of the remaining families will begin during 2006. That will safeguard continuity of payment, and provide reassurance to that particular vulnerable group. Meanwhile, I again confirm that families will continue to receive the same level of financial support through their benefits as they would have received from child tax credit.

As I have already told the House, nearly 10,000 families in my constituency now benefit from tax credits. Let no one have any doubt: tax credits have brought real progress in delivering key priorities for welfare reform. They direct more help to those who need it most, they respond to significant changes in circumstances and income, and they give fairer results. We acknowledge that there have been administrative problems, but the policy is the right approach, which is aimed at tackling poverty and unemployment and helping out hard-working families.

Tax credits have made a real difference to people. That difference demands the respect of this House, and of Opposition Members.

4.56 pm

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): This important debate has so far not been very enlightening or useful. I hope that the Government's policy on tax credits will be a little clearer at the end of the debate than has been the case over the last 10 minutes. This debate is vital in holding the Government to account in respect of a policy area where there have been serious problems, and also because the administrative problems in the tax credit system have hit people on the lowest incomes in the country—the very people whom the Government's policies are intended to help.

The hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) has been a big contributor in this policy area and many others. Given the problems of the last couple of years, I can quite understand why he would prefer to concentrate on the big picture rather than on the smaller one. He is entitled to raise some of the matters that he has raised, and I shall touch on some of them at the end of my remarks.

The hon. Gentleman and the Chancellor introduced tax credits to help people on low incomes, so they must be worried about the problems that have been created. The book by Robert Peston—in which I believe the hon. Gentleman played a part—contains a passage from an interview with the Chancellor on tax credits. The thrust of the Chancellor's remarks is very similar to what the hon. Gentleman said earlier. The right hon. Gentleman said:

> "I think tax credits have been misunderstood. People have focused on the mechanism, a bureaucratic issue, when it is in the end about citizenship, integrating tax and benefits. In the long term, these will come to be accepted as part of the economic and social framework of the country."

The Chancellor and the hon. Gentleman may well be right, but meanwhile people suffering from the system's endemic problems of overpayment and underpayment turn up at advice centres in every hon. Member's constituency. If the hon. Gentleman intends to give that answer to those who come to see him, I assure him that he will receive pretty short shrift.

Ministers have been aware of the problems for many months, at least, and have made several statements in an attempt to resolve them, and I acknowledge that the Chief Secretary helpfully accepted a lot of interventions. However, he was depressingly unclear about which recommendations in the ombudsman's report have been accepted and which have not. When the Paymaster General winds up, I hope she will give a clear answer to that. In her 22 June statement, she gave the impression that she accepted the ombudsman's report in total. However, when we look at the detail we find that what she actually said was that she accepted the administrative changes proposed by the ombudsman. She did not say that she accepted all the recommendations, and it is of course the non-administrative changes that are the most significant. I thought we were making progress when the Chief Secretary indicated about 10 minutes ago that the Government accepted the ombudsman's second recommendation. I am happy to take an intervention from the right hon. Gentleman if he wants to clarify that point. The recommendation is crucial and touches on whether the recovery mechanism for tax credit is lawful or whether it constitutes maladministration.

The Chief Secretary clearly indicated that the Government would accept the ombudsman's second recommendation not to claw back overpayments until an assessment had been made, under the code of practice, of whether they should be clawed back. Now, under pressure, and with notes flying in various directions, the Chief Secretary has gone back on the commitment he made 10 minutes ago. I think all he was saying was that the Paymaster General visited the ombudsman recently and has indicated that she will publish a response to the ombudsman's report. The ombudsman has told me that she hopes to receive that response shortly. When the Paymaster General winds up the debate, will she confirm that that is the situation and, following the questions from Labour Back Benchers, may we have a clear statement about which of the ombudsman's recommendations have been accepted? The Government do not seem to have clearly accepted recommendations 2, 6, 10 and 11, yet they are the most important ones, so I hope the Paymaster General will make the situation clear.

I want to focus on the administrative problems in the tax credit system first and then to make some more general comments in my conclusion. I began by expressing frustration that Ministers are taking so long to resolve the problem. There is frustration not just among Opposition Members, but among groups such as the citizens advice bureaux, which have a deep commitment to tackling child poverty and poverty in the working population. Before the debate, Citizens Advice published a briefing note, which is a good and powerful critique of the existing problems in the tax credit system. I am sorry that the Chief Secretary has not seen it. I shall certainly make sure that he does so after the debate. I shall read from the beginning of the document, which states:

"To date ... we have not seen clear evidence"— from the Government—

"of an action plan that will deliver the changes we believe are needed".

Citizens Advice picks out three points, and if the Paymaster General can give us any enlightenment about those it would be most welcome. Citizens Advice states:

"There has been no commitment to place an absolute limit on the amount that can be recovered from families who have been overpaid."

We need clarification about that. Citizens Advice continues:

"The position regarding writing off overpayments remains confused"— which has certainly been confirmed by the exchanges in our debate today—

"as the onus remains on individual families to challenge the decision to recover, leaving unknown numbers of people repaying overpaid tax credits which may have resulted from Revenue errors."

That was a problem that the ombudsman thought might mean that the recovery mechanisms were in breach of the law. She made it clear that at the very least she considered that it constituted maladministration, which alone is a serious enough assertion.

The final point about which Citizens Advice was unhappy was this:

"No commitment has been given to introduce a statutory right of appeal to an independent tribunal."

I think we heard confirmation in the exchanges between the Chief Secretary and the shadow Chancellor that the Government would not accept that particular recommendation, but given the uncertainty over the ombudsman's other recommendations, I shall not be surprised if the Paymaster General tells us that she has not actually reached a settled decision on any of the issues and that she intends to publish a letter responding to the ombudsman's report at some unknown stage over the next few weeks. However, if we could have some clarification I should be grateful—[Interruption.] As the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) indicates, I am always willing to give way at any moment on such points.

I said earlier that these issues are important to Members on both sides of the House and, in the debate in Westminster Hall on 7 June, we heard contributions not only from Opposition Members but from the hon. Members for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), for Stroud (Mr. Drew), for Selby (Mr. Grogan), for North Durham (Mr. Jones) and for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd), all of whom were concerned about the impact on their constituents of the problems with the tax credit system. Several of them said that they wanted to see not only administrative changes but fundamental change to the tax credit system of the type that the shadow Chancellor mentioned at the end of his speech.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Gentleman has done the House a service this afternoon by trying to seek clarification from the Government of whether they intend to claw back the overpayments, at least until the Government have decided in principle whether they will abide by the code of practice. The people involved are obviously of meagre financial means and we have all had difficult, harrowing constituency cases with people not knowing whether the overpayments will be clawed back by the Government. The Government owe those people a quick decision, and I hope that the Paymaster General will be able to give a clear and unequivocal statement on the matter when she winds up.

Mr. Laws: I agree with those comments: it is high time that the Minister responded clearly to the ombudsman's report. After all, the contents of that report were no great surprise to anybody who had been closely involved in the tax credit system over the past year. Assuming that the Paymaster General has been taking a close interest in that vital issue, I cannot believe that a single recommendation by the ombudsman will have come as a great surprise to her.

Several hon. Members have already put on record some of the problems with the tax credit system.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): My hon. Friend will know that I raised the issue of tax credits in a Westminster Hall debate on 6 April when many of exactly the same points were raised. Specifically, the point was made that Citizens Advice Scotland believes that the debt that people are getting into as a result of the overpayments is in direct contravention of the policy of the Scottish Executive—so much so that Citizens Advice Scotland has had to issue a leaflet on the subject. Real hardship has been caused, and that is what we wish to address.

Mr. Laws: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's comments. It is precisely because this issue is causing so much hardship among those people who most depend on the tax credit system that the Government should take it seriously.

It is worth recapping the problems with the tax credit system, because some Labour Members have sought to draw attention only to the aspects of the system that they think have worked, and are unaware of, or unwilling to acknowledge, the problems experienced. As the shadow Chancellor said, we are talking about almost 1.9 million overpayments and 700,000 underpayments, out of 5.7 million awards. That is an enormous problem rate, especially when it comes to clawing back overpayments and paying out on underpayments. The problem must be endemic to the system, if one third of awards are overpaid.

Some £1.9 billion of taxpayers' money has been overpaid, unintentionally. A further £800 million will automatically not be recovered as a consequence of the £2,500 disregard when incomes rise. The Chief Secretary said that he saw the disregard as the equivalent of the personal income tax allowance, but I profoundly disagree with that statement. The personal income tax allowance is the amount that the Government set so that people do not pay tax on the initial amount of their income. The £2,500 disregard is designed purely to reduce the extent of the problem of endemic overpayment in such systems, which was seen in Australia years before the UK system was introduced. Of course it would be possible to get rid of most of the overpayments by having a much bigger disregard, of £5,000, £7,500 or £10,000. The Government would be able to say that all the overpayment problems had disappeared, but all that would do is shift the problem from overpayments to the disregard.

Mr. Frank Field: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Australian experience. The Australians not only had a disregard system, but realised that once they were in a hole it was best to stop digging, so they wrote off the overpayments up to 1,000 Australian dollars.

Mr. Laws: The right hon. Gentleman is exactly right and has for many years taken a very close interest in the development of tax credits. He draws attention to the problems in Australia that led to an ombudsman's report there two years ago in which the ombudsman criticised the Australian tax credits system, saying that the system inherently led to a large number of debts, that the debts arising from the scheme were affecting lower-income families, that the debts could be unavoidable and that they seemed to have an unfair retrospective effect. He was also concerned about the manner in which the debts were being recovered. We now find that all those issues are confronting us in the United Kingdom. The Government must have been aware of all those issues when they devised their policy, but they have failed to address all of them with the relatively minor changes to their own policy, such as the disregard.

We have talked about the complications of the system and people's bafflement at trying to understand their awards and entitlements. Thanks to the parliamentary questions that the Treasury has answered—which is unusual on the subject of tax credits—we now know that 65.5 million award notices have been sent out in just two and a quarter years, including 34 million award notices last year alone. All hon. Members will be familiar with the experience of constituents coming to advice centres to describe their problems and reaching into their bags to bring out sheaves of tax credit payment papers. On Saturday, I saw a constituent who had nine separate award notices that had been issued in seven weeks, all with entirely different amounts. That is part of the problem with the system, and it has helped to cause the confusion among individuals who must then anticipate whether or not their award is correct.

As the shadow Chancellor indicated, there has been a big rise in administrative costs. Four hundred staff have been allocated to handle complaints, and 3,200 staff are dealing with the dedicated helplines. There have been 21,600 compensation payments for bad service in the past year alone. The error rate in the system is 21.4 per cent. for the first year that we know of, as against a target of 10 per cent. and an error rate of 10 to 14 per cent. under the old system. Sir Nicholas Montagu, the then head of the Inland Revenue, told the Public Accounts Committee that he was confident that the error rate would be halved from that under the old system. What has happened instead is that it has doubled.

While the Paymaster General seeks to sort out the problems with overpayments, 271,000 people have requested write-offs of overpayments—217,000 in 2004–05—and there have been 54,000 appeals in the first two months of this year alone. It is no wonder the tax credit administrators are struggling given that they must now make 271,000 separate judgments without any proper, statutory system of independent appeal. Although the Government's line on this seems to change from day to day, we have also been told that, so far, only £37 million of the £1.9 billion in overpayments has been written off, but the Treasury cannot tell us how much of the total overpayment has been recovered.

Ed Balls: The hon. Gentleman refers to the difference between the old and new systems in comparing staff numbers, complaints and whatever, but he does not make the point that the take-up rate under the old family credit system was slightly below 60 per cent. and that the take-up rate under the new tax credit system is about 80 per cent. and has exceeded expectations. Does he not agree that, although it is right that we focus on these issues and sort them out, the fact that the take-up rate exceeds expectations shows that the system is working better than the old one and that it is worth sorting out those problems so that it can work better in the future? Unlike the shadow Chancellor, will he tell us whether he supports the continuation of the tax credit system as a way to reduce child poverty?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must learn to hone his interventions.

Mr. Laws: I will take the first of those questions, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman, for whom I have a great deal of respect, still seems to be in denial about the system. Perhaps he has got too close to it. The Liberal Democrats are not trying to suggest that the tax credit system has made no important contributions, both in providing work incentives and in reducing poverty, but this debate is about the hundreds of thousands of people in real poverty whose situation is being massively exacerbated by a systemic failure that the Government must address. I shall come later to how the systemic problem, as well as the short-term administrative problem, may be dealt with.

The situation has brought us to a state of affairs that affects even individuals who have been previously been cheerleaders for the tax credits system. I am thinking of an author who trumpeted tax credits in The Independent on Sunday this week and said that they had been a great success of the Government. However, even that individual, Mr. Prosser, says that the system is now a "bureaucratic mess" and that tax credits do not work well for families on low and middle incomes.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The hon. Gentleman is citing only part of the article. The author also had comments for those who wish to attack the system in principle using the problems with its administration. The article went on to say that the tax credits system was good. The hon. Gentleman should use the whole quote, or not use it at all.

Mr. Laws: I am happy to read out more of the article. I will also be happy to accept the Paymaster General's point if she will accept that the article describes the system as a "bureaucratic mess" and says:

"As a means of helping working families on low and middle incomes, tax credits are not working well."

Regardless of how good she thinks the overall system is, I assure her that it will not help her, or be appreciated by the hundreds of thousands of people throughout the country with problems, if the Government continue to talk about the generality of why the tax credits system is good, but do nothing to sort out the practical problems that people are facing.

Dawn Primarolo: I am happy to confirm again to the House, as I have done repeatedly, that I have never shied away from points made about the failures of the IT system in the early days and the administration. However, although I have continued to press people, including the hon. Gentleman, to separate the improvements to the administration and IT that deliver the system and the principles of the system, he still has not done that. Does he support the eradication of child poverty and accept that the child tax credit contributes significantly to that cause? Will he now separate policy from administration and concentrate on helping us to ensure that the administration works?

Mr. Laws: The right hon. Lady should be careful. She says that she has never understated the problems in the IT systems that affect tax credits, but she had better go back and read the ombudsman's report.

I want to find out how many of the important recommendations made by the ombudsman the Government will accept. Having heard the Chief Secretary's relatively general speech, I hope that the Paymaster General will go into detail about that when she winds up the debate, because that is what people what to hear.

May I start with a couple of less controversial points on which I hope the Paymaster General will be able to offer us some reassurance? Many organisations that are worried about the tax credits chaos have asked for a clearer award notice. They have suggested that the notice should contain clear information about the mechanism for appeals in the case of overpayment. I assume that she can confirm that she will be going ahead with a new award notice for 2006–07, so will she place a copy of the draft award notice in the Library? Will further amendments be made to the award notice in the light of the ombudsman's recommendations?

The Paymaster General will be aware that the eighth and 11th recommendations of the ombudsman indicated that there should be a statutory right of independent appeal in the case of overpayment and that people should understand their appeal rights. That is also suggested in the early-day motion tabled by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). Can we have a clear answer on whether the Government accept the case for a statutory right of independent appeal, or was the Chief Secretary accurate when he said that that had been ruled out?

Can we know whether the letter on overpayments that is sent to our constituents will give advice automatically on the additional tax credit payments that may be made to those people in hardship and on the possibility of interim awards for those in need? That important practical concern was raised by the ombudsman and I am not sure of the Government's response. On the first point in the submission by Citizens Advice, have the Government decided whether there will be a limit on the clawback of overpayments, which causes extreme poverty? What will be the rules and regulations on that?

The Chief Secretary's explanation for the Prime Minister's comments in the House of Commons and for the Chancellor's comments on GMTV was so implausible that I am not interested in detaining the House by taking the argument seriously. What must be placed on the record is that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have on a number of occasions left people with the clear impression that, where there was official error, the overpayments would be written off. They said that in plain and simple terms.

We now have the ludicrous letter from the Prime Minister, which I received yesterday, and the frankly ludicrous statement that the Chief Secretary was given to make. I do not blame him for that, but it is an implausible cover-up of the Government's position. It tries to persuade us that the Government had in mind all the time that, although there could be some write-off of awards, it would only be for those cases in which people could not possibly have worked it out for themselves. That is totally different from what the Prime Minister and the Chancellor said, and exactly the same position that the Inland Revenue has adopted for the past year. There has been no concession.

John Bercow: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that people should have the right to appeal, not only in respect of arguments over the facts of the case and responsibility for error, but in cases in which an excessively harsh timetable for repayment will exacerbate existing poverty?

Mr. Laws: I very much agree. There must be a right of appeal if a recovery causes extreme hardship. Although the Government could do much more to notify people of entitlement to additional tax credits that should prevent that, there should be a backstop that does not rely on the decisions of Inland Revenue officials.

John Thurso: Does my hon. Friend agree that reasonableness is at the heart of the problem? When my constituents bring a case to me, they do not think it reasonable that they should have been able to work out something on a form that they barely understand, whereas the Inland Revenue administrators think that it is unreasonable that everyone should not be able to work out what to put on their form. Should not the Government accept that it is reasonable to stop the clawback for people like my constituents, who find it difficult to understand the form?

Mr. Laws: My hon. Friend is right. Having seen probably 250 cases of tax credit overpayments in my constituency, I can vouch for the fact that a difficult judgment has to be made in a huge number of cases on whether the individual concerned could have reasonably known that an overpayment was being made. I would not want those decisions to rest solely with Inland Revenue staff with no rights of appeal.

The most important thing for the Government to deal with in responding to the ombudsman's report is the second point in the recommendations on page 8. The Chief Secretary told us that the Government were going to accept it, but appeared to make a U-turn on that shortly afterwards. The recommendation concerns whether the additional mechanism for recovering overpayments is lawful and, even if it is, whether it constitutes maladministration.

The QC who has advised the Child Poverty Action Group on this issue has made it clear that he considers the existing practice unlawful. He takes that view for a number of reasons, but particularly because no assessment is made before recovery is begun of whether recovery should go ahead under the code of practice. In other words, the Government recover first and ask questions later. The Paymaster General has written to me on this point to seek to clarify the Government's position. She maintains that the Government's existing position is lawful. That is not persuasive because the first argument that she advances is that the majority of overpayments are correctly repayable. On that basis, she seems to imply that all overpayments should be repayable.

The ombudsman, in one of the overlooked but perhaps most important paragraphs of her report, 5.17, states:

"Whatever the legal position, our view is that a fundamental unfairness arises where recovery . . . takes place to the detriment of a customer before COP 26"— that is code of practice 26—

"has been considered. Effectively, the Revenue has fettered its own discretion by making an initial determination to commence recovery action, before it has considered the full facts of the case. That is maladministration."

That is a biting criticism of the way in which the tax credit system is working. The Paymaster General has been honest enough to admit in her letter to me that "It is rational that we should operate a system that includes a presumption of recovery by means of reducing or stopping further payments while the investigation proceeds."

It is recovery first and investigation later.

The right hon. Lady attempted to tackle that point in earlier debates, including when the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) raised the issue in the debate in Westminster Hall. She was careful in the words that she used. She talked not of investigation first and then recovery, but of notification before recovery. Notification and investigation are very different words and they have different effects. The effect of the Government's existing policy is that someone who has an overpayment through no fault of their own and entirely through the incompetence of the Inland Revenue will have that money reclaimed by the Government. They will then have to try to stop the reclaim. It is clear as well from the Paymaster General that the Treasury's position is not that there will be an automatic stop but that recovery can be suspended while the dispute is resolved. That there can be negotiation puts an entirely different gloss on the Government's policy. It allows the Government to recover tax credit overpayments from people who received those overpayments through no fault of their own. That is a major issue and one that the Paymaster General needs to address today and in her response to the ombudsman's report.

There is also the issue, which was raised by the shadow Chancellor, of whether the existing system is working effectively. The Government owe it to us and to themselves to investigate, two years into a new system, whether the payment mechanisms are sensible, whether they are working effectively and whether the transfer from a system of fixed awards, which we had under the working families tax credit and family credit, should be replaced with the existing backward-looking awards that are constantly changing.

Anybody who has read, as I am sure that the hon. Members for Normanton and for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) have, the Joseph Rowntree Foundation report of 2003 about the tax credit systems in Australia and Canada—Australia has the British system, while Canada has a fixed system—will know that the evidence is not clear about which is the more favourable. The report states:

"There is no evidence of dissatisfaction with the non-responsiveness of the Canadian system."

It continues:

"Is a system with retrospective recollection of overpayments more or less responsive than one that pays from the start according to the previous year's income?"

The report states that the answer to that question is not "self-evident".

Edward Miliband: On a point of detail, the Australian system is not tolerant of changes in people's income, whereas the British system of tax credits allows for a £2,500 rise in income without any money being taken away from people.

Mr. Laws: The hon. Gentleman is digging a large hole for himself. While he is correct that there is a disregard in the UK system, it has not dealt with the problems at all, because one third of awards are still overpaid. In Australia, which does not have the disregard, 39 per cent. of awards are overpaid. Here, it is 33 per cent., so there is not much difference. The Australians have had to continue tampering with their system and changing it with, for example, year-end corrections to deal with those problems. I know that the Government are not going to change their position today, but I urge them at least to investigate the matter and respect the findings of the ombudsman, who said that experience to date

"raises the fundamental issue . . . as to whether a financial support system which includes a degree of inbuilt financial uncertainty can truly meet the needs" of this particularly vulnerable group of families.

Ed Balls: This is the nub of the issue. The hon. Gentleman can make a series of proposals to make the system work better but, by definition, the tax credits system includes overpayment because of the adjustment mechanism. We must consider how we deal with that. It is legitimate for him to say that the limit should not be £2,500 but a higher figure. Perhaps I would agree with that from experience. But does he support the current system of tax credits, or would he scrap it and introduce a different system?

Mr. Laws: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is seeking deliberately to misrepresent my comments. I indicated very clearly that there is a genuine problem with the way in which the tax credits system works and with whether our system is less effective than a system of fixed awards. In Canada, a focus group—something that the Government should favour—has been working with child tax benefit recipients. When those people were asked whether they preferred a fixed or a flexible system, their response was a unanimous and loud negative to the system favoured by our Government.

Edward Miliband rose—

Mr. Laws: I must conclude my speech, I am afraid, or I will try the Deputy Speaker's patience.

The Government should learn from experience. If they are not ready to do so, the new chairman of Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, David Varney, is, because on 5 July the Financial Times reported that he said:

"We haven't had enough experience of the system to make a sensible judgment in terms of annularity; we need to run a few cycles to see how it works . . . If there are real problems in discharging the policy then you'll have to debate what the right policy is."

Dawn Primarolo: David Varney did not say that to the Financial Times. The interview was recorded, and I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) a copy of what David Varney said to the Financial Times and what he said to the editor about the way in which his comments were reported.

Mr. Laws: We would all be delighted to see a transcript of the interview. That would be beneficial. I noticed that a correction has not been published in the Financial Times, a reputable newspaper which, I am sure would correct any mis-statements.

Dawn Primarolo: I will the hon. Gentleman a copy of the letter that was sent for publication as well.

Mr. Laws: We will all be enlightened when we see that letter and look forward to the apology from the Financial Times.

Finally, I am concerned about the confusion among Ministers about the Government's tax credits policy. They and the Treasury are in denial about the problems that they have created. Until they come out of denial, they will not fix the problems that are causing of great deal of concern, discontent and poverty among many people on low incomes across the United Kingdom.

5.34 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I shall make a short contribution and, as best I can, bring some of my constituents into the debate. The figures clearly show that large numbers of people in Birkenhead have been beneficiaries of the new tax credits system, but those who have come to the advice surgery, phoned and written to me all share one characteristic: they are all fairly poor. The question to which the Paymaster General suggested we should address ourselves today is not whether we all subscribe to the abolition of child poverty. Of course we do. The question that I pose, which the Opposition spokesman was not willing to answer, was whether we are spending £15 billion of taxpayers' money every year in the system in the most effective way to deal with child poverty.

Ed Balls rose—

Mr. Field: For goodness' sake. We know that my hon. Friend has a vested interest. I will develop an argument, then I will happily let him in. I have not said anything yet for him to intervene on.

The question is whether the £15 billion is best spent. The question that has already been raised, which we need to address in the debate, is whether the system as it works for the poorest is salvageable, or whether there is something about the fact of being poor that makes it difficult to fit those people into the system. Now that I have set out my first point, I am happy to give way.

Ed Balls: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. On a point of clarification, he said in his opening remarks that we all shared the goal of reducing child poverty. We consistently asked the shadow Chancellor whether he shared our goal of halving child poverty at the end of the decade, and he refused to answer. I fully accept that my right hon. Friend shares that goal, but does he agree that the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) did not?

Mr. Field: It is easy to sign up to the abolition of child poverty. Even though he did not make a clear statement, I would expect the shadow Chancellor to say so. The crucial issue is how we go about tackling child poverty and whether an alternative Chancellor would be prepared to marshal the kind of resources that the present Chancellor has marshalled to tackle child poverty. I question whether we use those resources most effectively, but I do not for a moment doubt the Chancellor's passion to do something about child poverty. Signing up to abolishing it is easy. I wanted, but failed to gain, a commitment from the Opposition that they would commit similar sums to that objective, however they spent it.

Mr. George Osborne: I think that I made it clear that we are all committed to reducing child poverty. On the second point, at the general election, when we produced comprehensive spending plans, we proposed to spend exactly the same as the Government on tax credits. We are entitled to ask whether, in the light of the ombudsman's report, we should review the structure of the tax credits and how they are administered.

Mr. Field: I hope that, before the end of the Parliament, the hon. Gentleman might be more radical than that, but it is early in the Parliament and the Government must know that they face not only a debate tonight, but debates on the system throughout the Parliament. They may be able to command the support of their Back Benchers tonight. I hope that it will not be a different matter—it might be—four years down the track.

The question that we have to address in our conversation with the Government this evening is whether the problems that we have encountered on behalf of our constituents are—the term has already been used—glitches or something structural. I hate the word "glitches". It is somehow cold, efficient, removed. All of us see what a glitch does to many of our constituents living on modest incomes. It is not a glitch; it is almost life and death. I have had families in my constituency who thought that moving them into work would be a godsend. The figures showed that they would be better off, but they found most of the money snatched away, without any explanation or understanding why it was being removed from them. Worse than that, the system is such a treadmill that one cannot get off it: once one has claimed the credit, it has to run for the duration.

One of my constituents comes quickly to mind. There was a mistake over his wife's earnings. His wife then became ill, and he was reduced to an insignificant sum of money on which the whole family had to survive. He could not afford bus fares to get to work and had to walk three miles to and from work every day. But because it was alleged that he had been overpaid, he could not sign off from tax credits and sign on for means-tested jobseeker's allowance as the office claimed that he had the money that took him over the eligibility threshold for the jobseeker's allowance. There was no escape for my constituent until the end of the claim period.

We have to decide whether these are merely glitches that will be ironed out or whether for the very poorest there is something basically wrong with the system.

Dawn Primarolo: I agree with my right hon. Friend. When we are talking about people's lives, the word "glitches" is not appropriate. The central question that he is asking is whether the problem is structural or capable of being corrected, and what in particular needs to be done to answer that question. He is absolutely right. The House needs to concentrate on those points and will need to return to them time and again. I have no objection to that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Front Benchers have taken a massive slice out of this debate. I am anxious to protect the interests of Back Benchers so as to allow them as much of the remaining time as possible.

Mr. Field: I do not want to provoke Front Benchers again, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but my heart sank slightly when the Paymaster General kindly said that we will keep returning to this issue. I hope that she will tell us tonight about the changes that some of us wish for and that the ombudsman's report calls for.

Let us be in no doubt about how important this benefit now is to our poorest constituents. More than a quarter of all claims are made by those on under £13,000 a year, who comprise a third of the difficult cases. The problems—the miscalculations, overpayments, underpayments and automatic clawings back—disproportionately affect the poorest. We have to ask whether it is possible to run a system that operates over a time scale of 52 weeks while matching the needs of our poorest constituents, whose financial needs often change very quickly.

Decades ago, this House debated a tax credits system proposed in a Green Paper by the Heath Government. Those of us in the poverty lobby thought it unworkable, because we had seen from America that one cannot marry a benefit system that operates on a weekly basis and a tax system that is cumulative over 52 weeks of the year. The huge innovation in that proposed tax credits system was to abolish the cumulative nature of individual taxation so that, far from operating over 52 weeks, it would operate on a weekly basis, with last week's income relating to this week's tax credit. The question is whether, unless we are prepared to be that radical in changing the nature of the tax system, we can ever have a system that delivers for our poorest constituents, who can most benefit from the wish that the Chancellor clearly has to abolish child poverty as we know it in our society.

In moving towards that goal, there are three reforms in the ombudsman's report that I most want to hear the Government say that they have embraced. In the previous Parliament, I tabled an amendment to the Finance Bill that would have placed a duty on the Government to issue wage slips to everybody who draws tax credit so that they could understand how it had been computed. For one reason or another, the amendment was not called. If we are to empower our constituents, it is crucial that they know how their tax credit has been worked out so that they can quickly ring up when they think it is wrong.

Secondly, the Government must concede that they should not claw back until our constituents have had the right to dispute whether the clawback is correct. I was worried by the Chief Secretary because, in a moment's hesitation at the Dispatch Box, he muddled that with writing off the wrong payments. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury is one of the Government's heavy hitters. I would normally say that, if we were in difficulties, we would send him out to bat for us. However, as he reflects on the debate, which also reflects the Government's position, he will perhaps realise that he has not previously had a more difficult time on the Floor of the House, trying to defend the tax credit system, than he had today. I appreciate that he does not want to be in that position again. My guess is, therefore, that he will take more than a personal interest in the reforms that the Government propose.

The third reform that we greatly hope that the Paymaster General will outline is an independent system of appeal for occasions when both sides cannot agree on the facts or about whether the rate of clawback is fair.

I refer hon. Members to the last third of the last paragraph of the ombudsman's report. It makes chilling reading for anyone who understands the official code. The ombudsman, in reflecting on what has happened to the poor in the system, asks the fundamental question whether it can work adequately on their behalf. She goes on to say that she, as a mere official, cannot possibly comment or provide a conclusion on whether the system is salvageable, but she continues by saying that it raises the most profound policy issues. That means that her doubts are grave indeed.

I do not doubt that many people in my constituency rejoice that we have tax credits and that the system has worked well for them. However, the sad fact is that it has worked best for those who are richest, not those who are poorest. That is not the Chancellor's aim—I have never doubted his seriousness about tackling child poverty. The Paymaster General should outline tonight the immediate reforms that she can or will propose on the Government's behalf to prevent the lives of our poorest constituents from being smashed as forces beyond their control damage their ability to balance their weekly budgets. We need to know what reforms we may have to lessen that effect.

At some stage, however, we must consider whether the tax credit system, as it is currently formulated, can ever deliver to those who are in the greatest poverty in our society.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Like every other hon. Member, I have experience of many constituents complaining to me about the problems of administration of the tax credit system. I, too, have a constituent in a similar position to that of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws), who has received eight awards in the past nine or so weeks.

I shall be listening carefully to the Paymaster General to hear whether the Government will follow all the parliamentary ombudsman's recommendations. Her response will be the most important part of the debate.

I want to look at tax credits from a slightly different point of view from those of other Members who have spoken this afternoon. I salute the Government's objective of trying to use tax credits to reduce poverty. I use the term "poverty" in general because I am not sure whether the focus on child poverty—to which tax credits are integral, so far as the Government are concerned—is necessarily healthy. In many other European countries, the focus is on family poverty, and such a focus might have something to teach us in relation to the administration of tax credits.

The figures that the Department for Work and Pensions released on 30 March from its study of households on below-average incomes show that child poverty fell in 2003–04 by only 100,000. I say "only" because that was the year in which £2.5 billion was spent on tax credits, and all the analysts expected a much more significant fall in that year. Indeed, the figures show that, after housing costs were taken into account, child poverty remained static.

The figures also show that there was no reduction in the number of poor children living in two-parent or couple families in 2003–04. That is significant because 57 per cent. of children living in poverty live in two-parent families. There are serious and worrying anomalies relating to children living in two-parent or couple families. They make up the biggest cohort of children living in poverty. It is the task of the Government and the Opposition—indeed, of all of us in the House—who are thinking seriously about how to reduce child poverty to ensure that, whatever system we come up with, these perverse unintended consequences are rectified. They are having damaging consequences for our country.

I shall illustrate that point with some specific examples. In 2003–04, a couple family with two children would have needed an income of £262 a week to get out of poverty, whereas for a lone parent with two children that figure would be only £182. Those are after-housing-costs and after-tax figures. To get the income necessary to get out of poverty, a single-earner couple in social housing paying rent of £53 a week would need to earn £336 a week, as opposed to only £86 a week after the implementation of the tax credit system. That is nearly four times as much, and it represents a very wide disparity.

The former senior Inland Revenue officers, Don Draper and Leonard Beighton, have released figures today showing that, for the tax year 2005–06, a couple with two children in social housing on half average earnings paying a weekly rent of £53 would be left £22 below the poverty line, whereas a lone parent family with two children in those circumstances would be left £66 above it. I am delighted that that lone parent family will be £66 above the poverty line, and no part of my proposals would involve taking money from lone parents in any way. I want to make that very clear to the House. Surely, however, that situation must be of concern. Most children who live in poverty—57 per cent. of them—live in couple families, and according to the example that I have just given, they would be £22 below the poverty line. That is before any child support, which is disregarded for tax credit purposes. My concern is that the Government will not achieve their target of halving child poverty by 2010 because of some unintended, but very significant, flaws in the administration of the tax credit system.

Rob Marris: I seem to remember having the great pleasure during the last Parliament of serving with the hon. Gentleman on the Work and Pensions Committee. The Committee produced a report on child poverty on the information then available, and, as I recall, the whole Committee expected the Government to reach their 2010 target. Is the hon. Gentleman now saying that he does not think that that was right, or have I misremembered his signing up to that report?

Andrew Selous: No, the figures that I have just quoted are from the study of households on below-average incomes by the Department for Work and Pensions, which was only released on 30 March this year, after the hon. Gentleman and I had finished our pleasant period of serving on the Select Committee. So these figures were published after our discussions at that time.

The tax credit system desperately needs to be refocused, so as to do more for poor couples in work. I shall give another example. A couple with one earner on an average income of £462 a week and a below-average mortgage, and with children aged two and four, would be left with £223 after tax and housing costs. However, were the couple to split up, they would be left with £369, which is £146 more. If they were living in private rented accommodation, the figures would be accentuated even more.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): I have been listening closely to the hon. Gentleman, and heard him say that he did not want to take any money away from single parents. Will he explain how the extra money would be given to couples to make up the difference?

Andrew Selous: Yes, with pleasure. We have to take into account the system that we have now, but in future, we should rectify the imbalance. That would probably mean adjusting the system, and I would be more interested in the family with children that is £22 below the poverty line than the family with children that is £66 above it, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman would be if such people were his constituents. We need to tweak the system in the future—we do not propose taking money away from anyone now—to create a genuinely level playing field. We would then not discriminate against children because of their family situation. That is the consequence of the present system, and there has not been nearly enough acknowledgment of that fact.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman salutes the Child Poverty Action Group for its work in this area over many years. In its recent document, "Ten Steps to a Society Free of Child Poverty", it says:

> "The focus on benefits for children has been welcomé, but children's benefits do not act in isolation. It is family income which must be considered."

That is the point that I am making. There has not been sufficient recognition of the problems in that area.

There is evidence that the tax credit system is having some perverse unintended consequences for our constituents. John Haskey, formerly of the Office for National Statistics and now a visiting research fellow at Oxford university, estimates that some 2 million men and 2 million women aged between 16 and 59 have a partner living elsewhere, and that there are 1.2 million couples who are living apart together—LATs, as they are known in the new sociological jargon. A quarter of all lone mothers with children have a partner who lives elsewhere. It is those couples who are likely to be discouraged from living together by the operation of the tax credit system, and who could blame them? If they choose to marry or cohabit, they will lose most of their tax credits, which would make many of them worse off, even after the reduced housing costs that would result.

If we are serious about tackling child poverty, particularly among the majority cohort whose parents are in work and living together, we must address these serious issues. I hope that the figures released on 30 March by the Department for Work and Pensions will sound a warning note to the Government, and that they will take them into account when they consider the future design of the tax credit system. We might then have a tax credit system that does not discriminate against any particular family form. That would go a long way towards encouraging family stability, which all of us in the House want to see fostered.

5.59 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): I am delighted to follow my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), who made some important points about the distributional effect of the current structure of benefits operated within the tax credit system. The points that I want to make, however, follow more naturally from those made by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field).

I have a slightly odd personal history on the issue of tax credits. When I was appointed as a fresh-faced Financial Secretary to the Treasury in the 1990s, I was interested in the question of whether some of the principles of tax credits first espoused in the Green Paper published by the Heath Government, to which the right hon. Member for Birkenhead referred, could be excavated. It may be of some interest to the House to know why, as a Treasury Minister who was relatively benignly inclined towards the principle of tax credits, I was dissuaded from that and persuaded that the costs of that system, in terms of excessive bureaucracy and the risks of genuine injustice to poor people, outweighed any potential benefits. Those costs are now manifest in our constituents' lives, and they should give us pause for thought now along the lines suggested by the right hon. Gentleman.

The right hon. Gentleman is surely right: there is no disagreement about the core objectives of policy in this field. Despite what the hon. Members for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) and for Normanton (Ed Balls) might want to be the case, of course Members in all parts of the House want to see poverty eliminated and the system of benefits that we use to do that reconciled as far as is possible with the preservation of incentives for people in work. Those were the two principles that the Chancellor espoused as the primary policy drivers for the introduction of his tax credit system. Indeed, the Chancellor and his acolytes sometimes like to talk as though they were the first people in history ever to be interested in the elimination of poverty and the reconciliation of a benefits system with work incentives.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Mr. Dorrell: As the right hon. Member for Birkenhead reminded us, we have been discussing this issue for 40 years. He referred to tax credits, but he might also have referred to a book that Daniel Moynihan wrote at around the same time on the introduction of a negative income tax. These are not new ideas. What is new is that the Chancellor concluded that all the difficulties identified by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead and anyone else who had taken a serious interest in the issue throughout the period could at best be wished away and at worst overridden by mere expression of political will. The Chancellor and his acolytes made the mistake of fundamentally underestimating the complexity and difficulties inherent in the policy that they were determined to espouse.

David Taylor: The right hon. Gentleman said almost in passing that of course we all want to get rid of poverty. However, poverty is, by definition, a relative, statistical concept. Will he confirm to the House that in fact he was a Minister in a Government who positively moved away from trying to have a more equitable distribution of income and wealth, and who positively espoused the trickle-down theory that tackled neither of those problems?

Mr. Dorrell: What I will confirm to the House is that I was a supporter and member of a Government who saw huge improvements in living standards across the community and in the working of the labour market. The hon. Gentleman might prefer to see his Government reverse that but as he knows, his right hon. Friends refuse to do so because they know that the labour market changes that we introduced have delivered improving living standards across the piece. He is right that poverty as measured is a relative concept, which is why it is a more accurate definition of policy objectives, in my view, to espouse the raising of living standards across the piece, providing to every section of the community better access to opportunity to improve their living standards. The problem with the tax credit system that we are debating today is that it has not reconciled the dangers associated with excessive complexity and bureaucracy with the delivery of other public policy objectives.

Why was I persuaded, as a fresh-faced Financial Secretary, that the system was not worth the candle? First, as has been pointed out several times previously, it is simply a fallacy to consider the benefit system and the tax system and to say that they are both to some extent means-related and that they can therefore be merged into the same system. That is the approach that the Chancellor has taken—to imagine that because the Inland Revenue in its old incarnation made an assessment of means, and because the Department for Work and Pensions made an assessment of means, we could somehow merge the two systems into a single tax and benefit system. As the right hon. Member for Birkenhead said, that view overlooks the obvious but fundamental point that the tax system is based on an annual assessment of means, whereas the benefit system, if it is to provide secure income to the benefit recipient, must be based on a much more short-term assessment of the needs of the individual.

As for all the arguments that we have heard elucidated today about the difficulties—and moreover the injustices—associated with reclaiming overpayment of tax credits, those difficulties arise because the system now seeks to reconcile retrospectively a means-tested benefit system back into the previous tax year. That mismatch between the two systems ultimately led earlier policymakers to conclude that we should not go down that route, and still leads me to believe that the Government might ultimately have to conclude that their system must be fundamentally rewritten. I say that as someone who does not think that we should change the rules of such systems every six months, which in itself leads to further complexity and injustice.

If Ministers really believe that one more heave will deliver a sufficient improvement in the operation of the system to address all its difficulties, they are entitled to a hearing. But as one who considered it in the past, and who has seen too many of the predictions that were then used to dissuade me from that course come true, I allow myself a certain scepticism as to whether one more heave will in truth be enough to eliminate all those difficulties.

There is one other aspect, on which we have not touched today, that has made the system even more complex than it probably otherwise needed to be: the Chancellor's view—with which, again, I have some sympathy—that some of the combined effect of the tax system and benefit withdrawal led to sharp work disincentives as people saw their benefits being withdrawn. The background papers at the time that the tax credit system was introduced referred to the withdrawal ratio for family credit of 70 per cent.—for every £10 of extra earnings that the family secured, £7 was lost in family credit withdrawn—and the Chancellor sought to reduce that rate of tax and benefit withdrawal. There is a tension there, too, however, as whenever one tries to reduce the rate of taper, one extends further up the income scale and includes more families in precisely the problem that one seeks to control. Not only has the system been made much more complex by the merging of the tax and benefit systems, but the reach of the system has been extended further up the income scale, so that more families are affected than were affected by the previous benefit structure. If we stand back, we see that the system is inherently complex, regardless of the set of rules that we operate. We have voluntarily made it more complex by mixing an annual cycle with a much more short-term means-assessment cycle, and we have increased the number of people affected by extending it further up the income scale.

Let us step back from the big picture. We then see that the complexities created by that system have caused real injustice, and real concern and worry, to individual citizens on low incomes, who now fill our surgeries. At this point, I ask myself whether the price paid by those people for the system that the Chancellor has willed on us is a price worth paying.

I do not believe that the problems we see in our surgeries result from inadequate computer programming or inadequate training of clerical staff. To believe that would be to make scapegoats of people who have been given an impossible task. The real issue is that policy makers at the highest level have been presented with choices and have made the wrong call. The people paying the price for that wrong call are the people in our surgeries who are worried sick, literally in some cases, by their inability to understand how to dig themselves out of the hole into which those policy makers have put them.

6.12 pm

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell). He is of course a distinguished Member of Parliament. He was also a distinguished Treasury Minister, and was, I believe, one of the Ministers in the last Government who did care about poverty issues. I therefore think that we should take what he says seriously. It is also a pleasure to speak in the same debate as my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who, as we all know, has a very distinguished record on tackling poverty both in the House and outside.

It would have been good if the start of the debate had featured a recognition by both sides of the context in which we are discussing tax credit administration: a context in which, under the Government of whom the right hon. Member for Charnwood was a part, child poverty increased from about 1 million to 4 million. I know that the right hon. Gentleman cared about child poverty, but it increased none the less, by 3 million. Many people were in dire need, but nothing was done. Since 1997 child poverty has fallen, by about 1 million. That is not a bad record: child poverty has fallen, after trebling under the last Government.

Of course it is right to acknowledge that there are problems in the system, and my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has acknowledged that. I think that we need to ask five questions. Does the system tackle poverty? Does it encourage people to work? Is it properly taken up? Is it well targeted? Does it take the stigma away from claimants? I believe that those questions are relevant to a discussion of poverty and the means of tackling it.

I have already drawn attention to the impact of working families tax credit and its successors on the tackling of poverty. I am now speaking for the people who have had bad experiences with the tax credit system, but also for the people receiving tax credits—8,000 in my constituency—many of whom told me during the general election campaign that tax credits had had a huge and positive effect on their lives. If other Members are honest, they will say that their constituencies also contain such people. It would obviously be wrong to deny that there are people who face problems, but it would be equally wrong to deny that the lives of many others have been transformed by tax credits. Members need not take my word for it; they need only read the ombudsman's report. She said that the undertaking had been "broadly successful", and—this is on page 56—

"for the majority of the Revenue's six million or so tax credits customers, the system appears to have worked well."

Andrew Selous: May I tempt the hon. Gentleman to add a sixth question to the five that he quite properly raised earlier? It is the question that I posed in my speech. Is it right to operate a system that constitutes a huge financial disincentive for people who want to live together? They are penalised significantly if they do so, week by week.

Edward Miliband: I do not believe that people marry, stay together or do not stay together on the basis of how the system works, but the hon. Gentleman made a well-informed speech, to which I am sure the Paymaster General and others paid attention. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor): if the hon. Gentleman wants to give those with partners a greater incentive, he must find the money from somewhere.

Let me return to my five questions. I think that the system has worked well in tackling poverty. Obviously there have been significant problems, to which the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) drew attention. My second question was "Does the system encourage people to work?" I think that it has done that, and indeed the figures are there for all to see. We have seen 2 million jobs created, and we have seen the rate of single-parent employment rise.

I know that the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) favours a fixed system of tax credit awards, but that creates its own injustices. I do not think that the argument about a fixed versus a responsive system is particularly ideological. However, under an annual system basing awards on the previous year's income, those whose incomes had fallen for whatever reason would not be told "We will give you and your family more money." They would be told "We are sorry, but there is nothing we can do. You are stuck with the award based on last year's income." As the Paymaster General has said a number of times in the House, we can have a responsive system—a system that responds to changes in people's circumstances—or a fixed system.

Mr. Laws: Is it so obvious to the hon. Gentleman—and if so, why—that the system chosen by the Government is superior to a fixed system? Would it not make sense for the Government to review the evidence of the last two years to establish whether a fixed system could be better?

Edward Miliband: Time will tell, but I am still convinced that a responsive system is better, and I shall explain why shortly.

My third question concerned take-up. I am surprised that so few Members mentioned it. Take-up of family credit in the first year was 57 per cent.; take-up in the first year of this system was 80 per cent., which is pretty good going for a means-tested, income-related benefit. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead would know better than I, but I should have thought that it was unprecedented. Six million families and 10 million children have been helped.

One reason for that is the fact that the system is non-stigmatising: it is part of the overall tax system. There is a significant prize to be gained from not having a system aimed at the poor, providing an income top-up for the bottom third of the population or even fewer people. Under such a system, even those who are working must go to the social security office if they are to have a living income.

My fourth question was, "Is the system well targeted?" Members have mentioned how high up the income scale the tax credit system goes. In fact, 40 per cent. of the benefit goes to the bottom 20 per cent. of families, so it is a reasonably well-targeted system. The shadow Chancellor referred to people on £66,000 a year, but the people at the very top do not get very much money out of the system—if they bother to apply. They get the equivalent of the old children's tax credit, which is a maximum of £10 a week. The system is about lower and middle-income families. It is true that it is not for the small minority—I am rather in favour of the fact that these credits go to a larger proportion of the population—but no one can deny that this is a well-targeted system.

My fifth question was, is the system de-stigmatising? For many years, we have had all kinds of social security benefits, but huge stigma has attached to them. We sometimes witness the same problem with the pension credit, which is in fact a social security benefit. Some elderly people say, "I'm not sure about claiming it because I do not want to have to claim benefits." People do not say the same about tax credits, so in that regard we have made a huge advance. In fact, in some ways it is a revolution. We have removed the division between the deserving and the undeserving poor: we have changed a system that required "deserving" taxpayers to pay for "undeserving" benefit recipients. In fact, doing so was the motivation behind the scrutiny of the system that took place in the 1970s.

I am surprised that this achievement has not been more greatly acknowledged during this debate. I do not want to live in a country in which people feel guilty about claiming a top-up for working. We could have introduced the minimum wage at the level to which tax credits raise people's income, but as Conservative Members would doubtless have pointed out, doing so would destroy jobs. Indeed, I find myself in a slightly ironic position. I nipped out earlier to have the pleasure of being involved in my first statutory instrument debate, which was on the national minimum wage. What did I hear in the Committee Room Upstairs? I heard great plaudits for the national minimum wage and for tax credits; indeed, there was a progressive consensus throughout the Committee on the role of both. However, I returned to this Chamber to hear diatribes from the Opposition against tax credits.

The tax credit system answers my five questions and works well. There are significant administrative and other problems, and we should of course apologise—as the Paymaster General has—for the hurt and distress that has been caused. But one thing struck me on listening to the shadow Chancellor's contribution. We heard from him a 26-minute diatribe against the tax credit system, and about all manner of cases, for which we have sympathy. At the end, we heard the clarion call not to abolish tax credits, but for a far-reaching review. I, too, am in favour of reviewing the system's working, but there is a very good reason why the shadow Chancellor did not commit to abolishing tax credits at the next election, which he could easily have done, given his diatribe against them. He knows that, fundamentally, the system is popular with the majority of recipients—the majority of recipients in my constituency, for example. That is why he has not committed to abolishing it.

The Government have a responsibility to sort out the problems in the system, but we should all acknowledge the advances that have been made under it. Let us have a rational debate about the way in which it works, but let us please do so in the proper context. This Government have made work pay and tackled poverty—something that was never achieved in 18 years of the previous Conservative Government.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak on an issue with which every Member of this House is doubtless only too familiar. I went to the House of Commons Library to research the tax credits system, and the librarian was most helpful. She tapped into her computer the phrase "tax credits", and the printer started to produce page after page. Suddenly, she screamed, "But it's all gobbledegook!" I have those 25 pages of complete gobbledegook in my hand. Perhaps the explanation is that there was a glitch in the Library's computer system. However, as a new Member I have been told that everything produced by the House of Commons Library is always accurate, so I suspect that the librarian's initial view—that the tax credit system is "all gobbledegook"—might be right. There is one thing, however, of which I am absolutely certain: many of my constituents believe the tax credit system to be complete gobbledegook.

The tax credit system is so confusing and complicated that no one seems to know what they are entitled to. The 2000 Budget stated that an integrated child tax credit would "improve the transparency and administration of income-related payments through the tax and benefit system."

Has transparency and administration improved? It seems to me that the current system, which largely revolves around the highly fluid concept of what is "reasonable", has achieved the exact opposite. Let us consider the forms that claimants must fill in to apply for tax credits. As a chartered accountant, I am not ashamed to say that I find them confusing. I am professionally trained—how on earth is the average person, who relies on the extra income that tax credits generate, meant to understand them? Tax credits are meant to help the most vulnerable in our society. They are meant to encourage people to come off welfare and to go back to work. They are meant to make life just that bit more comfortable for those on low or moderate incomes, yet these are the very people whom the system is penalising by being inefficient, bewildering and incompetent.

I am very grateful to be able to speak about an issue that affects so many of my constituents in Wellingborough and Rushden. I am sure that I am not alone in finding that a good majority of the constituency postbag consists of letters from constituents who need help with, and clarification of, their tax credit payments. Indeed, half those who ask for help at my weekly surgeries ask about this very issue. I was interested to read the Paymaster General's statistics. According to them, between April and December 2004 the Tax Credit Office, Treasury Ministers and members of the Board of Inland Revenue received almost 6,000 letters from MPs who were trying to sort out the many problems that their constituents were experiencing—

Mr. Ian Austin: The hon. Gentleman positions himself as being on the side of the low paid in his constituency, but I recall that he once boasted of paying his employees £1 an hour. Does he think that that was the right thing to do, and does he think that tax credits are designed to help those who are left on such low wages?

Mr. Bone: I will treat that point with the contempt it deserves; no such boast was ever made.

Constituents have problems with tax credit payments, with overpayments, with lack of payments and with no payments at all. In the tax year from April 2003 to March 2004, the Tax Credit Office hotline for MPs took more than 19,000 calls. That is 19,000 calls from MPs alone, who have had to get involved because their constituents have hit a brick wall and cannot get any further by themselves. Thanks to the system's incompetence, this problem is widespread and affects vulnerable families right across the country, so it is no surprise to learn that the two latest reports on tax credits were less than complimentary about this fundamentally flawed system.

Given the tax credit system's very nature, it will always fail the most vulnerable in our society. Because it has so many different elements, it can only confuse and confound those who claim tax credits. Claimants have to estimate their income for the following year, which in itself gives rise to massive complications. But the real problems come when a claimant's circumstances change. Claimants are asked to notify the Tax Credit Office of certain changes within three months, though for other changes notification can wait until the end of the financial year. However, like many elements of this baffling system, precisely what changes need to be declared and when is just not clear.

Many of my constituents who contact me for help have told me that, to be on the safe side, they inform the Tax Credit Office of all changes. One would think that that was very sensible of them, but it is here that the problem starts for thousands of families who are being penalised by the system. Much of my tax credit case work is taken up by constituents who have had their tax credits stopped completely due to overpayments in previous months. In some cases, the Tax Credit Office states that the overpayments will not be recovered as it was an error by that office in the first place. Why, then, did it stop the tax credits completely and why are those credits continuing to be stopped? In almost all the cases that I have dealt with, the claimant informed the Tax Credit Office of changes to their circumstances. In many cases, that office failed to update its records either through computer error or inefficiency, yet it is my constituents, along with many others, that suffer. In fact, according to the latest reports, nearly 2 million families have suffered.

How is a family meant to plan for the future—financially or otherwise—if they never know exactly what is going into the bank account each month? The rules and regulations of tax credits state that people do not need to pay back an overpayment if they reasonably believed that it was a correct statement of what they should have received. However, what is "reasonable"? It is another open-ended, fluid and confusing term, which means all things to all men and penalises the very people that the system is supposed to help. Families often do not know their financial situation from one day to the next and while the correct procedures are not being followed to update the tax credits computer system when changes occur, those families will continue to live in financial limbo.

As for the cost of bureaucracy and waste, the Government, as usual, do not disappoint. The sheer volume of forms, the fact that payments are made through PAYE rather than directly to the claimant and the vulnerability of the system to massive fraud are all costing the taxpayer dearly—about £400 million a year and with nearly 7,500 people working the system.

I would like to finish by giving just one example of how the tax credit system has failed those who need it most. A constituent came to me in desperate need of help—her case comes to the crux of why the system is failing. She was about to be evicted from her council house for being severely behind in her rent and for being unable to keep up her payments on her council tax. It all started when she had to leave work due to illness. She was incorrectly paid working tax credit instead of incapacity benefit. Of course, it turned out that she was being overpaid tax credits and the Revenue asked her to pay the money back. Not only was she not in a financial position to do so, but she was also penalised by the council for receiving tax credits, which counted against her housing and council tax benefit.

After several attempts to contact the Tax Credit Office to advise it that her tax credits must cease, she was still receiving the tax credit payments 14 weeks later. Because she was receiving no other benefits due to the overpayment, that is all that she and her children had to live on. When she rang that office again, she was told that her case was stuck in processing and that she would just have to wait her turn. Unfortunately, hers is not a unique case, but it is wholly unacceptable. The current tax credit system is, by its very nature, inefficient and fundamentally flawed and it penalises the most vulnerable of our society. Two million families have suffered under that system, which relies on staff regularly updating claimants' information and a computer system that properly processes the correct data. At the moment, we have neither. How long will it be before the Government realise that micro-management and bureaucracy do nothing but penalise the most vulnerable people in our society?

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): Looking back on the debate, one realises that this really is a case of the road to hell being paved with good intentions. Back in 1998, when Martin Taylor submitted his report "Work Incentives" after observing the taxation and benefit system, he said:

"there is no reason why both systems should not contribute to the same objectives, providing the means to improve work incentives and relieve poverty."

The difficulty in reality is that IT systems are never easy. The truth is that the Government's record on them does not inspire confidence. The Child Support Agency's computer system, which cost nearly £500 million, failed, leading to the resignation of the chief executive. Staff at the Department for Work and Pensions were unable to process new benefits and pension claims for several days because the system went down. The computer systems of the Passport Service, the Criminal Records Bureau and National Air Traffic Services have also had problems. And so we go on.

In November, the National Audit Office, commenting critically on IT problems, cited inter alia a lack of clear senior management and ministerial ownership and leadership. That has certainly been the case in this instance. The Paymaster General told the House on 7 February:

"The IT support for New Tax Credits is a major new system. The system has been stable and performing very well in terms of availability and speed for well over a year."—[Official Report, 7 February 2005; Vol. 430, c. 1245W.]

That is in contrast to what Steve Lamey, the chief information officer at Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, said:

"If I were an information technology historian, I would simply love it."

With the introduction of this hugely complex system, warning bells should have been sounded a little earlier, before the problems we continue to hear about emerged.

We hear that of the Inland Revenue's 90 million letters sent out each year, 35 per cent. are returned and 31 million are wrongly addressed—and 29 per cent. of PAYE codings are incorrect. The mood music is clear. Even the Labour thinkers Anthony Giddens and Patrick Diamond have spoken about a "complicated means testing infrastructure" in respect of tax credits.

I would point out to the Paymaster General that the years between 1999 and 2003 saw enormous changes in the benefits system. At one point, we had the introduction of the working families tax credit, the disabled person's tax credit and the child care tax credit—and later we had the abolition of the working families tax credit, the disabled person's tax credit, the children's tax credit, the baby tax credit and the employment credit. The former shadow Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), observed:

"So, since October 1999, the Government will have introduced five new tax credits for families, scrapped four of them and then introduced two new ones. That averages out at a new tax credit for families every six months."

Where has all that landed us? As a press release relating to a Citizens Advice service report graphically expressed it:

"In the most extreme cases, CAB clients have been threatened with repossession or eviction. Some have had to give up work because they are unable to pay for child care. CAB advisers have had to arrange Salvation Army food parcels for families left without enough money to eat. Tax credits staff have even told some families they must take out high-cost loans to repay overpayments . . . CAB advisers have found it impossible to resolve even simple problems, because tax credit IT systems have left helpline advisers unable to provide accurate information, and because letters have gone unanswered, sometimes for moths."

What we have seen is simply grotesque—incidents of hardship, anxiety and bureaucratic incompetence on an unprecedented scale. It is ludicrous to describe the reality using terms such as "stable" and "performing well". We know that the Government are trying to recoup £1.9 billion for 2003–04, and that they will not pursue a further £800 million from recipients who fall within the 2005 disregard.

How will that be dealt with in the Government accounts? That is an interesting question, and I have discovered the answer. The Public Accounts Committee reported:

"If the Department for Work and Pensions paid out benefits corresponding to tax credits in the traditional way, they would have to seek Parliamentary approval for over-payments of £500 to £700 million a year. As these tax credit overpayments are netted off against tax collected within the Inland Revenue's accounts they are not subject to the same reporting and accountability to Parliament as voted funds."

So for these massive sums of money, full parliamentary reporting and scrutiny are not available. More light should have been shed on this very murky issue.

I am very disappointed that the Chief Secretary is not present to hear the end of the debate. I do not know where he is: he is always very courteous in the House, but it was extraordinary that, like the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he has failed to offer any apology for the grotesque misfortune that has befallen many thousands of the most vulnerable people in the country. The right hon. Gentleman gave a bloodless and technocratic performance.

The Chief Secretary was very unclear about the statutory test for the recovery of excess payments, which he rejected. To answer his challenge, I can say that the Opposition accept the global amount for the provisions of tax credits, but we need clear answers to many questions. The Chief Secretary did not give them, and I hope that the Paymaster General will take this opportunity to do so.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) said that Ministers were taking a long time to resolve the tax credit problem. He rightly noted that no real action plan exists, and mentioned the exhortations from Citizens Advice. He also talked about error rates and the amount of bureaucracy, and I agree with him that we need very clear answers from the Paymaster General on these matters.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman has cited the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), who said that most of all he wanted an end to the ludicrous tax credit system that the Chancellor introduced, which he called a failed idea from the 1970s. Earlier, the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) seemed to cite approvingly a report from the Institute for Fiscal Studies that suggested that the tax credit system had led to more rather than less poverty. Do the Opposition intend to abolish the system or not?

Mr. Spring: My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) made the position very clear. Given the huge bureaucracy and costs of the tax credit system, and the huge suffering that it has caused, we need a full-blown review of its operation. All hon. Members should be committed to that, and I refer the hon. Gentleman to the ombudsman's report in that respect.

The right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) was right to say that the question is not whether we dislike child poverty or want to deal with it, but how we resolve it. Of course, we are all committed to abolishing child poverty, and the right hon. Gentleman listed three clear reforms that need to be introduced. He asked that the Paymaster General respond to his suggestions, and I hope she will.

My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) made a very well informed speech. He said that the operation of the system contained imbalances that discriminate against families, and that there was insufficient recognition of that. That is an important point, and it could be part of a review of the whole system.

[Mr. Spring]

It is always refreshing to hear from my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who has considerable ministerial experience, and who rightly said that the Chancellor and those closest to him underestimated enormously the policy difficulties involved in a change of this sort, with all the attendant consequences. He asked whether the price was worth paying.

The hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) posed five questions. He rightly said that any system that imposes a stigma on people is unacceptable. His questions were listened to with respect, but he must appreciate that the system is failing in a monumental way. It is the responsibility of the Opposition and other hon. Members to hold the Government to account. We have to find a way forward. Although the hon. Gentleman cited the system's objectives, I do not believe that he can be remotely satisfied with the way it is working out in practice.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) made an excellent and very practical speech, in which he spoke about the problems that people brought to his surgery. He brought a sense of reality to the debate, and set out the terrible fact that families in this country have no idea what their income is going to be.

The parliamentary ombudsman has criticised the application of the system, the customer interface and the IT equipment. The Government must take that on board, but they must also recognise that they have been caught between creating chaos and misery on the one hand, and spending vast sums of taxpayers' money on the other.

I can only echo what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton and many others. There has to be a proper and comprehensive review of the system, to bring order to the problem and to ensure that it never happens again on any comparable scale. It is reported that the head of the HMRC has said that it would cost £5 billion to revamp the system, and we know that the running costs now total more than £400 million.

The Atkinson review of Government bureaucracy said that the Government were inefficient and that a different system was needed, but no fewer than 3,200 Revenue staff are trying to underpin the tax credits helpline. The Treasury spin machine told The Times this morning that that was due to a massive increase in take-up. That is utterly wrong: it is due to the massive chaos of the system.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is the father of tax credits. He is attending a meeting of ECOFIN, and perhaps he will talk about waste in the EU and about our £3.6 billion rebate. Perhaps he will speak about the lack of transparency in the EU, and about the need to fight oppressive regulation and bureaucracy. However, what would the right hon. Gentleman's credibility be if his fellow Finance Ministers knew that the most recent tax credit overpayments totalled about three quarters of the very rebate he is supposedly so determined to secure? One simply could not write the script.

Finally, whatever criticism one may make of the Paymaster General, she is the one who has defended the tax credits nightmare, both in this Chamber and in Westminster Hall. She has acknowledged the hardships that it has caused, and even the Prime Minister has apologised, but we have yet to hear a word of remorse from the person with departmental oversight of this bureaucratic nightmare. I leave it to the House to make a judgment on that.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): In the few moments left for my reply to this important debate, I want to try to touch on all the major points that Members have raised. I start by making clear that the debate must be set in context. As the Minister, I fully acknowledge the problems with the introduction of the tax credit system and the IT system. I have been open with the House about the problems caused for some claimants and I would never wish anybody to suggest that I underestimate them. I have listened carefully to the points that have been made about the recommendations by the ombudsman, the adjudicator and the CAB and I shall return to them. I shall explain to the House how I propose to take forward those recommendations.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband), I want to start by setting the context. I was interested in what the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) said and, if I may, I will paraphrase him. He said that the Conservatives were very concerned about poverty, but they had been unable to do anything about it and it continued remorselessly to rise under their Administration. When people talk about the misery of poverty, they should consider that context: the rise from 1 million to 4 million in the number of children who fell into poverty under his Government.

The tax credit system assists and supports the poor. It is important to reinforce that point. As my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North suggested, it is a broad-based system. He referred to take-up, and said that tax credits were well targeted and that the system destigmatised claimants and ensured that most families received support. More than 500,000 children have been lifted out of poverty since 1998–99, and 6.1 million families, with 10 million children—not an insignificant number—are benefiting from tax credits. By October 2005, in real terms, families with children in the poorest fifth of the population will, on average, be £3,200 a year better off. Children's risk of poverty has fallen from 33 to 28 per cent., after housing costs, between 1988–89 and 2003–04. Of course, more needs to be done, as the Government's child poverty strategy and the review published last summer clearly indicated. We need to develop that work.

Members have referred specifically to the administration of the system. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) focused on how the system could be made to work and to respond, in particular, to the needs of the more vulnerable. I understand entirely that he wants a wider debate about whether tax credits really are the way forward. He will understand that as a Minister, I am committed to tax credits but those are perfectly legitimate questions and they need to be asked.

So, what have I done? On 5 July, I met Citizens Advice and the ombudsman, and today I met the adjudicator. I discussed with all of them their recommendations. I have agreed that there should be a formal response to the ombudsman's recommendations, giving a time frame for their delivery where possible. Most important, I was keen to learn from the experience of all three and to discuss with them how we could maintain contact and ensure that the recommendations are properly taken forward, how we can report back to them and how they can assist us in that process. All three organisations acknowledged the value of the tax credit system, but noted the need to deal with the issues that have been raised.

With regard to the recommendations made by Citizens Advice, the ombudsman and the adjudicator, recommendation 10 in the ombudsman's report is that there should be a blanket amnesty on overpayments. As I have explained to the House and explained again to those organisations, the Government have a responsibility to balance our duty of care for all claimants with our duty to all taxpayers with regard to the public purse, so we cannot make a blanket decision for all cases where overpayment is vastly out of proportion to the award, and in many cases is not contested. However, we have said that, with that exception, we want to engage with them and to consider all their recommendations and the practicalities of taking them forward. For example, all three organisations made recommendations about award notices. We have been consulting them about the introduction of a new award notice. I have asked that the ombudsman and the adjudicator consider that in the light of the points they made. A draft is available, and I shall be delighted to put it in the Library.

I can assure the House that I shall work closely with the consultation group, the voluntary sector, the ombudsman and the adjudicator to take that work forward. Many elements in my statement to the House of 26 May preceded the reports, but encompassed many, indeed all of the points, with the exception of the amnesty. That relates to the point made in a slightly different fashion by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead about the possibilities of what I would describe as playback, whereby the tax credit claimant would receive a playback of all the awards and the changes that had been made through the year, so that they had a clear statement. I have asked that that be taken forward as a matter of urgency.

The system works for the majority of people, but at every point I try to draw on all the expertise and knowledge of those three organisations and others to improve it, and to deal specifically with the steps that we may need to take for an important group in the tax credit population. For example, I have asked the CAB to engage in discussions with us about how we can develop and enhance its advocacy role, using its expertise especially to reinforce support and advice. I have asked HMRC, in the period of merger, to examine how we can strengthen and ensure access for that particular group in many different ways.

Mr. Frank Field: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for saying whom she will consult on her new statement explaining the tax credit payments, but the group that she has missed out is poor people. Many poor people are very intelligent, and that is how they survive. Might she include some of our constituents when she consults on the design and intelligibility of the form?

Dawn Primarolo: I have no objection to doing so. Indeed, hon. Members who are consulting their constituents and discussing the issue with them have said that they will report to me. We have to have a wider base for consultation, because we must get it right.

My right hon. Friend also raised the very important question of suspension of recovery in case of dispute. I spoke to the citizens advice bureaux, the ombudsman and the adjudicator on that point. HMRC now tells me that we can introduce a suspension in case of dispute and, until it is resolved, recovery will not continue. I am simply now awaiting a date from HMRC for that procedure.

With the recovery mechanisms in place, the strategy of tax credits ensures, as my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) said, that we target poverty, remove children from poverty, and support families in balancing their family responsibilities and their work. The tax credits ensure that we share the burden as a community and give more to those who have least, ensuring that everybody gets something and the most goes to the poorest. That is the basis of the tax credits and that is why the policy is right. That is why we need to move now—as hon. Members have said—to ensure that the administrative and IT problems are corrected and the system delivers for all claimants the very best service that we always intended to provide. I commend the tax credit system to the House. We will continue to eradicate child poverty and take forward the principles enshrined in the system.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House supports the Government's strategy to make work pay and provide financial support to families through tax credits; welcomes the fact that over 6 million families and 10.5 million children are benefiting from tax credits, with first year take-up of around 80 per cent., compared to just 57 per cent. for the Family Credit system inherited by the Government; recognises that far more families than ever before are benefiting from help with childcare costs; notes that tax credits are central to the Government's goal of abolishing child poverty; further notes that tax credits have helped ensure there are 1.5 million fewer children in poverty and have helped 275,000 lone parents into work; recognises the need to balance the demands for a simple system with the need for a system that responds to people's changing circumstances, giving most help to families when they need it most; acknowledges the IT and administrative problems that accompanied the early stages of implementation; and welcomes the measures announced by the Government for improving the administration of the system.

Licensing Act 2003

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I inform the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.16 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House notes with concern that with only 25 days to go before the 6th August deadline set in the Licensing Act 2003, only 20 per cent. of licence applications have been received; further notes the chaos that this is creating both for the licensing trade and for local authorities; is concerned by the problems of extra cost that the legislation is creating for village halls, sports clubs and community centres; regrets the effect that this will have upon local communities; condemns the Government for its lack of action in dealing with the problem; and calls upon the Government to extend the deadlines for the receipt of applications and re-examine the impact upon village halls and sports clubs.

I do not think that the Government will be surprised that we have tabled this motion. We have raised the issue in departmental questions, tabled early-day motions and debated the matter in Westminster Hall. Moreover, the Conservative party opposed the Bill when it was first debated in the House, and we did so because we thought that it was ill thought out and badly targeted, that it failed to address the real problems and that it would be impossible to implement. I pay tribute to the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss), who, during the passage of the Bill, consistently pointed out to the Government the practical problems that they would face with this badly drafted and ill-thought-out legislation. I hate to say this to the Minister, but "We told you so".

At every stage of the implementation of the Licensing Act 2003, we have attempted to make constructive and positive suggestions about how it could be delivered. We have raised concerns from the brewing industry, village halls, voluntary groups, musicians and sporting clubs. At every stage, sadly, the Government have ignored our pleas, denied that there was a problem and buried their head in the sand. Their response has been—to paraphrase a former Prime Minister—crisis, what crisis?

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): The right hon. Lady sets out what she describes as chaos. Does she agree with the leader of Westminster city council, who said:

"The Licensing Act brings enormous potential to consolidate Westminster's position as a premier evening and late-night destination."?

What has she got to say to that?

Mrs. May: It has come to a pretty pass when a Labour Member has to quote a first-rate Conservative council to try to defend the Government on such a matter.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: I shall make just a little more progress before giving way.

We can talk to all sorts of bodies—the licensing trade, Action with Communities in Rural England, the Musicians Union, the Central Council of Physical Recreation, which is dear to the heart of the Minister for Sport and Tourism, or the Local Government Association—and they will all tell us that the Government are presiding over the biggest chaos in implementation since the last big chaos in Government implementation. Indeed, I was at a dinner in Harrogate only last Tuesday—a mere week ago—when the leader of Westminster city council made a key point in telling me and the others there that it was high time that the Government listened to the issues that were being raised by local authorities about the problems of implementing the Act.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) first.

Meg Hillier: Would the right hon. Lady like to visit my constituency, where the local authority in Hackney has done an excellent job in working with the community and local people to bring in locally controlled licensing hours? Local people are delighted that they can go to their elected representatives to tackle problems, rather than experiencing the chaos that we had before.

Mrs. May: I am always very happy to visit Hackney and talk to people about the implications of what the Government are doing in the hon. Lady's constituency. I suggest that she visits other constituencies throughout the country in which village halls and many publicans are experiencing chaos and local authorities face the prospect of having to deal with large numbers of licence applications in the next couple of weeks.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): For the third time in her speech, my right hon. Friend has correctly cited a list of organisations that are deeply and seriously affected by the Act as implemented. I have a sheaf of letters from village halls and parish councils in my constituency that endorse everything that she said—[Interruption.] I shall happily take the Minister for Sport and Tourism through the letters one by one if he doubts me, because he would be shocked by what he found in them. Can my right hon. Friend assure me—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It would help if we did not have interventions from a sedentary position.

Peter Luff: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) assure me that the omission of travelling circuses from her litany is simply an oversight and that she understands the serious impact that the Act is having on them?

Mrs. May: I can certainly assure my hon. Friend of that fact. Indeed, I have so far failed to mention farmers' markets, take-away food stores, off-licences and corner shops, all of which are deeply affected by the Act. He mentions the sheaf of letters that he has received from his constituents. My hon. Friends have sent me copies of the correspondence that they have received from village halls, sports clubs and other organisations in their constituencies, all of which are complaints about the implications of the Act.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Will the right hon. Lady give way.

Mrs. May: The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) asked first.

Rob Marris: The right hon. Lady might not know that the third largest pub chain in the United Kingdom is headquartered in my constituency and run by the excellent Wolverhampton and Dudley breweries. I spent last Wednesday evening at a dinner in the company of some of its representatives, and although they said that there were some teething problems, they were entirely happy with the Licensing Act 2003, as far as I could gather. The industry is certainly not entirely against the legislation.

Mrs. May: The whole point is that the big chains have the personnel, resources and funding to provide support to their pubs. The hon. Gentleman should perhaps talk to smaller brewery chains such as Brakspear, which is an excellent local brewery in Henley. Only last week I met a representative of the company who told me about the real problems that its pubs are having in dealing with the extra cost and additional bureaucracy and time involved in the licence applications.

Mr. Heath: Just so that the right hon. Lady's list becomes ever longer, another group of voluntary organisations that is deeply affected by the Act is the carnival circuit in Somerset. She might not know that that massive affair attracts up to 150,000 people a night, but it could be decimated as a result of the Act.

Mrs. May: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely valid point. The Government have completely failed to understand the number of organisations and activities that are affected by the Act and will find matters involving licensing applications rather more difficult than they did in the past.

I am not sure what I find most galling: the inability and incompetence of the Government, or the arrogance of Ministers about the matter. During Culture, Media and Sport questions yesterday, the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell), told us that 33 per cent. of expected applications had been received. He said:

"Applications are starting to pick up, although there is still some way to go."—[Official Report, 11 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 555.]

With 25 days to go, for 190,000 premises—I am setting apart personal licences—an outstanding total of 133,000 applications are yet to be made. As a result of the Government's deadline of 6 August, local authorities will have 18 working days in which they will be expected to receive and process applications, so they will have to deal with 7,400 a day. That shows the chaos out there at the moment. Why do not the Government just admit that they got things wrong and work with us to come up with a solution?

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): Will the right hon. Lady also acknowledge that in addition to the many licence applications that are still to come forward, there will be a large number of appeals? Does she think that the magistrates courts will be in a position to deal with them, let alone that the local authorities will be able to deal with the licence applications?

Mrs. May: Indeed; the hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. There are three stages to the problem. Local authority officers must first deal with processing. Then local authority councillor panels might have to meet many times a week over the rest of this month to deal with applications. There could then be a problem for the magistrates courts, which was raised with me when I visited my local magistrates court in Maidenhead a couple of weeks ago. People are worried about what they must do to ensure that the Act is properly implemented.

In a sense, I feel sorry for the Under-Secretary. This was a disaster waiting to happen and it has just been dropped in his lap. Even the Financial Times has documented his annoyance at dealing with the ensuing chaos and the fact that he is becoming fed up with "these ridiculous photo opportunities" that have seen him pictured in every catering magazine from Fast Food & Frying Operator to Masala. I am sure that they are worthy and well-read publications, but even if the Under-Secretary were to appear as the centre spread in Vogue, OK! or The Guardian's media pages, he still could not meet his 6 August deadline for the applications.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (James Purnell): I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for the opportunity to clarify the fact that I was absolutely delighted to give interviews and participate in all those photo opportunities. Although the FT is a very august and respectable paper, for once it got the emphasis slightly wrong.

Mrs. May: Oh dear, the damage is done. I am afraid that I cited a direct quote from the Under-Secretary.

Of course we accept that applicants, especially commercial businesses, should pay the cost of their licensing applications. However, running such a burdensome, bureaucratic and unnecessarily complex system is introducing additional costs that the industry, let alone voluntary organisations, simply cannot afford to bear.

Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): The Tories have flip-flopped constantly on the Act. They cannot decide whether they want it to be more regulatory or deregulatory. Perhaps the right hon. Lady will clarify their position.

Mrs. May: I want the Act to be fair to all pubs, clubs, voluntary organisations, village halls and sports clubs throughout the country, although some are now faced with possible closure as a result of the Government's actions.

[Mrs. May]

The Under-Secretary tells us that the new system is not bureaucratic at all. He tells us that filling in the new forms is simply a matter of ticking a few boxes. He said:

"It's much simpler than filling in a tax form".

Well, I do not know what sort of tax form he fills in. I took the opportunity to download an application form from the Department's website. It is indeed just a matter of a few boxes—97 of them, in fact. Those are just the boxes to be ticked, because another 508 boxes require further information. More than 600 boxes must be completed, yet the Under-Secretary says that the form is simpler than the two pages of application that people had to complete in the past.

James Purnell: To tick all those boxes, an organisation would have to be a venue with a dance floor that would serve alcohol and late food, in addition to putting on dance, showing films and putting on a wrestling match, indoor sports and plays. If an organisation is just converting, the application form is only seven pages, not 21 pages with 500 boxes, as the right hon. Lady suggests.

Mrs. May rose—

Ms Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: I shall respond to the Minister's point first.

The application form is not just seven pages, because the form entitled "Application for an existing licence to be converted to a premises licence" is for a conversion application and it is 27 pages long, including the guidance notes. It is all very well for the Minister to say that people do not have to complete every box. They may not wish to apply for everything, but they have to read the form and decide whether to complete it. The point is the time that it takes to fill it in.

Ms Keeley: On effort, I commend to the right hon. Lady one of my two local authorities, Salford, which has got around the problems that she raises by doing the simple things that a local authority should do in such circumstances. It has run workshops, given advice and sent out letters to prompt applications. That is not difficult. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is."] It is not. The key point is to bring local authorities and communities into a dialogue on licences. Talking to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must ask a question when she intervenes. I think that for now she has probably said enough.

Mrs. May: I accept that some local authorities are running workshops. That is a good idea and is helpful, but if someone is a volunteer running a small village hall committee, he still has to find the time to attend those workshops and to fill in the form, regardless of whether he has been to a local authority workshop or not.

Far from communities having a greater say in what is happening in their area, a publican told me the other day that the village where her pub is located is concerned because the application form, which goes up in the pub's window, has to contain the full hours for which she is applying for a licence. As she wants the opportunity to have an extended licence for new year and sometimes to have people in to watch the rugby in the morning, she has applied for a licence from 8 am to 1 or 2 am. Far from feeling that they are being consulted, local villagers are saying, "What's this? Why is the pub going to be open every day from 8 am to 2 am?" It is not, but the way in which the Government have drafted the legislation is causing all those worries.

The system has become so bureaucratic that it is a lawyer's licence to print money. Hon. Members should not take my word for it: ask a lawyer—everyone else has to in order to fill in the forms. Peter Lockley of Blythe Liggins solicitors in Leamington Spa says:

"The Government could not have produced a more complicated form had it tried. Even seasoned lawyers and experienced licensees are on the whole totally confused."

For once, that piece of legal advice is free.

Alternatively, the Minister could ask someone who has completed one of the forms. John Moore of Ashfield Peace memorial hall writes:

"I have personally devoted at least two man weeks to understanding the requirements, attended a training evening and had two meetings with the licensing authority at Mole Valley. I have purchased two HMSO publications on the Regulations and the interpretation costing £24. I have read 30 pages of accompanying notes. I have completed a form 21 pages long, each page seriously complicated and detailed, compared with 2 simple pages previously. We have had to prepare a plan of the hall to scale 1:100 done by volunteers but costing us £120 for computer software to run it. We have by law to advertise our change of licence at a cost of £292".

That is the process that people have to go through to apply for the licences.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): "Simple"—the Minister has no idea.

Mrs. May: Indeed, simple is how the Minister describes it. He has no idea what people face.

Let me draw the Minister's attention to the e-mail that I received from the chairman of the Pinder hall committee in Cookham in my constituency—Pinder hall is the village hall. She says:

"Our Social Club has thrown in the towel and is going to a solicitor, as they feel the forms are so complicated. The Sailing Club"—

Cookham Reach sailing club—

"have discovered the cost is more than they bring in in fees and we at the Pinder Hall believe we will have to pay well over £1,000 for just eighteen events a year. The Cricket Club say no one told them about it . . . The whole thing is a total fiasco".

That is the point. If even trained professionals like that lawyer are struggling to cope with the system, how on earth are volunteers supposed to cope? The complex nature of the regime is putting at risk the future of our sports clubs and village halls.

The Minister has made a number of statements about the new regime. He has said that it simplifies matters and makes it cheaper for organisations in the long run, and that once completed, organisations will never have to apply again. Indeed, on the "You and Yours" programme on BBC Radio 4 two weeks ago, he said:

"The light at the end of tunnel is that they can know that they will never have to apply for a licence again".

My version of never having to apply again is clearly not the same as Ministers'. My "never having to apply" means exactly that. The reality is, however, that organisations will have to renew their licence every year at the cost of between £40 and £225. [Interruption.] Ah! The Minister says that they will not have to fill in the same form. What he said on the Radio 4 programme was:

"they will never have to apply for a licence again", yet they will, because every year they have to apply to renew their licence.

When is a licence for life not a licence for life? I suggest that it is when it is issued by this Minister. His one-off licence looks a little dodgy to me. Perhaps he has become the Del Boy Trotter of the licensing trade: "Lifetime guarantees but don't expect your money back."

I have other examples of people who face the reality of filling in the forms. Bob Hulley, the secretary of Sonning working men's club, says:

"Hitherto, Clubs have had to apply to a Magistrate's Court for a Club Registration Certificate. This cost is £10, and lasted for ten years. Under the new Act, we have had to pay £250 to apply . . . £230 to advertise our application, and starting next year there is an annual fee of £180. We are constituted on a 'not for profit basis', and exist to serve as a focus and meeting place for the local community. If we finish a financial year and all bills paid and a surplus of only a few hundred pounds in hand, we feel we have done quite well.

We are looking at ways to increase income, such as increasing our membership fees, but we have to recognise that many of our members are pensioners, who are living close to the financial edge themselves."

Sonning working men's club

"has served the community in Sonning for over 100 years. We will do our utmost to keep going, but I have to describe our future as uncomfortable to uncertain."

Meg Hillier: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: No. I want to make progress.

That is the reality of what is happening as a result of the Act. When the Minister says that it will not affect community groups, perhaps he has not heard of organisations like Sonning working men's club or the Italian Circle in Welwyn Garden City. The committee of the Italian Circle has written to us. It was established a few years ago to provide talks about Italian subjects to members and visitors. It has slide shows, videos and so forth, and offers members and visitors the opportunity to have a glass of wine. The consumption of wine averages four to five bottles a meeting, yet it has been informed that it has to make an application under the Act for temporary event notices. According to the chairman, however, the way in which the Act is drafted has presented it

"with severe problems, which may result in the closure of the Circle."

The Government have failed to grasp the way in which this ill-thought-out and heavy-handed law is impacting not just on community groups, village halls and working men's clubs, but on small businesses. I have a letter from Wines Unlimited in Worcester Park, which says:

"We are a small wholesale wine business, selling by the case, which my husband set up when he retired as a hobby. Under the old regulation we did not need a licence to trade as a wholesaler. Under the new regulation we have to have a premises licence for our storeroom, a Personal licence, pay Band D Charges council tax and many more regulations, which of course all cost money. Our profit margin is very small and therefore would not stand this kind of expense. So we can only go out of business."

It goes on to say:

"The Legislation has not been thought through properly. We have to spend between £100.00 and £300.00 on a course to teach us NOT about wine or how to serve the community"

but

"to teach us how to throw someone out of a bar! (which we do not have and have no intention of having)".

That is how ill-thought-out this particular piece of legislation is.

At Prime Minister's questions three weeks ago, the Prime Minister, on the issue of village halls, gave an undertaking. He said:

"I do understand the hon. Gentleman's concerns. We tried to introduce a licensing regime that puts more power in the hands of local people. I understand the problems of village halls—I have heard about them myself—and we look further into them to see if anything can be done. Obviously, in the end, we need a licensing regime that pays its way."—[Official Report, 22 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 798.]

Perhaps the Minister can tell us what can be done or what he intends to do as a result of the Prime Minister's commitment to the House that this matter would be looked into. What will the Minister be doing for Richard Slater of the Village Halls Advisory Service, who says that the new Act seems very unfair. He adds:

"For halls to be limited to 12 temporary event notices means that small money-raising activities for, say, a playgroup holding a cheese and wine event will either be driven to private houses for a few or penalise an essential facility in a village."

That is the problem. Community activities will cease as a result of what the Government have been doing.

There are further complications. I have seen a letter from Mr. Barclay, the honorary treasurer of Roydon village hall.

Ms Angela C. Smith: I thank the right hon. Lady for giving way for a second time.

The right hon. Lady has talked much about chaos, disorder and complication. However, she would deprive the police, local authorities and local residents of important new powers to deal with problems created by alcohol-fuelled disorder and violence. Does she have an alternative for dealing with such problems? Does she agree that the problems exist?

Mrs. May: I suggest that the hon. Lady thinks seriously before making such an intervention. When have there been problems of social disorder in village halls as a result of cheese-and-wine fundraising events for play groups? There have not been any. The Government have used an Act that introduced various other facilities as a sledgehammer to crack a nut in relation to village halls and sports clubs.

There are other complications. The honorary treasurer of Roydon village hall has said that before it can have a designated premises supervisor it must undergo a Criminal Records Bureau check. He added:

"We have been informed that this check cannot be carried out in England because the organisation to process these checks has not been put in place, and the current information supplied by the English Criminal Records Bureau does not meet the requirements of the new legislation. Therefore the application has to be processed in Scotland. We have four members on the Committee, who have undergone enhanced CRB checks in England, but this check is insufficient for the new regime, and they will need to undergo these checks again if they would wish to be designated premises supervisors."

I have merely touched the surface in my remarks about what is a bad piece of legislation. Sadly, there is little time left for us to make it better. If the Minister had decided to work with us when we first raised these issues, he would have extended the deadlines, and we would have given him our support. However, we are now faced with just a few working days in the House, and no chance of bringing forward primary legislation to extend the 6 August deadline. Will the Minister at the very least now accept the mess that he has created and that he now finds himself in and work with us to find a solution for the many organisations that are struggling with the implementation of the Act?

The Minister has not yet laid the statutory instrument setting the second deadline of 24 November. Will he agree to extend that deadline, at least until after the Christmas and new year period, so that seasonal trade and the enjoyment of the public are not interrupted?

The Minister has set up the licensing fees review panel—I repeat the questions that I put to the Minister for Sport and Tourism yesterday, which he singularly failed to answer or even attempt to address in his responses—which will not report until autumn 2006. Will he now bring forward the review, tell it to report by the November deadline this year and agree to backdate any proposed reduction in fees, particularly to sports clubs and village halls? Will he agree also to review the way in which charges are apportioned to clubs, particularly sports clubs, so that they are based on the rateable value of only the area that is serving alcohol, rather than the club premises and grounds as a whole? Will he review the preposterous issue of temporary events notices, and increase them from 12 to at least to 24, and preferably to an even higher number?

We are discussing the implications that this bad Act will have for the licensing regime. I have not mentioned many other organisations and businesses that are affected by the legislation, such as travelling circuses. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) mentioned carnivals. There are also farmers' markets, fast food outlets and corner shops, some of which are finding things very difficult and may go under. All of those organisations, businesses and community activities are being affected by the Act.

Ms Keeley: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: No, I am coming to a conclusion.

The Minister should now face the truth and accept the reality of what is happening. He need not accept my word, but he should accept the word of village halls, community centres, clubs and sports clubs throughout the country. He must face the truth, accept the chaos that the Act is causing and do something about it now.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (James Purnell): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"commends the Government on its effective publicity campaign that has significantly increased the rate of applications to convert existing licences under the Licensing Act 2003 before 6th August; encourages remaining licensees to fulfil their responsibilities and get their applications in before that date; considers that failure to implement the Act without delay would deny local communities increased powers of intervention and improved democratic accountability with regard to licensing and deny the police the expanded powers that are vital to their efforts to tackle alcohol-related crime and anti-social behaviour; welcomes the powers in the Act to prevent crime and disorder and public nuisance, and protect children from harm; believes that the Act will benefit local communities, local economies and tourism and generate savings for business of almost £2 billion over 10 years; and furthermore, believes that the Act will be successfully implemented by 24th November 2005 and will be welcomed by industry and non-commercial organisations, including village halls and sports clubs, alike.".

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State regrets that she cannot be here for this important debate. As the House will be aware, she has been asked to take on a role working with the families of the victims of last week. I think that it will be understood why she is not able to be in the Chamber.

I listened carefully to the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May). After 28 minutes of her speech, I am still not clear whether she is in favour of more flexible hours or against them. There was no mention of her view on that or of the alternative policy that she was putting forward. We have some sympathy with her in that her quandary is really her predecessor's fault. As has been said, the Tories have flip-flopped all over the place on the Licensing Act 2003. They started by being in favour. When the Bill was passing through the House, the right hon. Lady's predecessor said that the Conservatives agreed with the need for greater flexibility on opening hours, and that they accepted the argument for doing away with universal chucking-out time. Then, just before the election, when the political editor of the Daily Mail telephoned and said that it was launching a campaign against 24-hour drinking, the Tories decided that they were wrong after all, that they would come into line with the Daily Mail and would oppose the extension of the opening hours that they had supported in the first place.

Today, the problem for the right hon. Lady is that she cannot say what she thinks about flexible hours. I suspect that she agrees with them, but she cannot say so because in another part of the forest the shadow Home Secretary is still busily campaigning against 24-hour drinking, even though no one has applied for 24-hour licences.

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): As we are experiencing the parliamentary equivalent of a lock-in, as I gather from the screens, perhaps it is time to make many interventions. The key point that the Minister must understand is that we are not debating the flexibility of the Act, but the inflexibility of the Act—the one-size-fits-all approach has penalised village halls. Will the Minister reconsider this regime and how it affects village halls, which are staffed by volunteers and do not have the resources to have a designated premises supervisor and do not need licensing training?

James Purnell: I am happy to consider that. I am also happy to meet the hon. Gentleman and other colleagues if that is their wish.

The right hon. Member for Maidenhead has no alternative but to focus purely on the implementation of the Act. She does not have a position on the overall intent of the Act.

Jonathan Shaw: As well as 24-hour drinking, on which we have not heard from the right hon. Lady for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), she also failed to mention the president of the National Association of Kebab Shops, who thinks that the Bill is top dollar. He has said:

"We are happy with this law because the longer opening hours will be available to most take-away shops."

There we are. Put chilli sauce on that.

James Purnell: I look forward to my hon. Friend's press release and seeing him pictured in one of his local kebab shops.

The truth is that the Tory party has sacrificed long-term credibility for the prospect of winning the support of an agreed section of the population, or even the possibility of winning votes in the House. That is what the shadow Chancellor said when he was explaining why the Conservative party did so badly at the last general election. It seems from the speech of the right hon. Member for Maidenhead that not much has changed. We are left only with criticism and no positive alternatives.

The truth is that the legislation that we are discussing is long overdue.

Mrs. May: I set out a number of positive alternatives in my closing remarks. I offered suggestions to the Minister on ways in which the Government could get out of the mess into which they have got themselves.

James Purnell: We still do not know what the right hon. Lady's views are on flexible hours. Through the Act—[Interruption.] The core of the Act is about flexible hours and still, after years of scrutiny, we have no idea of what Tory policy is on the issue.

Alistair Burt: The Minister is a bright chap. We are not dealing with a motion that condemns the entire Act in all its aspects. The point of the motion and that of the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) was to pinpoint the failure of the Act and the possibility of repairing the damage that is being done to certain of the community because of that Act. If the Minister would get off 24-hour drinking and spend 20 minutes answering the questions perhaps we would have a better debate.

James Purnell: That is exactly what I am going to do. If the hon. Gentleman supports the Licensing Act, presumably he is against the shadow Home Secretary, who is busy campaigning against it. That is the problem for the Opposition—they have taken two totally different positions and have contradicted themselves so they now find themselves in the position where they do not have a position.

Mr. Heath: I want to make a positive suggestion. The Minister knows that I am interested in the problem relating to carnivals, which is an unintended consequence of the Bill. Traditional carnivals in Somerset include moving floats, which are exempt, and people walking along, who are not exempt. Would he consider using a definition from the Town Police Clauses Act 1847? It is an old Act, but every carnival uses it to secure road closures. It refers to "all times of public processions, rejoicings or illuminations, and in any case when the streets . . . may be thronged or liable to be obstructed".

Although that definition is 150 years old, it would get round the difficulty for carnivals. Would the Minister look at it and see whether he can send a letter of comfort to district councils so that they know how to administer the law?

James Purnell: I am happy to look at that, although my understanding is that, perhaps partly thanks to the hon. Gentleman's assiduous campaigning in Parliament, Somerset councils have now decided that their existing carnivals do not include licensable activities. New events, however, may need to be considered on a case-by-case basis.

Mr. Heath: Yes, the councils have made that decision this year, but it is open to challenge from anyone who believes that a carnival needs to be licensed. The law is imprecise, and the carnival organisers are worried that they could be liable to six months' imprisonment or a fine of £20,000 if they are found to be in breach of licence requirements. That is why we need Government reassurance that their interpretation is right.

James Purnell: I am happy to see if we can write a letter that provides comfort. The core of the Bill is about giving local authorities the power to make those decisions locally, so we would not want to override their ability to take those decisions.

Peter Luff: When the Minister debated this matter with me some weeks ago in Westminster Hall, he was in a constructive mood. When I met him to discuss touring circuses only a few weeks he was in a constructive mood again. I am glad that he is returning to a constructive mood now and engaging with the real issues, but when will I receive the letters that he promised me on designated persons for village halls and on the impact on touring circuses? Village halls and circuses cannot wait much longer for that clarification, which he promised some time ago.

James Purnell: We were looking at that in the Department only today. We are trying to secure the final piece of legal advice that we need to send the letter, but we shall do so as soon as possible.

Thanks to the Act, we can finally look forward to longer pub opening hours, which will boost tourism and help to stamp out binge drinking through a more relaxed and responsible approach to the enjoyment of alcohol. The current laws are based on laws introduced during the first world war and have no place in today's society. That is the view of the Campaign for Real Ale, which is right. The current law is full of anomalies. The "two in a bar" rule, for example means that the White Stripes,—as the House knows, one of the most successful bands in the world but which has only two members—could turn up in a local pub and put on a concert for thousands of people. Our very own MP4—a band with growing support in all our constituencies—would not be able to perform unless the pub had obtained a special licence for them. The band has a slightly smaller fan base than the White Stripes. [Interruption.] At the moment—perhaps one day it will be headlining at Glastonbury. [Interruption.] Unfortunately, I wrote it.

Uniquely in Europe, we have an 11 pm closing time, which means that people neck two or three pints before being thrown out on the streets at the same time, fighting for a taxi and sometimes even fighting one another. There is a loophole in a law that allows people to sell alcohol after 11 pm, as long as they serve food and provide music and dancing. That means that the one group of people to whom we allow alcohol to be served after 11 pm are those whom our constituents are most worried will be a source of nuisance. The regime clearly needs to be updated, and Members on both sides of the House will agree that the change in the law is overdue.

The greater flexibility that we are introducing will save the industry money. At the moment, any pub that wants to stay open late, to open early on Christmas eve or to show the Lions test, must go to a magistrate to secure special permission at a cost of £10 a time. There are about 1.7 million such applications a year. The Licensing Act will sweep away anomalies as well as the need for people to go to a magistrate every time that they wish to apply for a special permission. It replaces that requirement with a system in which people apply for a licence once without further need for form filling. The right hon. Member for Maidenhead was stretching the point when she said that because people have to send off a cheque they are making an application. We have front-loaded the application process—people apply up front, then they need never apply again for a premises licence.

Meg Hillier: My hon. Friend mentioned magistrates. Hackney council welcomes the Government's resolve to stick with the 6 August deadline, but would like to know whether applications referred to magistrates on appeal after automatic refusal could be fast-tracked back to the local authority for redetermination. Given the likely last-minute rush, that would make the scheme more workable.

James Purnell: My hon. Friend makes a good point. We need to work with magistrates to ensure that if the application is for a conversion and there has been no objection, it should be possible, if it is not processed within two months, to fast-track it through the magistrates courts. I do not know whether we can take up the point that my hon. Friend made in relation to conversions, but I shall certainly look at it and write to her.

As I said, the new Act sweeps away anomalies and ends the need for people to go to the magistrate every time that they want to put on an event. Consequently, the amount of forms processed will be greatly reduced from 16 million a year to 2 million per year. The number of hearings will go down from 2.4 million a year to 80,000. There will be great savings of about £1.5 billion in lawyers' fees, so it is not surprising that the lawyer whom the right hon. Member for Maidenhead cited was not happy.

Mrs. May: I am grateful for the generosity of the Minister in giving way once more. On the reapplication for licences, will he confirm that it is not the case that once a licence has been granted it is there for life? Will he confirm that it is not a lifetime licence for which nothing else has to be done? Will he confirm that an application has to be made every year to renew the licence? If he is saying that all that someone has to do is sign a cheque, put it in an envelope and post it, is he guaranteeing that local authorities will not require any paperwork other than the cheque?

James Purnell: There is no renewal process. Licensees send in a cheque to fund inspection and enforcement, but no other action is required of them or the licensing authority.

In the next 10 years, the Act will save the industry about £2 billion. I accept that there is an up-front cost, which we do not seek to minimise—it was included in our calculations for the £2 billion. As the industry asked us, we front-loaded the application process so that licensees do not need to return every time that they wish to put on an event. The current law is inflexible and archaic, and it fails to deal with concerns that we share with our constituents about antisocial behaviour. The only sanction that we have against a pub that is causing problems is closure. Magistrates are naturally reluctant to use that, because it is the nuclear option. Only 0.2 per cent of pubs failed to secure a licence renewal last year.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): I am not sure whether I am required to declare an interest, as my wife holds a highly distinguished position as a member of Tameside council's liquor licensing panel, and my agent chairs it. Is my hon. Friend aware that in Tameside, a local authority that also covers his constituency, the liquor licensing panel refused the first two applications under the new Act because the applicants both had convictions for selling alcohol to children? Is that not a prime example of the way in which the Act, which has given real powers back to local authorities and local communities, is working?

James Purnell: That is an extremely good point, and it shows the powers that local authorities will have under the Act. Previously, they found it difficult to exercise such powers, because they were removed from local accountability. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's wife and agent, who are leading the efforts of one of the best councils in the country—it is also my council—to introduce the law.

Instead of the present situation, where there is only the nuclear option of closure, the Act will give us a full range of powers to cope with the problems that a minority of pubs and other licensees can cause. For the first time there is a power for the local community to ask for a review of a licensee who they are worried about. The local authority can then intervene in a targeted way, by imposing new conditions. It can ask for new doormen to be put in, for the management to be changed or for a TV screen to be moved if too many people watching sporting events are causing trouble. If targeted early intervention fails, the local authority can hit the licensee where it hurts—in their pocket. It can suspend the licence and, if necessary, revoke it. If the worst comes to the worst, the fines have been increased in the Act and the maximum fine is now £20,000, possibly with six months in prison.

We now have a full range of powers to deal with our constituents' concerns about antisocial behaviour. I was therefore surprised to see that the Liberal Democrat motion suggested delaying the implementation of the Act until binge drinking has been addressed. The whole point is that the Act is designed to help us address binge drinking and to give us much better tools to deal with it and much better ways to tackle the problems caused by a small minority of premises. That is why the police are pressing us to bring in the Act as soon as possible. For once, perhaps, the Liberal Democrats are barking up the wrong tree. The Act is a good piece of legislation.

Mr. Don Foster: I am grateful for the Minister's comments, and I will respond shortly. Can he tell us which police are urging the Government to push ahead as rapidly as possible with implementation?

James Purnell: The Association of Chief Police Officers, which was represented on our high-level group. The Act is also supported by the Police Superintendents Association. I admit that there are individual police officers who do not support the Act, but the bodies representing the police have supported us.

Ms Keeley: On antisocial behaviour, the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) spoke about corner shops. The sale of alcohol by corner shops to young people is a serious issue. There are other licensing issues, but that is a serious one in many constituencies. The idea that such a business could not fill in forms and renew them annually is ridiculous. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is high time the measure came in? Control of the sale of alcohol to young people in my constituency is a serious matter and I would welcome the implementation of the Act without delay.

James Purnell: My hon. Friend is right. I know she has campaigned on the issue, and in response to her and other hon. Members who were worried, as I am, about the sale of alcohol to under-age drinkers, we have brought in the powers to deal with it. We have increased the fine from £1,000 to £5,000, we are introducing fixed penalty notices to deal with people who sell persistently to under-age drinkers, and the Violent Crime Reduction Bill will allow us to close down instantly and for 48 hours businesses which are doing that. We need to change the culture in this country, where some people think it is acceptable for children of nine, 10 or 11 to be drinking alcohol and to be drunk on our streets at 11 o'clock on a Friday night.

Jonathan Shaw: My hon. Friend referred to the Violent Crime Reduction Bill. Is it not the case that there are powers in that Bill which will ensure that premises have to pay towards some local services if they do not co-operate with local councils, police and so on?

James Purnell: My hon. Friend is right. The idea is that if a local community and a set of licensees fail to deal with concerns about alcohol over time, there will be a charge on them. We see that as a red card, to encourage them to act before that becomes necessary. The power is available to deal with the worst problems.

Implementing a new piece of legislation is always challenging, and it is not surprising that in a situation where there are about 190,000 licensees and where we are collapsing six regimes into one and dealing with a sector that was previously regulated by up to 50 pieces of legislation, there will be some sectors and individual licensees that suffer anomalies. We will examine those if they occur. We have worked closely with representatives of all the organisations that were cited by the right hon. Lady and other hon. Members, and we will continue to do so.

The right hon. Lady cited the issue of applications. She carried out a helpful survey in May to see how many licensees had applied. At that stage the rate was too slow. She found that the figure was 3.5 per cent. We therefore decided to increase our awareness-raising efforts and put in place a national campaign. We placed adverts in 28 regional and trade publications. We have done several regional tours and 50 interviews. The right hon. Lady was kind enough to mention some of them.

We are particularly grateful for the help that we received from brewers—for example, Cobra, which helped us to reach the 8,000 Indian restaurants that they supply with beer. We are also grateful to the cash and carry network, 95 per cent. of which has participated in our initiative and helped us to distribute over 200,000 leaflets to make sure that we can reach people who do not read the trade press and who do not necessarily join trade membership organisations. We can make sure that they are reached as well and that they know they need to apply.

We do not want to minimise the work that remains to be done, but applications have started to pick up. They were at 3.5 per cent. in mid-May, 10 per cent. by mid-June, 25 per cent. last week and they are now up to 33 per cent., so steady progress is being made. We recognise that there is much further to go, but there is other encouraging news, such as the fact that the British Beer and Pub Association reported this week that about 60 per cent. of pubs have now applied. If that rate of increase in applications continues, a very significant number of those that need a licence to trade will have applied by the first deadline of 6 August.

If licensees miss that deadline, they have not entirely missed their chance to apply. They will be able to apply as if they were a new licensee. That will be potentially a more difficult process because there would rightly be an opportunity for the local community to make representations. The key message that we should send out today is that they need to apply by 6 August and if they miss that deadline, they need to apply by 24 November.

Mr. Don Foster: The Minister needs to check his own legislation. Saying that licensees must apply by 24 November is a load of nonsense. Applications must be received far earlier than that, because time must be allowed for a potential appeal and the setting up of a magistrates Bench to hear it. There must be time for the application to be consulted upon and notice given, and time must be allowed for the local authority officers and then a committee to consider it. What is the Minister's estimate of the date by which an application needs to be made if it is to go through all the potential hoops by the second named day, 24 November?

James Purnell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I mis-spoke. I meant to say that licensees had to have their application in by 24 November. We would encourage people to get their application in as quickly as possible if they fail to meet the 6 August deadline.

I want to make it clear that we have no intention of delaying that 24 November deadline. We have been urged by a large number of organisations not to delay the deadline, including ACPO and a large number of organisations in the industry, which believe that the Act will be helpful to them. We have also been urged not to delay by people who are involved in dealing with antisocial behaviour, who want the new powers that come with the Act so that they can deal with concerns about that.

Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton) (Lab): I understand that some local authorities take a different attitude to licensing, and obviously there will be differences round the country. Is there a perceptible difference in the percentage of applications made in different parts of the country, or is it pretty uniform?

James Purnell: That is a good point. Application rates vary. Among the best ones, Bolton, for example, is up to 40 per cent. Some are below 20 per cent. We are working closely with all local authorities and have worked specifically with those that have received fewer applications, to make sure that we can help them increase the number of applications that they receive.

The right hon. Member for Maidenhead mentioned the cost of licences. Yes, the cost of alcohol licences has gone up, but she knows very well that the reason for that is that previously the taxpayer was subsidising the cost of running the system, to the tune of £25 million a year. When the Bill went through Parliament, we said that that should not continue to happen. The taxpayer should not continue to subsidise the sale of alcohol because people are making money out of it. She and her party agreed with that principle.

Several hon. Members rose—

James Purnell: I have given way a number of times. I shall make a little progress.

It is important that the cost of the fees represents the actual cost of administering the system. That is why we have asked Sir Les Elton to examine the issue. The right hon. Lady will be happy to know that we have asked him to report by November with some initial recommendations, particularly if there are any anomalies to be addressed. He needs some evidence about the implementation of the Act before he can present us with evidence about the cost. That is why we said that after that first report he should report 12 months after the Act comes into force. Local authorities and industry broadly agree with that.

Peter Luff: Will one of the anomalies that the Minister considers be the issue of sports clubs or holiday caravan parks such as the Ranch caravan park in my constituency, which is now assessed for its fee on the whole area of the park, not just on the size of the bar or the alcohol that is serves?

James Purnell: That is one of the matters that we have asked Sir Les Elton to consider. I am told that it depends on its hereditament and that it can apply, if it wants to, to have its rateable value applied just to the area where it sells alcohol. The hon. Gentleman's constituents can examine that if they are concerned about it. We will ask Sir Les Elton to consider that issue overall.

Chris Mole (Ipswich) (Lab): The Minister will recall that I wrote to him about a speciality cheese shop in my constituency that sold alcohol as a very marginal element of its business. Will he confirm that it would be right and proper for that business, and others that hon. Members mentioned, to make its contributions directly to Sir Les so that we can judge the Bill in its entirety, not on the anomalies that have been raised by a few hon. Members this evening?

James Purnell: We will indeed look at that. My hon. Friend may well find that that shop is at the lower end of the rateable value. If it is right at the bottom end, it will be paying £70 a year. Those are exactly the kinds of issues that we want Sir Les Elton and his colleagues to consider.

Let me say a few words about village halls, which several hon. Members have concerns about. We have responded to what the Prime Minister said at Prime Minister's questions. Today, I met representatives of Action with Communities in Rural England, having spoken to them previously, and we are going to consider their concerns. They have been working closely with my officials over the past few months and have been kind enough to say in their publication that the DCMS has been extremely helpful in helping them to explain to people how to comply with the Act.

ACRE is concerned about three things: the cost of the annual licence; the up-front cost of applying for the licence; and the fact that some volunteers are worried about the legal responsibilities that they take on. We have tried to clarify some of that, for example by saying that there is no need for the personal licence holder or the designated premises supervisor to be on the premises at any time that alcohol is being served. That has reassured people. We will continue to work with ACRE over the next few months on those concerns. We have written to Sir Les Elton to ask him to consider charges for village halls as a matter of urgency, and we will think about whether there are any other issues that we can deal with.

Alistair Burt: I am puzzled. If the Minister thinks that charges being levied on village halls are too high, why does he have to refer it to anyone? Can he not make a decision instead of asking Sir Les to look into it?

James Purnell: I have responded to what ACRE—the representative body that we are dealing with—has asked us to do. It would be wrong to make a decision before the Act has come into force based on an inadequate understanding of the evidence involved. We are doing exactly as ACRE has requested, which is to look at the evidence that it collects and to refer it to Sir Les Elton, and if there are problems to try to address them in any way that we can. If there are matters that require primary legislation, we will have to wait for a legislative opportunity, but for those that do not require such change we will be happy to deal with them if there is evidence that that is required.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): In the year of the volunteer, does the Minister understand that bureaucracy like this is driving people away from doing important voluntary acts such as being on a village hall committee? It is not that these people have nothing else to do with their time—they really want to do something good for their community, but this sort of thing is stopping them volunteering.

James Purnell: We completely support and appreciate the work that is done by volunteers across the country, including in village halls. When I met ACRE representatives today, it was clear that many village halls have successfully applied for licences and that many welcome the extra flexibility that they will get, just as pubs welcome it. However, we recognise that some village halls would rather not take out a licence and would prefer us to increase the number of temporary events notices, or TENs. We do not rule that out, but it would need to be carefully considered. During the Bill's passage through Parliament, we increased the number of TENs from five to 12. It is worth noting that that regime is extremely deregulatory. Essentially, it allows the applicant to put on an event that can last for up to 36 hours without anybody being able to object apart from the police, who can do so only on the grounds of law and order. In effect, people can run events without any closing time and with no opportunity for the local community to make representations. If we accepted the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Maidenhead, we would effectively have 30 of those events happening in any of our constituencies during the year, and they would not be confined to village halls—they could be in pubs or anywhere else. If we did that without properly considering the evidence, our constituents might be rightly concerned that we had gone too far in the direction of allowing flexible drinking.

However, we do not rule out moving on the issue of TENs, and we are happy to look at submissions on that over the summer when we consult on regulations for the TENs regime. We will also be happy to consider whether there are particular ways in which individual categories of licensees can have the regime apply to them in a different way.

Mr. Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): Does the Minister accept that this problem extends not only to village halls and temporary events but to small village shops? These are small shops, not areas where there is a problem of binge drinking. One in my constituency is only just being maintained by the actions of villagers. It is having to subscribe a very large sum of money in payment to consultants to help it to fill in forms. The village shop is confronting a permanent problem that will not be addressed by the measures that he is suggesting.

James Purnell: I do not want to test the patience of the House by going on too long. I think that the hon. Gentleman's village shop would be able to apply for mandatory rate relief, which should save it a significant amount more than the cost of the annual licence. We understand the vital role of village stores and have already tried to do what we can.

We will continue to consider the representations from ACRE. It agreed today to come on to our high-level group and to help us further with implementing the Act. Of course, we will continue to work with the Central Council of Physical Recreation, with carnivals, with working men's clubs, with circuses, with small village stores and with any other organisations that I may have failed to mention.

The next stage of implementing the Act will come after 6 August, when we will work closely with local authorities on processing what we recognise is a late surge of applications. We have agreed with them that we will institute a national helpline to help them with that and that we will have a further wave of advertising after 6 August specifically to target people who have failed to apply by that stage. I want to put on the record my thanks to all the council officers, officials and councillors who will work very hard over the summer; we are very grateful to them.

We have turned the corner. Applications are up. We have clear plans to target those who miss the 6 August deadline. We are working with local authorities to help them to process applications. We will continue to listen to individual sectors' concerns and to address them where we can. Implementing this radical reform was always going to be a challenge, but it is a challenge worth going for. This Act will be better for local communities, better at cracking down on the irresponsible minority, cheaper and more flexible for business, and better for the responsible majority. We should not be subject to curfew because of the problems that people have with the irresponsible minority. I believe that when we look back on this Act in one or two years' time, people will recognise that it is a much better framework of law than the one that we had. At that stage, we may even have the Conservatives coming up with a fourth position—that it was their idea all along.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I believe that all hon. Members would like to congratulate the Under-Secretary on a sterling performance. He has been dealt an especially bad hand and he is doing his best to play it. However, hon. Members will have been astonished by the way in which he has done it. Throughout his speech, he acknowledged a range of problems with the Licensing Act 2003.

At a time when the Act is almost due to be implemented, a Minister stood before us and promised that he would continue to consult group after group—village halls, carnivals, circuses, small shops or anything that anyone cared to mention—about the various issues. He even told us that, during the summer, there would be consultation on the temporary events notices arrangements. I stress that all that relates to a measure that is already in force and is due to be effected on 24 November. I therefore congratulate the Under-Secretary on his willingness at least to listen to the concerns. The Government would have done well to listen to the concerns that hon. Members of all parties raised about this measure when the hon. Gentleman was not a part of it.

All hon. Members will acknowledge that we have a serious problem of binge drinking. I mention that because the Under-Secretary wanted me to deal with his anxiety about our position. In a recent parliamentary question, I asked about the increase in violent offences connected with licensed premises. In the past 12 months alone, the figure has increased by 15 per cent., so that a staggering 50,000 such offences were committed in England and Wales in the past year. Recent figures show that admissions to accident and emergency departments resulting from alcohol abuse are now a staggering 25,000. A parliamentary question from my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Lynne Featherstone) elicited the response that, in the past 12 months, there has been an increase of 18.5 per cent. in alcohol-related deaths. We are storing up a huge problem. According to the Government's figures, 44 per cent. of 18 to 24-year-olds binge-drink at least once a month. Again from the Government's figures, we know that binge drinking costs our society more than £20 billion a year.

What has been the Government's response to that? They were elected in 1997 and it took them six years to devise their alcohol harm reduction strategy. In that time, 240,000 people died from alcohol abuse. It took until last year for the Prime Minister to acknowledge that binge drinking was a British disease. The Government did not consider existing legislation to ascertain whether it could help to tackle the problem. Legislation exists to prosecute landlords for allowing drunken or riotous behaviour on their premises. Since 1997, when the Government came to power, there has been an average of only 11 prosecutions a year. That shows how little use is made of existing legislation.

Legislation also exists to prevent people from buying drinks for others who are clearly drunk. Yet how many prosecutions have been brought since 1997? The answer is a grand total of 12—and in 2000 or 2001, none were brought.

Meg Hillier rose—

Jonathan Shaw rose—

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Foster: I shall give way to all three hon. Members shortly. I simply want to make it clear that legislation exists to deal with some of the problems. The Government introduced a new measure—in the Criminal Justice Act 2001—to tackle the problem. It provides that it is an offence if an employee as well as the landlord serves alcohol to someone who is behaving drunkenly. The Under-Secretary will be interested to know that, since the measure was introduced, not one successful prosecution has been brought.

Meg Hillier: In the hon. Gentleman's litany of criticism, will he acknowledge that the Government have allowed local people to have a say in licensing in their area and to approach their democratically elected representatives about the licences? Surely he can at least acknowledge that that is a good step forward.

Mr. Foster: I am delighted that the hon. Lady believes that the Bill does that. However, people in my constituency—and, I suspect, in hers—would say that that is not the case. In the majority of cases, we have the ludicrous position whereby a local councillor, who represents an area where there are public houses, cannot get involved in the deliberations about the licensing of a specific pub. Local representatives cannot get involved. As I shall show shortly, special saturation polices, which were introduced at the last minute to help local communities, are a complete mess. I am being polite.

Jonathan Shaw: The hon. Gentleman recited statistics relating to death and incidents involving binge drinking. He also talked about his local community. Is he still in favour of 16-year-olds buying alcohol and drinking? Does he believe that the people of Bath would think that was a good idea?

Mr. Foster: No, I hope those people would not. The hon. Gentleman is picking up a hoary old story, but, if he wishes, I shall respond. We believe that, over time, we should move the age of majority for many events to 16. We have also made it clear that, in the current climate of binge drinking, it would be irresponsible to do what the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Chris Ruane: The hon. Gentleman uses the term "binge drinking". Will he enlighten the House about the number of units that would qualify one to be a binge drinker?

Mr. Foster: Instead of spending much time on that, I refer the hon. Gentleman to a good publication that he will have received in the past couple of days from the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology. It provides a good definition. I shall not read it out but it is in Box 1 and he can read it.

Since I have an opportunity to refer to that document, let me consider whether, in this country's climate of binge drinking, the measure that has been passed but not yet implemented will be beneficial. On the police, whom the Under-Secretary mentioned, the document states:

> "The changes to licensing laws have been widely criticised by scientists, clinicians and the Police."

Leaving that and the reference to the recent conclusions of the Home Affairs Committee aside, I draw attention to the expert advice of the Science and Technology Committee. It bears reading precisely. It states:

> "Central to this debate is the issue of whether or not increasing access to alcohol will lead to a rise in consumption. Experience from various countries around the world is mixed. For instance, in Perth, Western Australia, an extension of bar opening times from midnight until 1 am led to a rise in alcohol consumption, violence and drunkenness. Similar effects have been reported in Iceland, Ireland and Canada, while a reduction in licensing hours in Norway, Finland and Sweden led a decrease of alcohol consumption among heavy drinkers."

But then it quite fairly puts the other side of the argument, saying:

"On the other hand, availability of alcohol in many Mediterranean countries is not restricted and yet those countries are not affected by binge drinking on the scale seen in the UK. Overall, it appears that the prevailing drinking culture is a key factor in determining consumption patterns."

Crucially, it goes on to say:

"In those countries with a well established binge drinking culture, increasing access to alcohol has led to increased consumption."

It would be absolutely crazy to press ahead with this legislation without first having put in place measures to tackle binge drinking.

Alistair Burt: The hon. Gentleman was rather cheekily challenged on his party's attitude to binge drinking. Might not that intervention have had rather more force had not one of No. 10's policy advisers, Miss Casey, given a rather different interpretation of binge drinking last week? It ill becomes Labour Members to take up that issue tonight before there has been a full recantation of such views by such an important adviser.

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman makes his point eloquently.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, although the Government are obsessed with public research, they are ignoring their own research into public opinion, which shows that the country is not with the Government on this issue? The country does not want an extension of licensing hours. Market towns such as Newport, Shifnal and Albrighton in my constituency see the after-effects of binge drinking on Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights.

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman is largely right. However, I suspect that his constituents, like mine, will welcome some aspects of the Licensing Act, such as the increased powers of the police to take action against bad behaviour in pubs and clubs. Some people might, in certain circumstances, welcome the flexibility that the Act provides, but there are many other aspects about which people are rightly concerned.

I do not wish to repeat the points made by the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), who identified a large number of problems relating to the Act. I merely wish to add a few more to the list, so that the Minister can explain, to the House and to anyone else who might be interested, how we got into a situation in which the Government have introduced legislation that is frankly a complete and utter Horlicks from beginning to end.

For example, the Act provides for an escalator for the fees charged for big pubs in town centres where there are problems. That is fine—we understand the "polluter pays" principle—but why will nightclubs not have to pay an escalating fee as well? Nightclubs contribute equally to the problem in many of our town centres, yet they will get away scot-free. That simply does not make sense. Why will pubs have to pay £1,200 for the first year and £700 in subsequent years, when nightclubs will pay nothing? We know the answer. The legislation defined nightclubs as not being primarily for the sale of alcohol. The Government should have spotted that and done something about it.

At Question Time yesterday, I raised the issue of a special saturation policy. Surely the Minister must acknowledge that only about one in five local authorities have availed themselves of what might have been a good opportunity for local communities to control problems in their locality, because, as Andrew McNeill, the director of the Institute of Alcohol Studies says,

"it's going to be a legal minefield".

We need a solution to that problem.

The right hon. Member for Maidenhead and the Minister have talked about a late surge in applications. Has it not occurred to the Minister why there is a late surge? It is because of the way in which the Act is framed. It says, bizarrely, that if someone applied for their new licence on the first named day, back on 7 February, they would next have to pay for their renewed licence on 7 February next year. However, if they delay applying for their licence for as long as possible, they will not have to pay for their renewed licence until very much later. So there is a perverse incentive for people to delay their applications, and it should come as no surprise that that is what pubs and clubs are doing.

The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) is not in his place at the moment, but I know that he is particularly exercised about this aspect of the Act. He had a debate on the subject in Westminster Hall on 2 June, during which I intervened on the Minister and asked him to explain a number of potential anomalies in the legislation. I should like to give the Minister the opportunity to do that tonight, because he has now had more than a month to work out his answers.

Can the Minister tell me whether the licensee of a hotel will breach the Licensing Act if a 16-year-old is left by themselves in a room in that hotel that has a mini-bar? Hoteliers are concerned to know. Clearly, after a month, the hon. Gentleman still does not know. I shall try again with another point. Is it illegal for a 16-year-old to go into a supermarket between midnight and 5 am to buy a loaf of bread, if that supermarket is selling alcohol?

James Purnell: That is perfectly legal, and on the hon. Gentleman's other point, we have no policy objective of making that illegal either, so both those points are distractions.

Mr. Foster: The question is not whether that is a policy objective but whether the legislation makes it illegal or not. Can the Minister tell us whether it is legal in relation to the hotel?

James Purnell indicated assent.

Mr. Foster: It is legal. Good. Many people will be delighted to know that we have an answer. Equally, however, many questions remain unanswered.

In relation to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) about carnivals, the Minister has said that the Government will look into his helpful suggestion. The Minister should be aware, however, that under the current legislation a float in a carnival can legally go ahead and not require a licence, but the marching band coming behind the float is likely to be in breach of the legislation, which is why carnivals, which are often hybrids of floats and marching bands, are so concerned.

The Minister agreed to look into the issue of circuses, but we still do not have clear answers. He has also agreed to look into the issue of village and community halls, but again we do not have clear examples. In relation to temporary event notices, he says that consultation on the details has not even started, and he said interestingly today that the number of events in a particular village or community hall will be considered before such a temporary event notice will be given, which will be welcomed by the House.

The Government have also made a Horlicks in their failure to do much about the legislation once they got it through Parliament. The Minister has only recently been on his grand tour, having all his press conferences, having photographs taken and sending out leaflets. It was far, far too late. The Government must take much of the blame for the low take-up, not only because of the fee structure but because of the failure to publicise the legislation.

Is the Minister aware of the problem in respect of theatres? We are told of a figure of 33 per cent. overall, but I have evidence that only 10 per cent. of theatres have so far applied. Will he advertise to them the need to do something? Why are so many parent-teacher associations, individual schools and others still applying in their droves to magistrates courts for licences for events that will take place after 24 November? Clearly, they have not yet been told that they need to do something differently.

Why have local authorities, which were abiding by the guidance issued by the Department, only recently started to be slightly more flexible about whether they can accept application forms in the wrong colour ink? Many application forms have been rejected because they are in the wrong red ink. At long last, the Department has said that local authorities should forget the guidance that it issued, and that it was perhaps a bit over the top. [Interruption.] That is true, and the Minister should be aware of it.

All that is not surprising, because everything was done so late in the day. The fee regulations were published on 20 January this year, only two weeks before the first appointed day, 7 February. Interestingly, as Members will know, the House did not get round to debating the fee regulations until 23 February, long after the first appointed day, which incidentally is in clear breach of the parliamentary 21-day protocol.

Delay in respect of the pub use class orders also raises issues. We were told that pubs were going to be made a single class order. A press release issued on behalf of the then Minister for Housing and Planning on 27 November 2003, was entitled, "Hill calls time on high street blight". But when was legislation brought before the House? As we know, the Government acted 14 months later, on 21 January 2005, and yet there is clear evidence that in the intervening period there was a huge upsurge in the number of pubs and clubs on our high streets, the competition between which drove down the price of drinks and led to the development of the happy-hour culture.

I genuinely believe, and I say to the Minister, that there is no evidence to suggest that the Act will help deal with binge drinking. It is clear that it is extremely uncertain that it will. It would therefore be sensible to delay implementation. The Government could and should be doing a number of things, such as providing for better labelling of alcoholic drinks, more funds for treatment of alcohol abuse and improved alcohol education in our schools—and what about at least giving the House some benchmark statistics to enable us to judge whether the Act, if implemented, will have led to the improvements that the Minister has claimed for it? We have seen no evidence of the Government's willingness even to consider producing agreed figures of that kind.

We also need to know about a minimum price policy. At present there is total confusion over the ruling of the Office of Fair Trading on whether local authorities have power to set a minimum price for drinks.

The Act was rushed through, not as a result of a desire to deal with binge drinking but to pander to the youth vote, as we know from the infamous text message

"Cldnt give a XXXX for last orders? Vote Labour for xtra time."

We know why the legislation was introduced. It was not introduced to address the issues of binge drinking. It was introduced in haste, without thought. Indeed, as the Minister said, the Government are still thinking about it now. It is full of problems, and is causing a great deal of difficulty to a great many people. It would be far better to concentrate on some of the other measures that could deal with binge drinking before implementing the Licensing Act.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. For about half an hour this evening, Members and Peers were prevented from entering the building while the House was sitting. If the sitting had been suspended or the building had been evacuated, that would have been a legitimate reason for refusing entry. However, if it is the Metropolitan Police Commissioner who, in contravention of the Sessional Orders, has prevented Members from entering, may I ask for Mr. Speaker to request the Home Secretary to come and make a statement to the House? I believe that that is a serious contempt of Parliament and know of no constitutional precedent for Members being refused entry while the House is in session.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I understand that what the hon. Gentleman says about access is true. Whatever has been done will have been done with the knowledge and under the direction of Mr. Speaker.

8.42 pm

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): What we need are more flexible opening hours, and that is one welcome aspect of the Act. Flexible opening hours will certainly be a big improvement on the current position. Few if any establishments will want to open for 24 hours. Indeed, I think the Minister confirmed that none had applied to do so. A more flexible system to replace a single chucking-out time will probably lead to a more staggered leaving of pubs and clubs—if that is the right term to use in this context. It would not work if some pubs closed at 1 am, some at 2 am and some at 3 am, because people would simply move from one to another, but I think that the later such establishments stay open, the more likely people are to disperse gradually. The current thinking of the Tyneside police is that the appropriate time is 3 am. I do not know whether that is the case, but it is probably about right.

The Act will be an improvement on the current system because of that greater flexibility and because there will be a single licence rather than the six for which people must often apply nowadays. After the initial registration, there will be less red tape. The Act will also bring more local control and more consideration of the needs of local communities.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Given the concerns of many chief constables, might it not have been better to trial the arrangements in certain towns to establish whether they would indeed reduce binge drinking and the violence that results from it?

Mr. Clelland: So far as I am aware, this proposal has been trialled throughout Europe, and notably in Scotland, for many years. The experience is that flexible opening does lead to less binge drinking and to less trouble on the streets.

The Act will also give local representatives more power to control licensed premises in their area in the interests of the local community, and to tailor activities and opening hours accordingly. For instance, local authorities might treat pubs and clubs on housing estates differently from those in city centres. But there is no doubt that implementation has led to some problems and I hope that the Minister will look again at how some of them might be alleviated. I do not share in the doom and gloom and cries of "Chaos!" from Opposition Members, but there are some issues that need to be addressed.

Last week, I had the honour to be elected joint chair of the all-party group on non-profit-making members' clubs. There are more than 5,000 of these private clubs throughout the country, and they are covered by the Working Men's Club and Institute Union and the Committee of Registered Clubs' Associations. Such clubs include working men's clubs, Royal British Legion clubs, RAF clubs, and Labour, Conservative and Liberal clubs. They are run for, and by, the members themselves. The members elect the committees and the committees elect the secretaries. They do not have the resources or the professional expertise of the big organisations. They are run by—dare I say it?—amateurs, although often very professionally. Some do have full-time secretaries, but they are not the professionals whom we expect to see in the big organisations.

There is no doubt that many club secretaries have found filling in the 18-page form daunting. I agree with the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May)—that does not happen often—that, regardless of the number of boxes that club secretaries eventually need to tick, they still have to read the entire form to decide which need to be ticked and which do not. I spoke to one of my local club secretaries—a very intelligent man who runs an excellent club—as recently as last Saturday, and on first receiving the form, he found it daunting and put it away in a drawer. On looking at it carefully some time later, he discovered that it was not as daunting as he first thought. On the other hand, club secretaries are often elderly and not necessarily computer literate. They have found dealing with these issues difficult, which may explain why less than 25 per cent. of clubs have returned their applications to date. Of course, the rate of return is increasing as 6 August appears on the horizon, but that in itself could cause problems as local authorities struggle to deal with an avalanche of applications. The Minister will doubtless want, as he has said, to stick to the deadline, but it is obvious that there will have to be some flexibility.

I am afraid to say that there has also been a considerable increase in the associated costs for clubs. A £16 licence will now cost £190, and to that must be added the cost of solicitors. The right hon. Member for Maidenhead said that solicitors have a licence to print money, but they have never needed a licence—they do it without one. Architects' plans are very expensive and we should also consider the cost of advertising. Some newspapers have capitalised on the situation by doubling the cost of such advertising. Clubs are having to fork out as much as £1,000—that is not an unusual sum—to comply with the administration associated with this legislation, so this is a problem. The Minister said that the legislation will save the industry some £2 million a year, but it will not save working men's clubs and non-profit making members' clubs that sort of money. They do not make a profit, so the extra costs will have to fall on the members.

On Monday, I asked the Minister whether he would include a representative of clubs on the licensing fees review panel, which Sir Les Elton will chair. The fee structure is a very important issue for clubs, so I hope that he will look at it and that more can be done to help clubs through that vehicle. Will he also look at the way in which local authorities are handling this matter? There is evidence to suggest that some councils and some police forces are pressurising clubs into applying for a premises licence, rather than the club premises certificate. That might make matters easier for local authorities and the police, but it will not be advantageous to clubs. They would be well advised not to take that course and to stick to the premises certificate.

There are some advantages for clubs in the new legislation. One is that they will be able to hold up to 12 special events in which non-members can participate without having to apply each time for a special licence. That will apply to weddings, christenings, birthdays and so forth and is to be welcomed. That was the intention. However, we now find that some local authorities take the view that if "The Dog and Duck" darts team visits the local club for a game of darts, that represents one of those special events. If that happens, all the special events in most clubs will be taken up in the first month, which I am sure is not what the Minister intended. I hope that he will look further into the problem and ensure that local authorities are advised that that is not the intention behind the Act.

In its operation, once up and running, the Act will be an improvement on the legislation that it replaces. It contains many welcome provisions and will make for a more flexible and less bureaucratic system. However, for whatever reason, it is causing initial difficulties and could lead to some smaller clubs and organisations losing their rights to trade after 24 November. I realise that that is not what Ministers want or intend and, with a little readjustment and a little rethinking, I am sure that the problems can be overcome.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): My right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) provided us with a long list of complainants and most of the complaints also apply to my constituency. However, I want to focus on one particular aspect—village halls. The Prime Minister gave us a glimmer of hope, and the Leader of the House a faint glimmer of hope the next day, but I have to say that, in a Westminster Hall debate, the Minister brushed aside village halls in about five words. He seems to be a little more amenable this evening. I rather hope that we can secure much more rapid progress than he suggested in his opening speech.

As I mentioned in an intervention during the Westminster Hall debate, my constituency has about 32 villages, almost all of which have halls as well as churches that also have halls. I estimate a total of about 50 such halls in my constituency.

I cannot remember receiving so much vitriolic correspondence from so many people as I have received in connection with these halls. I would like to present to the Minister a few extracts from those letters. People from the Leigh village hall, for example, justly proclaimed that the hall was "a central component of village life, providing the premises in which many activities are pursued. It is managed and maintained by a group of very publicly-spirited villagers, who give considerable time and effort to ensure it is always available as a clean" and attractive venue. They are deeply concerned about the new regulations and the fees, which they believe are already discouraging their voluntary helpers. It is, they state,

"the antithesis of proclaimed government intent to support and reinvigorate rural communities such as Leigh."

Their point is that people living in rural areas who

"give up their time, on a voluntary basis, to support their village hall" after returning home from work in the evenings or on Saturday and Sunday mornings

"are alarmed at encroaching regulation, which makes it increasingly difficult to sustain their hall", which plays an "essential part" of village life.

Another example is from people associated with the Beare Green village hall. I shall pick out just a few points from a very long letter. The letter explains that the hall has been sustained up to now on the basis of making a tiny profit from each event. It runs a number of events and views a good profit as £100. Presently, six event licences cost £10 in total, but under the new regime, each temporary event notice licence will cost £21, putting the total up to £126, which obliterates more than the profit from one event.

A letter from Ripley village hall states:

"The appointment of a Premises Supervisor will be virtually impossible due to the unreasonable burdens placed upon the position."

Another example comes from one of my tiniest villages with a tiny hall. Thus, Holmbury St. Mary

"would like to emphasise that for small, multi-use halls such as ours, which are run entirely by volunteers for a local rural community, this new Act is a nightmare. The paperwork is oppressive whilst the limit of only 12 functions per year at which alcohol can be present is far too small."

Thirty is the number that it would like.

I am aware that some of my hon. Friends want to add to my comments, so I shall be prompt. Essentially, under the new regime, people associated with my village halls feel that there is excessive bureaucracy. They have to produce plans, but they are not clear why they are required. Some have felt the need, as mentioned earlier, to consult lawyers and they are also required to produce an operating schedule—whatever that is for these tiny little halls.

Generally, each of these little village halls is run by a small group of people who are bullied and cajoled into serving. No one wants to be the designated licence holder. All the people to whom I have spoken think it ludicrous that the temporary event notice licence has been set at one dozen, and most would like the limit to be three or four dozen. Moreover, all of them feel that the fees are far too high, especially given the minimal profit—if any—that the halls make. The House must bear it in mind that most village halls are run for the community, not for profit.

Some positive points have been made in the debate. I hope that the Minister will take them forward, and that he will do so quickly, as village halls that do not break even will close and never open again. I am tempted to suggest that Ministers might consider setting a de minimis level for some of the very small halls. Such halls serve very small communities and are run by a very few people, and they could easily fall below the de minimis level.

In such cases, there is clearly a need for a dramatic reduction in the fees. I hope that the Minister will consider changing the thinking behind the Act slightly and introducing the concept of personal licence holders for temporary events. Under that proposal, the person running an event would apply for a licence, at the previous level of £10. He or she would take responsibility for the event, with the result that the hall would not have to provide a person who would be personally responsible.

Local halls are vital in rural areas such as mine. Surrey is full of such halls, and they are of enormous value. Events such as Guy Fawkes night, Christmas and new year's eve will be on us soon, and the House must remember that local halls also present film evenings, opera sessions and so on. Although he does not come from a rural area, I hope that the Minister will accept that they play a very important role. We must save our village halls but, if it is not changed, this Act will destroy them.

8.57 pm

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I rise to support the amendment and oppose the motion. The somewhat apocalyptic opening speech by the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) did not do justice to the real issues in this matter. In contrast, the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) gave a much clearer demonstration of the genuine difficulties and offered a much more constructive approach to dealing with them.

The right hon. Member for Maidenhead presented an apocalyptic vision of what local communities would be like after 24 November, with thousands of desperate drinkers milling around the streets looking for a bar that was open and congratulating those publicans who had managed to surmount the bureaucratic obstacles placed in their way by the Government. Similarly, I could imagine the heroes of my local Wednesbury rugby club turning up for after-match celebrations based on sandwiches and diet Coke. Again, according to the hon. Lady, toddlers and mothers would be crying in the street because they could not hold sessions for young people in halls and clubs whose locked doors bore the notice, "Closed Due to Government Bureaucracy".

I do not want to pour scorn on the genuine problems that people have raised, but overstating the case does the argument against the Act little good. I trawled through my memory for complaints that I had received about the legislation and recalled that, when the idea was first mooted 18 months ago, one sports club told me that it was worried that its bar might be priced out of activity. However, since the publication of the fees and the various regulations, I have received no correspondence whatever on the matter.

I have received correspondence from any number of my electors about nuisance from pubs, about antisocial behaviour generated by binge drinking youths and about clubs and publicans who were not prepared to recognise the legitimate concern of their neighbours about noise nuisance. I do not want to stigmatise the whole profession, because some publicans are responsible and are concerned about their locality and operate in a way that is compatible with good relations; none the less, there is substantial concern about the antisocial behaviour that is often associated with drinking.

The Act was passed in July 2003, so, by 24 November, people will have had two years and five months to apply for a licence and to get acquainted with the Act's provisions. The Government have not been passive. The Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell), who is not in the Chamber at present, listed the activities in which he has been involved to promote the legislation and the need to apply for a licence.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): It is only fair to point out that, in most local authority areas, the forms and guidance for applying for the new licences have been available only since the beginning of April, not two and a half years as the hon. Gentleman suggested.

Mr. Bailey: No, but the hon. Gentleman overlooks the fact that there was debate with the industry and trade associations long before that. They were involved in drafting the regulations and the form from August 2004 until their publication in January or February 2005. They have had plenty of opportunity to become acquainted with the legislation and to understand the application process before the licences were available.

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): When the actions that the Minister spoke about earlier are supplemented locally by a proactive local authority, we can see the results. In my local authority, Brighton and Hove city council, until the beginning of last week, 78 per cent. of the premises expected to apply for a new licence had done so and more did so at the beginning of the week—I declare a non-registerable interest, as I have done before, as my wife is chair of its licensing committee. National action coupled with a proactive local licensing authority, offering support to the trade, can pay off. Does my hon. Friend agree?

Mr. Bailey: I most certainly agree. Indeed, my hon. Friend has just taken the next section of my speech from me.

When I consulted my local authority, Sandwell metropolitan borough council, it was clear that it saw no problem. It has engaged in a consultation and advisory exercise with people who were affected by the legislation locally. The authority anticipates being able to meet demand for applications from would-be licensees and has said that, if it is necessary for staff to work long, extra hours to get the licences through in time, they will do so. It reflects well on the local authority and emphasises the point made by my hon. Friend. With a proactive Government and a proactive local authority, the difficulties can be overcome.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw) mentioned the kebab trade association, and that is an area of concern. In Sandwell, we have 23 kebab sellers, not one of which has as yet applied for the licence. I make a public offer to the Minister—unfortunately he is not in his place, but I am sure that his colleague will convey it to him—to come to Sandwell and share a kebab at one of our magnificent local culinary establishments to promote the need to license them. I assure him of a warm welcome.

Chris Bunne: What role does my hon. Friend feel that an MP can play in raising the issue of licensing in his constituency?

Mr. Bailey: That is a good point. For a start, they can speak in the Chamber to advertise the issue. I shall certainly ensure that my press release goes out to emphasise the point. When MPs know, after consultation with the local authority, that certain groups of licensees have not yet engaged with the process, they have an obligation to ensure that those people are informed of the need for a licence. We should do everything in our power to promote the new procedure.

I note that the Opposition want to extend the deadline for the submission of applications, but I seriously caution against that. Whatever deadlines are set, some people—for a variety of reasons—will not meet them. Penalties accrue if people do not return their tax forms, but some still fail to do so. If we put back the deadlines, the danger is that it will send the wrong messages to people. The Government have already had one of the longest possible consultation periods and extended the deadline already. A further extension would send the message that there is not much pressure on applicants to send in their forms, and that would be counter-productive. Selling alcohol is a serious professional responsibility. If people wish to sell alcohol in our local communities but cannot—after the whole process we have been through—get an application in on time, it raises serious questions about whether they should be allowed to do so.

My greatest concern is that, if we postpone the deadlines, we would also postpone all the other aspects of the legislation to deal with drunken and antisocial behaviour, including possible enforced closures and increased fines, which the public want. The Opposition's argument is that, because some difficulties have been experienced with the applications and fees from the licences, the whole raft of benefits from the legislation—which the majority of the public desperately want—should be postponed. That is not a credible position.

The Act is deregulatory, which the Opposition say they favour. It is cost-effective and, in the long run, will be simpler for those involved. Above all, it provides much needed associated provisions that would deal with the social problems that plague us day in and day out. I therefore support the Government's position on the legislation.

9.9 pm

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey). I am pleased that, in his considered opinion, he thinks that the measure is deregulatory. I invite him to spend some time with Mr. Rodney Tate, chairman of the Swineshead village hall management committee, to whom I shall refer again later, who spent at least a week of his life dealing with the complexities of the 2003 Act, so that he can discuss his view of its deregulatory nature. I am not sure whether that meeting should take place at the village hall or in the kebab shop, but perhaps they could come to an accommodation there.

I shall do my best to be brief, as other hon. Members want to speak and an awful lot has been said already. I wish to tell the Minister that I revert to my usual position, which is that very few items of legislation are wholly bad or wholly good. I put the point to him that I put to the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell): Conservative Members' complaint is that all the evidence suggests that certain aspects of the legislation are defective and possibly highly damaging. What we seek on behalf of our constituents is a review of those items that are most damaging.

I am not persuaded by what the Minister said, when he suggested that, because of his meeting with ACRE this afternoon, the concerns of village halls have been well taken into account during the consultation procedure. Hon. Members with village halls in their constituencies know that those representing village halls have been engaged in an active national campaign for months to draw the attention of the Minister and the Government to their concerns. An eleventh-hour meeting shortly before the Act is implemented is hardly evidence of consultation or good faith.

I was not particularly taken in by that suggestion; nor was I particularly convinced by the fact that the matters in the Minister's remit about which he could take quick and urgent decisions were being referred to Sir Les for adjudication. It is unfortunate, of course, that the very mention of Sir Les brings to all our minds the great Sir Les Patterson, as personified by Barry Humphries, who knew so much about the cultural delights of alcohol that he was made the cultural attaché to the Court of St. James's. I know that this Sir Les is not the same one, but I think that he will live in our minds because of that very identification.

I wish to refer briefly to the efforts made by my constituent, Rodney Tate, who has been engaged in long correspondence with both newspapers and others to set out the problems. I pay tribute to him. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford), I am picking out one example—I could pick out many more, as there are 54 parish councils, well over 70 villages and a lot of village halls in my constituency. Rodney's criticisms are shared by a good number of others. I am grateful to Sue Norman of the Bedfordshire Rural Communities Charity, who has also been very active on behalf of village halls, which she loves and promotes. She shares with many others genuine concerns about the legislation's impact.

Rodney has been mentioned before in a previous speech as bringing the House up to date about these concerns. Swineshead is a village with 125 people in the northern part of North-East Bedfordshire. It has no pub—the pub closed about 10 years ago—and no shop. An active village hall committee is absolutely vital to the village's well-being. Profits are modest and are used to benefit the village, so the taking away of any profits in extra bureaucracy makes a substantial difference.

Notwithstanding the review that is sent to Sir Les, I ask the Minister to pay urgent and immediate attention to issues that relate to cost in the first instance. The village hall's direct licensing costs this year will increase from £10 per annum to £240. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) mentioned, the annual renewal charge will be £70 for that village hall. Villagers can think of better uses for that hard-raised money than spending it on those extra costs.

The excessive bureaucracy was somewhat dismissed by the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West, but Mr. Tate tells us that he has spent a total of a week on seminars, form filling and correspondence. He draws attention to the fact that thousands of on-licence premises now need to apply for a variation of their new premises licences so that they can retain the extended opening hours over bank holiday weekends that were previously granted by magistrates' block extensions. As the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) said in his good and measured speech, that leads to extra fees, advertisements and notices to official bodies, so there is more bureaucracy to do something that is currently achieved with little fuss.

When the Minister conducts his review, will he consider the different interpretations of the Act by local authorities that is leading to different levels of fees being charged in otherwise similar circumstances? The duties of designated premises supervisors has again been raised because their onerous nature is driving people away from volunteering to do that important social job in their villages.

Additionally, individuals need to be trained to get a personal licence. Mr. Tate tells me that such training costs about £150, but the training needed for the licence holder at Swineshead village hall gives him the power to be the licence holder at much bigger premises, such as a town-centre pub. There is no correlation between the two roles, so the licence is being used inappropriately. It is ridiculous to train someone in a village hall in all the techniques required to run a big city-centre pub.

Mr. Walker: Will my hon. Friend tell the House how many times the police have been called to Swineshead village hall to deal with disturbances over the past decade?

Alistair Burt: My postbag is remarkably silent about that. Scratching my head, I suspect that the answer is between nil and one, but I shall let the House know if that turns out to be wrong. My hon. Friend makes a fair point.

Mr. Tate was recently required to adhere to special conditions of the public entertainment licence that is now required at Swineshead village hall. Condition 3 said that by 31 March 2006, the village hall had to "arrange for and maintain at least one Senior Member of staff"—

Mr. Tate does not have any members of staff—

"to be the holder of the British Institute of InnKeeping Awarding Body's ... National Certificate for Entertainment Licensees."

That seems to be rather unnecessary, as Mr. Tate pointed out in his letter to the local authority.

Another special condition has caused even greater concern in Swineshead. Bedford borough council's special condition 8 told the people of Swineshead:

"There shall be no provision of lap, pole, table or podium dancing or similar style dancing or striptease without prior written consent of the Service Manager (Registration and Administration). This Licence does not constitute such written consent."

Mr. Tate was proper enough to respond to the borough council. He wrote:

"Condition 8 seems wholly inappropriate for a small rural village hall, but since we should never wish to engage in the banned practices, we should not object to this condition."

I merely point out to the House the nonsense of such a condition even being suggested to a village hall, notwithstanding the fact that now that I have publicised it, I might be inundated with letters from the good people from Swineshead who perhaps do not agree with their chairman's quick approach on such a condition.

I shall rest my case. Conservative Members have tried to suggest that elements of the Act are nonsense for village halls. Despite the humour that some objections have caused, the serious point is exactly that raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley. The people who run village halls are volunteers, so the burden of their paperwork will be onerous. The money taken out of village halls due to bureaucracy will be lost to communities.

People genuinely fear that damage will be caused. This is not scaremongering; it is real for those who have been campaigning on the matter for a long time. If the Minister and his colleagues can encourage Sir Les to conduct a rapid review of the circumstances and make some concessions for village halls, perhaps the Bill's good aspects will not be swept away with concerns about the bad.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), who put his case in his usual measured way. I feel I now know everything there is to know about Swineshead, and am all the better for it. I can boast more villages in my constituency than he can. I have 88, many with pubs and village halls, and I am doing my bit to publicise the licensing laws by going around as many of them as I can.

I look forward immensely to 24 November. It will be a great day in our history when we finally sweep away the licensing laws, dating from Lloyd George and the first world war. At last, we will be able to go out and have a drink after going to the theatre or cinema and will not have to pay large amounts to go into a club environment. At last, when I am wandering around some of the 88 villages in my constituency and happen on a pub near to closing time that has its curtains drawn and is staying open after 11 o'clock, I will not have to leave as the Member of Parliament because it will be legal for well-run premises to stay open that late. As chairman of the all-party group on beer, it is almost worth throwing a party to celebrate that day when it comes.

I noticed two different approaches from the Opposition parties. The Liberal Democrats took a fundamental approach. Unlike some of my colleagues, I like Liberal Democrats. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I do. Progressives are few and far between in North Yorkshire. It was once a completely blue county and we had many alliances. It is a cause of particular disappointment to me that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) has gone back to the original Lloyd George position. The logic of his argument is that there should be no flexibility in opening hours. What would that do for binge drinking? People who go out under our current restrictive licensing laws are younger people. Our towns and city centres would remain dominated by them and they would have the same incentives to drink far too much far too quickly.

According to an incomplete survey by the all-party beer group, more than 2,000 licensed premises have applied for extended hours. They do not want 24-hour opening, but an extra hour or two on a Thursday, Friday or Saturday. Those premises have had no objections and the applications have gone through on the nod. The only controversial application that I have been involved in was for the Charles pub in Heslington village. It is a student pub with a long record of complaints of noise and nuisance, and the application was rejected.

I worry about the change in the Liberal Democrats' position. The hon. Gentleman said—I am sorry he is not in the Chamber to hear my little critique—that it is a pity that only a fifth of local councils have adopted the saturation clauses. Many rural districts do not have the problems of saturation of licensed premises that might be found in urban areas. It is not surprising that only a few of them have taken up that option.

I advise the hon. Gentleman to be careful in his choice of quotes. He called in aid the Institute of Alcohol Studies as part of his criticism. One of its main funding bodies is the UK Temperance Alliance, which approaches the debate in a certain way.

[Mr. John Grogan]

On village halls and sports clubs, the Minister has not done at all badly in recent weeks in grasping the issues quickly. Perhaps village hall and sports club secretaries are made of sterner stuff in Selby than they are in Surrey, but I have had only one letter on the subject. I do not mean to decry the seriousness of the subject. The one sports group that wrote to me is having to pay a £300 fee. On the other hand, it is getting £17,000 in rate relief from the Government. It is a large sports club. I worry more about the smaller sports clubs and some of the smaller village halls.

Some interesting ideas have been put to the Minister, such as basing rateable value on the size of the bar and extending somewhat the number of temporary event notices. However, until Sir Les Elton undertakes his study and takes his evidence, it will be difficult to judge the impact of raising the number of temporary event notices from 12 to 15. What difference would that make to village halls? How many village halls would that help? By bringing forward the initial study and the initial review by 12 months so that we have the report by November, I think that my hon. Friend the Minister is responding to criticisms that are real but can be exaggerated.

In the week that we won the Olympics, I hope that some of the London councils will now adopt a less churlish approach to the Act. The leader of Westminster city council has been quoted in a positive way. I am glad that he is beginning to recognise the potential for the development of London's entertainment sector in a safe way but also in an innovative way, now that councils have a say in licensing. We do not need a great structure of bureaucracy to implement the provisions in the Act in Westminster or in any of the London authorities, as health and safety and environment provisions are already very much in place. The fire authority is also in place, so those provisions do not need to be replicated.

We need, however, to get a night life in London that is fit for the Olympic games. One of the first meetings that I went to about licensing laws was held by an organisation called London First. It said that we would never get a great sporting event unless we had a safe and varied night life of which we could be proud. We have six or seven years to get that right.

The hon. Member for Bath has missed most of my critique, but as someone who went to Singapore and argued the case strongly for Britain, can he imagine having the Olympic games in London in 2012 without having some form of flexible opening hours? Will all the many visitors to London and all the many athletes, unlike in Athens last summer, have to go home at 11 pm? What a laughing stock we would be if that were the case.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I have a long-standing interest in the subject of the debate. My constituency was one of the very last in Wales to put an end to Sunday closing, which was one of the last gasps of specifically Welsh 19th century liberalism. As we used to say in my constituency, "If you want to drink on Sunday, you will have to wait until Monday."

I share with other Members serious concern about the hard-drinking culture that seems to be prevalent, particularly among young people. I represent a tourist area, and there are concerns about the effects of the Act on small bed-and-breakfast businesses. My particular concern, which I have taken up with the Minister before, relates to the unavailability of Welsh language application forms so close to the deadline of 6 August. This might be a small matter in the grand scheme of things but it is particularly important to my constituency and to other constituencies in Wales.

As I have said, I have discussed the matter with the Minister previously. I had a useful meeting with him, along with my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and others. I am glad that the Minister has moved from his initial position with reference to the non-production of Welsh language forms when he said:

"The decision was taken that as most of the applications would be processed in English, it would be better for them to be submitted in English".—[Official Report, 13 June 2005; Vol. 434, c. 8.]

That is decidedly not the case.

I raised a further question with him yesterday because the situation has moved on in that Conwy county borough council in north Wales has now produced Welsh versions of the prescribed English forms. These Welsh versions are not prescribed, and I take the point that the Minister has made that it will not now be possible to prescribe Welsh language forms for another three months or so. However, the Minister has indicated that the Government are willing for local authorities in Wales to use the Conwy translation for now. That is all right as far as it goes, but some local authorities worry that a precedent might be established. If central Government have not provided the appropriate Welsh language documents, those authorities fear that they may be expected to step in. I hope that the current circumstances are unique and that no such precedent has been set.

There are, however, further problems. Some local authorities may take the prudent view that they should not use forms that are not officially prescribed. Would they be liable if there were a dispute with an unsuccessful applicant, who could cite the fact that the Welsh forms that they used were not prescribed? More straightforwardly, who would be liable if there was a mistake in translation? Licensees might reasonably expect to use officially prescribed Welsh language forms and could be wary about using locally produced versions. Hon. Members may wonder how the situation has arisen and how the Government have got into a fix so close to the 6 August deadline. Essentially, the problems arise from a deficiency in the Welsh Language Act 1993, which provides for the publication of Welsh language schemes that provide guidance on the production of Welsh language material. It is surprising that, 12 years after the passage of the Act, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport has not prepared a Welsh language scheme. It has not been asked to do so, but I understand that it will now prepare such a scheme, which is most welcome.

Finally, on a positive note, the Minister will be glad to hear that subsequent to our discussions, my own local authority, Gwynedd county council will adopt and adapt the Conwy forms. Those forms may be used in only a small number of cases, but I hope that they will solve the problem. The council will also take steps to publicise the availability of the Welsh language forms, and will target information at applicants who may wish to use them. I do not know whether all local authorities in Wales will take such action, but the positive steps taken by Gwynedd county council are welcome. It has pointed out, however, that Conwy county borough council has translated only five of the 100 or so forms available in English. The sooner that all prescribed forms are available in Welsh the better.

As I said, the problem has arisen because of a weakness in the 1993 Act. DCMS was not asked to produce a Welsh language scheme, so it was not prompted to produce Welsh language forms. In Wales, that is interpreted as a reason for a further review of the Act and, indeed, as proof that it needs to be replaced. That is certainly my position, and it is the position of my party.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) for keeping his speech brief and giving me an opportunity to address the House. I have discussed the issue with the Minister on previous occasions because, unlike the constituents of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey), two categories of people in my area have been inadvertently affected, including small, independent publicans. Much of the Licensing Act 2003 appears to have been drafted to allow major pub-owning groups to comply with the immense additional bureaucracy that, as I have seen for myself, is involved in the initial application. I appreciate that the application may not have to be repeated, but for a publican operating on his own, perhaps with the help of his wife—many of the pubs that are still going in villages in my rural constituency are run in that way—the prospect of having to complete a 77-page application is overwhelming. In a village near Bridgnorth that I shall not name for fear of precipitating problems, the publican is in the throes of deciding whether to carry on, given the challenge of completing the application form, not least the requirement to provide a seating plan of his pub. For what purpose? What on earth has that got to do with having a licence or not having a licence? There may be other health and safety reasons, such as fire regulations, for providing a seating plan showing the position of the chairs, but that has nothing to do with a licence. That is one category about which I am concerned.

As the Minister is present, I want to raise an issue that was touched on by the hon. Member for Caernarfon—small guest houses. He mentioned bed and breakfasts in his constituency. We have a number of small guest houses in some of the towns in my constituency. I am thinking particularly of Church Stretton, an area that is trying to attract rural tourism. A number of the small houses there might have two or three bedrooms for use as bed-and-breakfast accommodation. They have a licence for the sale of the odd bottle of wine. The Minister said that the legislation would save money for these licence holders. At present a three-year licence costs £30. The licensees now face a tenfold increase in the cost of obtaining a licence. If they are selling only a few bottles of wine a year, I am told they will not bother to carry on doing so. So the Act may reduce the services available to the tourists in the area, making it less attractive and reducing economic activity.

My constituent who runs The Studio restaurant in Church Stretton was unfortunate enough to go up a rateable value band as a result of the change in the rateable valuation. As a result, his fee will increase not just by 10 times the current charge, but more like 20 times, from £30 to £730 for no reason whatsoever, other than that his rateable value just tipped him over into band B.

The second category, village halls, has been mentioned by many hon. Members. Rather than quote at length from the raft of examples raised with me by village hall committees, I shall pick up two points to illustrate the financial viability question posed by the legislation and a point about TENs. Brian Wilkes, who is the chairman of the Cleobury North and district village hall committee, tells me that the village hall

"is run entirely by volunteers and last year the income was less than £3,000, with expenses of £3,600. The difference was met by donations and fundraising. We are applying for a new licence under 'grandfather rights', however this would restrict us as we would only be allowed 12 licensed events each year."

He is concerned that the committee will not be able to put on sufficient events to meet its costs.

The other example comes from Mrs. Mollie Oatley MBE, who is the secretary to the management committee of the Newcastle community centre, which is a thriving centre but has running costs of £10,000 per annum. At present the licence is provided by the village publican, Mr. Tony Burton of the Crown Inn, who runs the community bar and provides the profits as a contribution towards the hall.

Because the committee has to hold so many events in order to meet its costs, the 12 permits allowed under the temporary events notice are insufficient, so the committee is contemplating having a full premises licence to allow 50 licensed events per annum. The problem is that Mr. Burton, as the first point of contact, is not prepared to undertake responsibility for that number of occasions during the year. As a consequence, he is proposing to pull out of the arrangement with the community centre and none of the other trustees are prepared to take it on. The point is a serious one, which I hope the Minister will address in his concluding remarks.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): The legislation seems to have been with us since the ark. It is now two years and rising, and the Under-Secretary of State is the third Minister who has been sold this hospital pass. The Minister of State should know better than to have delivered it into his hands in the condition in which it arrived.

Flexible hours was never an issue. Twenty-four-hour drinking was never an issue, as the Minister continually asserts, most recently on the "You and Yours" programme only a few Fridays ago. There are real concerns, though, and there is considerable agreement on both sides of the House about what they are. They include binge drinking; the proliferation of drinking establishments in town and city centres; over-regulation; confusing, unintelligible bureaucracy; and loading unnecessary expense on sports clubs and community and village halls. Conservative Members are absolutely right to raise those matters in this debate.

The motion is not an attack on the whole Act, only on those parts of it that are not working and unlikely to work in the time scale of implementation. We agree with the Government on the objectives—protection of children, flexible opening hours, and new powers for local authorities and the police to tackle nuisance and antisocial behaviour, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey).

However, five months into the application phase of the implementation of the Act, we are hearing alarming stories about the lack of applications, spiralling costs, widespread misunderstandings, and simple mistakes arising from the complexities of the system. In his parliamentary answer to me only a few days ago, the Minister estimated that approximately 47,500 applications for premises licenses and club premises certificates under the Act have been made—that represents approximately 25 per cent. of existing licensed premises and registered clubs—and said that he would expect 65 per cent. of those applications to involve variations. With variations, of course, come the possibility of objections, local hearings and appeals, and the rest of it. Surprisingly, the Minister went on to say that he had no estimate of the number of applications that will have included regulated entertainment as a licensable activity.

The progress of the Act from July 2003 has been dogged by periods of delay and inactivity, accompanied by a refusal by all DCMS Ministers to revisit the timetable although it has been glaringly obvious that the necessary infrastructure has not been in place early enough to move forward to the next stage. It took a whole year for the Government to finalise the guidance to the Act. That guidance, which was acknowledged by both Houses of Parliament as being fundamental to an understanding of the Act, was published only on 7 July 2004, when councils were obliged to draft, consult and finalise their licensing policies. An Act of 201 clauses and guidance of 178 pages takes some understanding. Add to that the fact that at the time none of the secondary regulations had even been drafted, never mind approved, and if ever there was a recipe for confusion right from the start, that was it.

The application in the transition phase runs to more than 245 pages, and copies of the 26-page form that my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) showed to the House have to be sent to eight "responsible authorities" plus the Licensing Authority—nine in total. The number of pages is the same whether or not one wants to change the licence in any way. Thanks to the Government's refusal to grant grandfather rights for the provision of live music under the two-in-a-bar rule and the loss of bank holiday extensions, many businesses will have to fill in 18 pages of the 26-page form that relates to varying the licence. The form is complicated and the process itself is complicated. I have had letters from individuals running clubs—experienced retired business people—who say that it took them 200 hours to complete the form satisfactorily to the Licensing Authority's requirements.

In many cases, the lack of information meant that councils could not release draft policies until September or October, thereby truncating the consultation process and time for consideration. Regulations were finally laid on 13 January to come into force on 7 February, the first appointed day. Even at that stage, the forms on the DCMS website were incorrect and did not conform to the regulations. Corrections had to be made to the forms, which were reissued on 7 February.

It proved difficult, without the forms, the regulations for the required plans, the advertising requirements and other similar details, for businesses and councils to plan ahead. In March, several interested parties, including the Local Government Association, the Local Authorities Coordinators of Local Services, the British Beer and Pub Association, the Association of Licensed Multiple Retailers, the British Institute of Innkeeping, Business in Sport and Leisure and the Association of Chief Police Officers, wrote to the then Minister to express their concern about the lack of applications to licensing authorities.

Several issues, which caused delays and obstructions in the system, were highlighted. They included a lack of awareness of the new law among existing licence holders, especially small independent businesses, and the late laying of regulations. Many of the problems could have been avoided by postponing the start of the application process—that is, the first appointed day. That would have given more time for everyone to get to grips with the intricacies of the process.

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) mentioned the due date for annual fees, which are required to be paid on the anniversary of the granting of a licence. That provides no incentive for early applications. Other problems include: the absence of a slip rule in the regulations, which would allow the correction of minor errors rather than mean the rejection of applications; the implications of alterations to licences after the first appointed day, for example, the change of licensee, and the lack of clarity around aspects of the existing law, which the new Act perpetuates. I refer especially to embedded rights and restrictions about which the DCMS and the Local Government Association cannot agree even at this late hour.

Several hon. Members mentioned village halls, including my hon. Friends the Members for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) and for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead. The Under-Secretary's concession of an offer to revisit TENs is tantamount to accepting that the Act has got it wrong. Although it is reassuring to know that he spoke to representatives of ACRE only today, they must have told him what they told us back in spring 2003. ACRE was not offered meetings then, and the Government arrogantly rejected its sensible proposals for practical implementation of the new licensing regime.

We tabled amendments to address the key issues of the number of temporary permissions, the special case for voluntary and non-profit-making organisations, increased costs for licensing and the added administrative burdens for volunteers in village communities. The relevant amendment in Committee was No. 213, which was moved at column 456 of the Official Report of Standing Committee D on Thursday 8 May 2003. The Under-Secretary need look no further because ACRE gave us that amendment, which deals exactly with the points raised in the debate. It defines a voluntary organisation and it requested the number of TENs to be increased from five to 24. The Government conceded 12. The Under-Secretary's offer to reassess that is welcome but it is frustrating that that could have been sorted out more than a year ago.

Many hon. Members raised the time scale for implementation, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead, the hon. Member for Bath and the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West. The cut-off date of 6 August for transitional applications is probably set in stone at this late hour. However, the second appointed day is not. We still await the statutory instrument to legitimise the date. Since there is no time, I suggest that, before the House goes into recess, the Under-Secretary must be reserving his option to monitor developments through the recess and well into October. I predict that, if a backlog remains, thereby choking up local authority licensing committees, the statutory instrument will not confirm 24 November but a date that is, as my right hon. Friend requested, well into the new year 2006.

We can well understand the Minister's reluctance to indicate any slippage at this juncture, but if the fears of many of those directly involved are realised, the sheer volume of applications sitting with local authorities and the cases queuing up for appeal hearings will force the Minister to do a major U-turn. As with so many sensible and practical suggestions relating to this legislation, "You heard it here first!"

9.49 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): When licensing and entertainment are on the agenda, we always have a lively debate. We have certainly had one this evening. There is broad consensus that the objectives of the Bill—[Interruption.] Well, the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), who is one of the more measured Members of the House, made a very sensible contribution—

Alistair Burt: A short one.

Mr. Caborn: Yes, but it was a very measured one. He homed in on a problem that has been discussed again this evening, namely that of village halls. We will take those issues on board through the high-level committee. One issue has been taken out of context today: Members said that there had been just one meeting with ACRE. There has been a whole series of such meetings, and ACRE welcomed the fact today that we had moved on temporary licensing. I should like to quote ACRE's newsletter of June 2005. It states:

"ACRE (Action with Communities in Rural England) has been following the implementation of the Act and working with the Communications and Strategy Team at DCMS who have been very helpful in explaining the new processes and providing guidance and legal interpretation of the new legislation. They have set up the Live Music Forum to encourage the provision of live music in licensed premises ... and published Countdown to explain the Act in a user-friendly way ... Training sessions for village hall advisers have also taken place with the support of DCMS".

I am not going to say that all the problems have been resolved. Clearly they have not, and a great deal of concern has been expressed this evening. However, let us be clear that what we are trying to do with this piece of legislation is to modernise in a way that most sensible people would want us to. We are reducing bureaucracy by merging six regulatory regimes into one. That is important for this country. This is about bringing the licensing regime into the 21st century. Central to that is the empowerment of local communities by increasing their right of intervention, which will be particularly important in licensing cases. The Act will enhance the democratic accountability and empowerment of local authorities; that is where we believe such powers should lie.

On the problems of binge drinking in modern society, we have removed the nuclear option that existed before. We have expanded police powers the better to enable the police to respond in a proportionate way when tackling crime and antisocial behaviour. That has been welcomed by many, particularly those in the police force and in the Association of Chief Police Officers, which recently reaffirmed its support for the Act.

The Act merges six complicated and, in some cases, outdated regulatory regimes into one. This will affect about 190,000 licensing authorities. We accept that there will be problems with implementation, but we shall be able to implement the provisions in regard to fees and to the operation of the Act, particularly for village halls and sports clubs. The hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) did not choose a very good example of a club. Yesterday at Question Time, the hon. Member for Wimbledon (Stephen Hammond) mentioned Wimbledon cricket club. The club has an adult membership of 1,200, and an additional 800 junior members. It has a 9-acre site and is one of the wealthiest clubs in the country, thanks to the six-figure sum paid to it by its neighbour, the All England Lawn Tennis and Croquet club, which uses the site for car parking and corporate hospitality. It is therefore quite a wealthy club. I know that some Conservative Members might want to prosecute their case that such clubs should not pay the licence fee, but that would be wrong.

The main reason for this major piece of modernisation is something that the Opposition have been crying out for for years, namely the reduction of red tape and bureaucracy. That is what we are going to achieve. We are moving the whole licensing regime in a direction that many people in the tourism industry have been calling for. We have debated the tourism industry many times in the Chamber, and discussed how we want to modernise it and to increase its activity. The Act provides the tools to do that.

In relation to entertainment, which is linked to tourism with regard to central London, it is important that we modernise our licensing regimes. The chairman of the British Beer and Pubs Association said as late as 15 May this year that the Government "have delivered flexibility. We have seen the back of the ludicrous 11 pm closing time."

Therefore, the Act has had tremendous support across the board.

In terms of sports clubs, no Government have helped truly amateur sports clubs more than we have. We introduced mandatory rate relief, for which there have been calls for more than 30 years, and our investment in amateur sports clubs is second to none. If there are problems with genuine sports clubs, we will consider that, as I said that we would with regard to village halls.

I cannot do justice to all the points raised this evening, but I will respond in writing on those that I do not cover. Let me just respond to the point made by the Opposition spokesman about 24-hour opening not being an issue. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), who might be the new leader of the Conservative party, said on 30 June,

"What on earth is the Government doing? In the face of these figures, its policy of 24-hour drinking is nothing short of madness."

And on 8 June, he said:

"Given that a lot of violent crime is caused by binge drinking, it beggars belief that the Government are going ahead with 24-hour opening".

How can Opposition spokesmen say that there is no disagreement about 24-hour opening? They ought to get their act together.

As for the comments of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster)—[Interruption.] The Yorkshire pronunciation is "Bath", although I know that it is "Barth" down there. I think it is also "Bath" in Scotland. On the question of delay, the hon. Member for Bath accused me, as the then Minister with responsibility for licensing, of procrastination and of not bringing the measure forward. At the turn of the year, he changed his mind, as the Liberals are prone to do, and now argues that he wants a delay. We never know where the Liberals stand. On the one hand they argue that they want a delay, while on the other they say they do not. But I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no delay. We will make sure that the Act is implemented.

Mr. Walker: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Caborn: No.

In relation to the points made about the Local Government Association, may I put on record the role that local government and the Local Government Association have played overall in the implementation of the Act? It has been professional, detailed and extremely helpful. I say that from my own experience. As I said at Question Time on Monday, in the case of my trades and labour club, of which I am the honorary president, the volunteer who runs it, Alan Jackson, an ex-National Union of Public Employees steward, has got our licence through without any help from solicitors. That cost under £200, and the club has a turnover of about £500,000 a year. He admitted that it was a little difficult to start with, but once the steward's wife helped with filling out the form, it was pretty simple. The only mistake that Sheffield trades and labour club made in its application for a licence is that while we have all these extensions, we will only be open until 5 o'clock in the morning on general election night. That is disgraceful—as we will win the next two elections, the extension ought to be until midday the following day.

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House commends the Government on its effective publicity campaign that has significantly increased the rate of applications to convert existing licences under the Licensing Act 2003 before 6th August; encourages remaining licensees to fulfill their responsibilities and get their applications in before that date; considers that failure to implement the Act without delay would deny local communities increased powers of intervention and improved democratic accountability with regard to licensing and deny the police the expanded powers that are vital to their efforts to tackle alcohol-related crime and anti-social behaviour; welcomes the powers in the Act to prevent crime and disorder and public nuisance, and protect children from harm; believes that the Act will benefit local communities, local economies and tourism and generate savings for business of almost £2 billion over 10 years; and furthermore, believes that the Act will be successfully implemented by 24th November 2005 and will be welcomed by industry and non-commercial organisations, including village halls and sports clubs, alike.

IDENTITY CARDS BILL (PROGRAMME) (NO. 2)

Ordered,

That the Order of 28th June 2005 (Identity Cards Bill (Programme)) shall be amended, in paragraph 2, by substituting 'Thursday 21st July' for 'Tuesday 19th July.'—[Mr. Dhanda.]

PETITION

Prestwick Beach

10.14 pm

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): I wish to present a petition signed by more than 3,000 of my constituents living in the vicinity of Prestwick beach.

The petition states:

The Petition of Prestwick Marine Neighbourhood Watch and others, believes that there is an essential need for improvements to the seafront area in Prestwick, particularly the installation of CCTV cameras on the seafront, in order to control anti-social behaviour in that area.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons pass legislation enabling South Ayrshire Council and the Scottish Executive to install CCTV cameras on Prestwick seafront, thereby assisting the authorities in controlling anti-social behaviour in Prestwick.

The Petitioners further request that the House of Commons urge South Ayrshire Council and the Scottish Executive to open the seafront toilets on Links Road in Prestwick all year round, and to organise cleaning of the beach from 1 March to 31 October each year.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Met Office (Aberdeen)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

10.15 pm

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): I believe myself fortunate to secure this debate on the proposed closure of the Met Office in Aberdeen in my constituency, just a week before the House rises for the summer. The proposal has caused widespread dismay and consternation, as the Aberdeen office is the only civilian weather forecasting operation in Scotland. I express my appreciation for the cross-party support that the campaign to have the decision reversed has gathered.

I note with satisfaction that the Minister has made it clear that the final decision is his. I am glad that I and others will have the chance to press the case with him tonight, although the campaign will not end with this debate.

My first concern has to do with the way that the decision has been handled. Staff learned through an internal e-mail that the option to close all six branches had been chosen by the Met Office board. Internal consultation was then initiated on the basis of a done deal. Not surprisingly, that caused anger and resentment, and the information was then leaked into the public domain rather than announced in an orderly fashion by the Met Office management.

At present, there are six Met Office branches apart from the headquarters in Exeter. The one in Aberdeen is the only one in Scotland, and the others are in Belfast, Cardiff, Manchester, Birmingham and London. Of course, there have been management changes in the Met Office. The decision by Dr. David Rogers to leave following his marriage clearly created a hiatus. I understand that he finishes at the end of this week, and that he may have attended his last board meeting today. It is perhaps worth putting it on record that he stated in his farewell message:

"It has been a privilege to lead the Met Office during this period of transformation"—

an odd word, I think—

"and I believe that I will leave the organisation strongly focused and committed to meet the challenges in the future. I would like to take this opportunity to relay again my personal thanks to all Met Office staff for helping me to determine the new strategic direction for the organisation and for putting in place a clear vision and robust plan for the future. I wish the Met Office, and its excellent people, every success for the future."

The Minister will understand that that has a hollow ring with people in Aberdeen. After all, this time last year Dr. Rogers said:

"I want the Met Office to work with Government to help to mitigate the impacts of severe weather. This goal can only be achieved if we maintain a significant regional presence and my wish to focus on services which improve public safety. Aberdeen Met Office is a great example of somewhere this has already happened. Everything they do is focused on protecting life at sea. This is a model."

What has happened in the past 12 months to produce that complete about-turn? Only last September, a strategic decision was taken to transfer the shipping forecast and gale warnings from Exeter to Aberdeen. In that short time—less than a year—staff at Aberdeen have achieved a 35 per cent. increase in accuracy, for which the team recently received a performance bonus, yet management now want to transfer the service back to Exeter.

I do not know whether the Minister will want to comment, but I can tell him that there is a suspicion that the change of policy was driven by the cost overruns in the move to Exeter. When his predecessor, Ivor Caplin, accepted the new headquarters at the end of 2003, he described it as yet in a recent reply to me the Minister confirmed that there was a cost overrun of £7.9 million. It is estimated that the option recommended by the board—closure of all the branches—will save £3,652,000 over five years and £20,691,000 over 10 years.

"within budget and under a strict timetable",

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Has the hon. Gentleman made a similar calculation to the one I made? The savings suggested by the Met Office may not actually happen, because there is no guarantee that, if Met Office functions were centralised in Exeter, the business currently done by the Aberdeen Met Office will follow. It could go to a commercial company.

Malcolm Bruce: The hon. Lady anticipates one of my points.

I stress that the difference between the option that the board recommends and option 3—I am not saying that option 3 is the definitive one, but it would retain Aberdeen, London and Manchester as centres of excellence—is a reduced saving of £917,000 over five years and £5.324 million over 10 years, an overall projected saving of £15.367 million. Can the Minister tell us whether it is reasonable to destroy morale and disperse expertise for a projected saving—I take the hon. Lady's point—of about £500,000 a year? That does not seem to make sense, and more to the point—exactly the hon. Lady's point—will that saving really be achieved?

The Minister told me in a written answer:

"It is not therefore possible to provide information on revenue generation by individual civil centres".—[Official Report, 6 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 477W.]

Why not? That is a trading fund and if the Government do not know what those branches cost and how much revenue is generated, how are they competent to make any decision that closing them would be a saving rather than a cost?

I have already been told that there is a presumption of a revenue loss of only £20,000. Even that implies that more information is available than has been made public. There is evidence that the revenue loss could be far greater and could be even more than the project savings, so the net result of the decision could be to increase the deficit or the loss-making potential of the Met Office—certainly not to boost it. The Minister should take that into account. Over the last couple of weeks, we have already heard that a £1 million contract for Shell has been lost. Other contracts are being bid for, but, against the background that I have described, it is hard for the Met Office to win them, although it is determined to try to do so.

The situation is odd, because there are three private weather forecasters with substantial staffs operating in Aberdeen and they will certainly take a predatory approach to Met Office customers. Indeed, they have already done so—Shell has been won across. Can the Minister give us even the internal estimate of the cost savings from closing Aberdeen and where the main savings will be made? I have spoken to nobody who believes that those savings will be realised or that they can be made without damaging business.

A management document admits:

"While there is still an important human involvement in the forecasting process this is reducing with time and needs to be used in a way that adds real value to the output. The role has evolved and forecasters are now more involved with service provision—interpreting the likely weather impacts and helping users and customers to make best use of the information available and mitigate risks."

That is exactly the role in which Aberdeen has excelled in recent years.

It is also interesting that the Ministry of Defence insists on retaining Met Office operations on its bases in Scotland. If a remote computer can do the job—according to the Met Office's operation in Exeter—why does the MOD need a local operation? Or is its insistence in fact confirmation that local operations really add value and qualitative information?

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that many industries in north-east Scotland—fishing, oil and the growing pleasure boat sector—rely on the Aberdeen office and local input?

Malcolm Bruce: That is true. The Met Office is a public service. I realise that it is a trading fund but people perceive it as "our" Met Office providing the information we need for such activities.

The very suggestion that Met Offices can be offered remotely without a professional customer interface is itself damaging for business. Forecasters insist that, although the Exeter technology is a huge innovation, they can still add to it and meet the needs of customers in local advice, customisation and presentation.

Safety is an issue. In Scotland, that means mountain rescue, keeping roads open in the winter, fishing, offshore oil and gas, the pleasure boat industry and the tourist industry. The idea that Scotland, with its now fully established Scottish Parliament, should have no direct access to the Met Office within Scotland is an insult to the needs of the Scottish economy.

Safety is not the only issue, because commercial interests are also important. The Minister should imagine an offshore oil and gas operator trying to plan the installation of a sub-sea system in the North sea. Such an operator will need a local, specific weather forecast that will enable it to determine the weather window to perform that operation. A crane barge can cost $100,000 a day, and two or three days' error in the weather forecast could cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. It would be a pity, in those circumstances, if the Met Office could not continue to provide the service that it has provided in the past.

Forecasters in Aberdeen meet clients daily and can provide updates catered to customer needs within 15 minutes. The Met Office website, which is still effectively marketing the Aberdeen operation, makes a real virtue of that on-the-spot service. It is not credible that such a service could be provided from a location as remote as Exeter.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree with my constituent, Mr. Dave Clark, who relocated to the Aberdeen office when the Glasgow office closed two years ago, that the loss of the facility is likely to result in the total loss to the Met Office of highly trained staff and the detailed local knowledge of Scotland's weather?

Malcolm Bruce: I have met my hon. Friend's constituent and he has made that point to me. Many of the staff will leave the Met Office because they want to stay in that location, and competitors are keen to gobble them up because of their track record. All that is clearly demonstrated in the marketing brief for Aberdeen on the website.

The very suggestion that Scotland should lose its only civilian Met Office operation is deeply damaging. I do not have to tell the Minister that Scotland covers 40 per cent. of the land area of Great Britain and probably more than half the maritime area—

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Not on the BBC weather map.

Malcolm Bruce: I am talking about accurate projections.

Weather can be notoriously severe, even extreme, although today was a beautiful day in Aberdeenshire. Public agencies, especially the road organisations, police, mountain rescue, air traffic, coastguards and others, all rely on weather forecasts that are accurate, flexible and use local knowledge. However good the model, there can be severe variations. The programme is based on readings at 2,500 ft. Conditions might be very different at sea level or above 4,000 ft. I can testify, as can some of my hon. Friends, that Aberdeen airport has notoriously turbulent and highly local wind patterns.

What representations have been made to the Minister by public agency users of the Met Office? What representations have been made by the Scottish Executive? It is ironic that the very technology—it is superb—that gives a resource that can strengthen the branch operation is being used to centralise the service and pull everything to Exeter. Will that not leave the service exposed? There may be two computers, but they could both be disabled. I understand that they share cabling tunnels. Does not safe back-up justify maintaining other centres of excellence, especially when the perceived savings are relatively small and may be completely wrong? What contingencies are or could be in place if Exeter failed? Is there not a danger that public agencies will face a reduced service and possibly greater costs in getting relevant information? What account is being taken of the impact of the closure on such agencies?

My understanding is that the Met Office trading fund has been set up to enable it to compete on fair and equal terms with the private sector. How come competitors see the need for major operations in Aberdeen? Indeed, they are poised to fill the gap if the Met Office leaves.

In the light of these arguments, I hope that the Minister will consider all the options during the consultation. Will extra options be considered or is the consultation on the four options previously considered? Will the Minister recognise that opinion across Scotland, as demonstrated in this debate, is strongly of the view that we require our own civilian Met Office operation and that Aberdeen should be retained as our centre of excellence? To be frank, if the Minister were to close that operation, which has achieved great things in the past 15 years, it would be an act of vandalism that the Met Office would ultimately regret. It would not solve the financial problems of the Met Office but compound them. It would devalue the Met Office as a truly national British service, rather than something, however superb, based about as far away from Aberdeen as anyone can get and still be on the mainland of Britain.

10.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): I congratulate the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) on obtaining this Adjournment debate and I welcome the opportunity to talk about the work of the Met Office, and the Aberdeen Met Office in particular. I am grateful to him for giving me advance notice of the main issues that he wanted to raise and I will attempt to answer his points. If I fail to answer anything, I will consult Hansard tomorrow and write to him if I need to do so.

I recently launched a consultation exercise on the options for change of the Met Office's structure. I should like to explain the background of those changes, together with the context in which they are being considered. I plan to visit the Met Office in Exeter later this month, and I will take the opportunity while there to discuss the issues involved with the Met Office executives. I have also agreed to meet representatives of the Prospect trade union, and I expect to meet parliamentary colleagues on this matter in the near future.

I have written to the hon. Gentleman and to other hon. Members whose constituencies or constituents may be affected by any change to the Met Office's current structure and organisation. I do, however, need to make it clear at the outset that no decisions have been taken or are assumed. I have initiated a 90-working-days consultation period, the purpose of which is to find the most effective and efficient way for the Met Office to carry out its civil forecasting task. I welcome any representations, and I shall make my decision after considering and evaluating all the representations that I receive.

The Met Office's primary function is vital: to understand the science of the weather and the environment. It does an important job in providing forecasts and information and helps to save lives and protect property. We look to the Met Office, as the national meteorological service, to provide timely, quality weather forecasts, particularly in respect of predicting and broadcasting warnings of severe weather.

The Met Office has continually invested in improving its computer forecasts through the increasing understanding of the science and the utilisation of massive supercomputer power. That helps to maintain its reputation for excellence and to ensure that it can deliver the weather services that we require now and in the future.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): As the Minister knows, I am a great admirer of weather forecasting and, indeed, of weather forecasters. On the science, does he accept that while the supercomputers are important, there will always be an element of expertise, which other hon. Members have already mentioned? The great strength of sharing that experience across the country is that the local expertise that brings in the business is effectively on site in those regions to deliver results. Will he accept representations, including from Wales, about the case for maintaining that regional expertise in its current locations?

Mr. Touhig: Of course I will be happy to receive representations. I know that the hon. Gentleman has a particular insight into weather forecasting that is denied to the rest of mortal man, and I congratulate him on that.

Investments in satellites and weather radars have resulted in significant advances in how the atmosphere is observed. Advances have also been made in numerical weather prediction mathematical models. At the same time, technological advances, particularly in telecommunications, continue to enable increasing efficiencies in the production process. While the Met Office continues to put a very high premium on the skill of people, the human role in the forecasting process has changed and continues to change significantly. The forecaster is now more focused on providing a service to customers. By interpreting the likely weather impacts, forecasters help people to make best use of the information available, especially when it comes to the risks of severe weather.

It is important that we build on the Met Office's investment in technology, telecommunications and modelling. That is the reason for reviewing the production process and is the background to identifying the options for the way ahead. The options under consideration range from no change to the current structure and process, to the full centralisation of forecasting and the full automation of all commercial services. They also include the centralisation of production, but with the creation of two or three centres of excellence to deal with specific sectors of the Met Office's customer base and the production and services range.

The Met Office board has expressed a preference for the centralisation of forecasting and the partial automation of forecast production for commercial services. However, I can assure the hon. Gentleman, given the concern that he has raised today, that I shall fully, carefully and impartially consider all the options that are being consulted on in the light of representations that I receive.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): When the Minister says that no decisions have been made, is that a result of his ministerial intervention, as opposed to what the Met Office board has previously said? Will he take the final decision after the consultation period?

Mr. Touhig: The hon. Gentleman might think that, but I could not possibly comment. I say in answer to a point made by the hon. Member for Gordon that the way in which the announcement was handled, given its nature, was not one of our most brilliant successes, and I am truly conscious of the impact that the situation has had on morale. The decision will rest with me, once I have taken account of all the representations that I receive. If anyone comes up with an option that is not one of the four, obviously I will want to consider it. Governments can get things wrong—not often, but sometimes.

I assure the hon. Member for Gordon that proposals for future forecasting have no financial relationship to the costs of the recent Met Office relocation to Exeter. The relocation was budgeted and paid for. The Met Office needs to identify efficiencies continuously so that it can ensure its future as a trading fund.

The hon. Gentleman was concerned about why the costs and revenues of individual centres such as Aberdeen could not be identified. The answer is that the production of weather forecasts is an integrated activity that involves several agencies in the Met Office. Civil centres are one part of the process and do not operate as self-standing profit-and-loss units.

The situation at military aviation stations is different from that at civil centres. Military pilots require direct, immediate and face-to-face briefings on the likely impact that the weather will have on the safety and effectiveness of operational sorties, so intensive consultancy occurs between the military and the Met Office.

Malcolm Bruce: Does the Minister accept that for people in the environment of the North sea, whether they are involved in fishing, maritime activities or offshore helicopter activities, the same factors apply? Their inability to call up information that the military can access is anomalous. Surely a national Met Office should provide such information to the civilian sector.

Mr. Touhig: Other people made that point during a discussion that I had earlier today and I shall take it on board as part of the consultation process.

As yet, I have received no representations on the proposals from public bodies or the Scottish Executive. In respect of the operations centre that is based at Exeter, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that all the necessary business and operational resilience, and plans for continuity, are in place.

The hon. Gentleman asked why the shipping forecast was transferred to the Aberdeen office in 2004. The decision was based on bringing together marine forecasting in a single unit. There has since been no step change in the shipping forecast, so I am not clear what improvement in accuracy is being claimed since the transfer. The proposal to consider further centralisation as one of the options builds on the process of rationalisation and improvement.

The costs of implementing any of the options are included in the consultation document, including, for example, the small number of redundancies that could result from centralisation, which the Met Office would of course have to fund. I require the Met Office, like any other trading fund, to maximise the profit that it makes from its commercial work with the private sector. The aim is to return shareholder value to the taxpayer.

The hon. Gentleman has raised other issues separately with me. He has expressed concern that the removal of forecasting capability from Aberdeen would diminish the quality of weather predictions. I hope that he will understand if I do not comment about that now, but I will take account of what he says as part of the consultation. Consultation with Met Office customers will, however, form a key part of the overall consultation process. I shall take fully into account any issues that they raise before I reach a final decision. I understand fully hon. Members' representations on the impact of further possible change on Met Office staff and their families. I appreciate that that is unsettling and am conscious that uncertainty is the most difficult thing for them to handle.

Miss Begg: Some of my constituents relocated from Glasgow to Aberdeen and have settled down there with their families. I re-emphasise that the uncertainty is resulting in low morale. Perhaps I can also make it clear that they are not going to move from Aberdeen again. Their expertise is likely to be lost to the Met Office and they will work somewhere else.

Mr. Touhig: I understand my hon. Friend's concern. However, when the Met Office relocated from Bracknell to Exeter, about 1,000 people relocated. There are difficulties and pressures, but we have to face those if we are to take the option that the Met Office board prefers.

I emphasise that the consultation will be open, full and impartial. I look forward to meeting the hon. Member for Gordon and others who wish to make representations. As I said, the consultation will be inclusive, involving the full range of Met Office stakeholders. It is then up to me to reach a decision on the way ahead after careful consideration of all the options. It is my ambition and desire that the consultation is as wide, open and transparent as I can possibly make it.

I pay tribute to the work of the current chief executive, Dr. David Rogers, who is leaving on 15 July. His decision to resign follows his recent marriage and his wish to pursue a career path that allows him and his wife to spend more time together. I can confirm that his decision to leave is entirely personal and is not related to the options and proposals that we are discussing.

I have started the 90-day consultation. I am inviting everyone and his uncle to take part so that we have their views. That is the best way to proceed. At the end of the day, I will have to consider the options and come forward with a proposal. Again, when I do that, I am sure that I will be answerable to the House for my actions.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eighteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Devolved Government

1. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): If he will make a statement on prospects for the restoration of devolved government in Northern Ireland. [10652]

5. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): If he will make a statement on the prospects for the Northern Ireland Assembly reconvening. [10656]

6. Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): When he expects the devolved institutions of Northern Ireland to be restored. [10657]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): The Government are committed to the restoration of a fully inclusive, devolved, power-sharing Executive in Northern Ireland at the earliest opportunity, which is in turn dependent on a complete and verifiable end to all paramilitary and criminal activity and the decommissioning of all illegally held weapons.

Ben Chapman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that although Northern Ireland has come a long way in recent years, the key element in all this is trust? Events have served to eradicate trust between the parties. What steps does he think need to be taken to restore that trust by each of those concerned?

Mr. Hain: I agree that there has been an erosion of trust since Easter 1998, and that needs to be rebuilt. It will best be rebuilt by all those involved in paramilitary activity and criminality in Northern Ireland ending that involvement, full stop. That is what has to be achieved.

Ann Winterton: Now that we have tragically seen once again the effects of terrorist attacks in the United Kingdom, will that not reinforce the view that there is no place in the future Government of Northern Ireland for those who have abused our democracy by the bullet and the bomb? Does the Secretary of State agree that no progress can be made until the structures of terrorism, such as the IRA, are dismantled? Without such action, as the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Ben Chapman) has just said, there can be no trust in a peaceful future for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hain: I have been very struck in Northern Ireland in recent days by the tremendous sympathy shown by people right across Northern Ireland, of all backgrounds, all beliefs and all political parties, with the people of London and of Great Britain as a whole. I am sure that the hon. Lady will be pleased by that indication of where sentiment lies. Of course we want to rid Northern Ireland politics for good of the bombs, the bullets and the punishment beatings, of all violence and certainly of all terrorism, and that is what we are working on.

Mr. Harris: During my right hon. Friend's recent visit to the United States, did he have any meetings with representatives of the Irish-American community, and if so what views did they express regarding the possibility of the restoration of devolution in the near future?

Mr. Hain: I did indeed meet members of the Irish-American community in Washington and New York, and had excellent discussions with them, as well as with the Secretary of State, Condi Rice, and with special envoy, Mitchell Reiss. I was struck by the change in attitude from the very top, down through senators such as Edward Kennedy, Congressman Pete King and, indeed, senior business men such as Bill Flynn. There is now a much better understanding of, and support for, the British Government's position, and that is very welcome. All have offered—the President especially, via the Secretary of State—to help in whatever way they can. We are very grateful for that support and we look forward to drawing on it in the future.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): Given the appalling, exclusively republican violence last night and the failure of the republican leadership of Sinn Fein to condemn it, what confidence can the community in Northern Ireland have that Sinn Fein is seeking to make any transition towards democracy and peaceful politics? Does the Secretary of State not recognise that, by requiring inclusive devolution at an Executive level, he puts a veto and a massive bargaining chip into the hands of those very people?

Mr. Hain: I share the condemnation and regret of the hon. Gentleman and, I imagine, all his colleagues concerning the violent disorder in the Ardoyne area last night. There is no question but that that should not have happened, and it cannot be tolerated. As for the future of inclusive Government, he will know that it is our objective, as I have said before, to banish all forms of violence from Northern Ireland politics, and it is in the interests of everybody, including his party, which is now in an important leading position in Northern Ireland, that we get all the parties round the Executive table, sharing Government.

The activity in the Ardoyne area last night contrasted, I might add, with the activity in the morning, which was almost entirely peaceful, as I discussed with the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) over the phone, as did the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward), who is responsible for security. That regrettable and unacceptable violence was an isolated incident in a marching season of about 3,000 parades which were overwhelmingly peaceful. There have been only a handful of serious incidents. I look to the model of Londonderry; the people of Derry got together and found a way through to a process in which the Orangemen were able to parade in accordance with their historic traditions, and at the same time the community felt comfortable with that. Dialogue is the way forward on all these things.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): During the Government's talks towards devolution with the various parties in the past number of months, what assurances has the Secretary of State, first, given the Democratic Unionist party on the composition of the membership of the Northern Ireland Policing Board, which is due for revision in the autumn? Secondly, what assurances has he given Sinn Fein on changes in the structure of the Police Service of Northern Ireland in view of the fact that the Patten report commissioned on policing in Northern Ireland has been well nigh fully implemented?

Mr. Hain: I do not think that it is a question of giving any particular assurance to individual parties. It is a question of finding the best way forward for the future of the PSNI, carrying into effect the recommendations of the Patten report. The recent report of the oversight commissioner showed that some two thirds of those recommendations have been successfully carried out and implemented. That shows that the PSNI is not only making tremendous progress in normalising policing in Northern Ireland—I pay tribute to the Chief Constable—but in some respects becoming an example for other parts of the world that have had conflicts. As we move forward on the Policing Board, we need to do so sensibly. I am certainly consulting all parties, including the hon. Gentleman's, which plays such an important role and continues to do so.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Although it must be right for the Secretary of State to make it absolutely clear that parties associated with violence and criminality cannot play a part in devolved Administration in the Province, does he accept that they cannot hold the democratic process to ransom and that if they do not completely renounce violence and criminality there has to be a point at which we proceed with devolved Administration without them?

Mr. Hain: No individual party and especially no individual group can hold anybody to ransom in Northern Ireland—certainly not the Secretary of State or this Government. We need to find a way forward. We await the statement that has been promised by the IRA, and it needs to be crystal clear that paramilitary activity and criminality has been banished and that that is verifiable, so that we all know that what has been promised—if it is promised—is delivered on the ground.

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that the model that he referred to in Derry is an important and valuable one? It was first initiated in dialogue convened many years ago by John Hume as MP, brought forward by mayors of the city and most importantly in recent years taken forward by a credible non-partisan community interest such as the chamber of commerce. That is the lesson for us all. Will the Secretary of State demonstrate his confidence in the prospects for restoring the institutions—not just the devolved institutions, but all those of the agreement—by indicating that temporary direct rule will not take long-term structural and strategic decisions such as on water charges, rating policy and outcomes of the review of public administration?

Mr. Hain: I cannot promise the latter, because we need to govern. We want to see the hon. Gentleman, DUP Members and all those who have been elected to the Assembly producing circumstances in which an Executive are up and running—hopefully with the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) as able Ministers running Northern Ireland, as they were before. That is what we want, but we will not postpone decisions that are in the interests of Northern Ireland.

I very much applaud the hon. Gentleman's role, and that of John Hume before him, in the situation in Londonderry. That model showed that the people of Derry could come together despite their historic differences through dialogue and with the Parades Commission. That is a model for how everybody should resolve these tensions and problems, and let us hope that that lesson is learned for next year too.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): May I ask the Secretary of State to pass on to the Chief Constable sympathy and support from, I am sure, the entire House to the police officers who were injured in Belfast while carrying out their duties on behalf of everyone in Northern Ireland yesterday evening? Does the Secretary of State believe that it would be unacceptable for Ministers serving in a devolved Executive in Northern Ireland to refuse to recognise the authority and legitimacy of the courts and the police?

Mr. Hain: In the context of the devolution of policing and criminal justice—something that we would like to see in future years if possible—that is absolutely imperative, otherwise how credible would devolution be and how could it possibly operate? That, however, is in the future. I very much welcome what the hon. Gentleman said about the police officers who were injured at Ardoyne. I believe that more than 60 were injured, a few of them seriously. Of course, our sympathies are with them—they did a very good job in very provocative and difficult circumstances.

Mr. Lidington: The Secretary of State will know that the constitution of the Provisional IRA asserts that the IRA army council is the lawful Government of the entire island of Ireland. Does he therefore agree that part of any IRA response, which we are awaiting, should include a commitment to change its constitution and that statement of objectives so that it is clear that the republican movement accepts the legitimacy of the institutions on both sides of the border? If such a statement and change are not forthcoming, we are at risk of ending up with what the leader of the Irish Labour party recently described as a "weasel-worded fudge".

Mr. Hain: Words matter a great deal, and the suggestion of a "weasel-worded fudge" is not acceptable. Words matter, but actions matter even more. Across the spectrum, the people of Northern Ireland, having experienced Castlereagh, Stormontgate, the Northern bank robbery, the grisly murder of Robert McCartney, and the whole catalogue of events that have been well documented by the Independent Monitoring Commission such as punishment beatings and the rest of it, will want to know that all that activity has been shut down. That is the important thing. If we can reach that position, as I very much hope we can, Northern Ireland can move forward in the way that we all want.

Punishment Beatings

2. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): How many punishment beatings there were in the Province in the latest period for which figures are available. [10653]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Shaun Woodward): The total number of punishment beatings in Northern Ireland, which are usually referred to as "paramilitary-style attacks" and consist of both shootings and assaults, for this year is 109. That is 23 fewer than for the same period last year but, of course, any level of paramilitary activity is too much.

Andrew Selous: But is the Minister aware that the Independent Monitoring Commission figures underestimate considerably the true number of those assaults, because the victims are often far too frightened to report them for fear of further reprisals? People on the estates that are most affected say that the problem is worse than it has ever been. Does he agree that it is incumbent on the leaders of all communities in Northern Ireland, including the hon. Members for Mid-Ulster (Mr. McGuinness) and for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) to pledge and work publicly to eradicate those beatings and other assaults?

Mr. Woodward: I think that everybody wants a reduction in intimidation and assaults, and we want everyone to co-operate in encouraging people to come forward. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is right that the figures are an underestimation of the number of assaults that take place. The consequences of those assaults are unbearable for the victims and the families, and we will do everything that we can to encourage a situation in which people who are subject to those disgraceful attacks have the confidence to come forward in future and bring the perpetrators to justice.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): The tragic events surrounding the death of Robert McCartney demonstrate that many paramilitaries see themselves as the law enforcement agencies in their communities. What are we doing to assist the legitimate law enforcement agencies in the Province?

Mr. Woodward: We are doing everything we can to assist the legitimate law enforcement agencies, which includes making it clear that we do not tolerate in any shape or form paramilitary activity, punishment beatings or criminality. I remind the House that the Secretary of State has set a clear objective—that in order to make any progress, there must be a definitive end to paramilitary activity and criminality. That stands and will continue to stand.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): Will the Minister clarify what additional support the Government are prepared to give to community restorative justice schemes, such as the IMPACT scheme in the North Down constituency, in an effort to reduce and indeed eliminate paramilitary-style beatings?

Mr. Woodward: I am assured by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who has responsibility for criminal justice, that we are looking at such proposals, including in the hon. Lady's constituency. We are taking her advice on board and hope to be able to report to her shortly.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): Further to the details contained in the most recent IMC report, can the Minister update the House on the level of ongoing paramilitary involvement in other kinds of criminal and organisational activity, and tell us what action he proposes to take to combat that?

Mr. Woodward: In addressing paramilitary activity, one of the most important organisations that have been put in place is the Organised Crime Task Force, which I chair. This year we were able to report—obviously, this relates to paramilitary activity as well—that 28 top-level organised crime gangs were disrupted or dismantled. We recovered assets totalling nearly £12 million, which were restrained or confiscated. Nearly £10 million worth of drugs and counterfeit goods worth nearly £7 million were seized. We have a programme for next year that will include tackling illegal fuel by a scheme to tighten petrol licensing and more work on the private security industry, which the paramilitaries have tried to infiltrate. We will have a strengthened response to illegal dumping and we will safeguard charities from abuse by establishing a Northern Ireland charity commissioner.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): The whole House would condemn violence from wherever it comes, including from both sides of the divide in Northern Ireland. The Minister is aware that much criminality exists in the Province—mafia-style criminality, aimed at financing the activities of the IRA-Sinn Fein and the activity aimed at control of the streets on the so-called loyalist side. This criminality makes the peace process extremely difficult. What measures can be taken to end such mafia-style operations in the Province?

Mr. Woodward: The hon. Gentleman is right to speak about the dangers of criminality operating in the Province. It would be impossible for us to proceed with any negotiations if we were not able to put on the table the definitive demand for an end to paramilitary activity and criminality. We have increased resources for the police, the Assets Recovery Agency and all the agencies, intelligence communities included, which are working extremely hard and extremely effectively to deliver an effective response to bring those perpetrating these crimes to justice and to stop those trying to organise crime being successful.

Political Situation

3. Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the outcome of his recent meetings with political parties in Northern Ireland on the political situation in Northern Ireland. [10654]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): My meetings with all the Northern Ireland political parties have been extremely useful and I hope to intensify this process.

Rosie Cooper: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that no single party in Northern Ireland has the right of veto over the peace process?

Mr. Hain: Indeed. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, acknowledge her strong and long interest in the affairs of Northern Ireland, and look forward to working with her. We want to get parties working together, not vetoing or seeking to veto efforts to take Northern Ireland forward. We will not allow that to happen. I hope my hon. Friend will be reassured by that.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): I trust that the House will not be taken in by the IRA leadership's weasel words about the recent bombings in London—the last bomb to explode in London was planted by the IRA, and its leadership has never condemned that event. Has the Secretary of State asked the IRA-Sinn Fein leadership what it did with the proceeds of the Northern bank robbery? A colleague of the Justice Minister in the Irish Republic has said that Adams and McGuinness were instrumental in organising that robbery.

Mr. Hain: All parties, including Sinn Fein, have condemned the London atrocities. On the Northern bank robbery, the investigations conducted by the PSNI and the security services are still continuing, and some progress has been made. We hope that those investigations will be successful.

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): In the next round of talks, will the Secretary of State pick up some of the wider issues such as the environment, unemployment and the business alliance's recent ideas? In addition to residual unemployment, underemployment is a major concern, and perhaps it will increase with the withdrawal of peace funding and other moneys.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend is right to say that we must continue to dedicate our energy to ensuring that more jobs are created in Northern Ireland, but he also knows that Northern Ireland has more jobs than at any time in its history under this Labour Government. Unemployment has more than halved, but the level of economic inactivity, which is one of the highest in the United Kingdom, is worrying. We will continue to work with everybody, including those in business circles, to ensure that Northern Ireland has full employment and a competitive economy that can withstand future global pressures.

Belfast Agreement

4. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of Sinn Fein-IRA's intentions to abide by the terms of the Belfast agreement. [10655]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. David Hanson): The Government await the IRA's response to the April statement by the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams), which called for the organisation to pursue its aims through purely political and democratic activity, as demanded by the terms of the Belfast agreement. I hope that the response will shortly provide credible, verifiable and definitive commitments to that end.

Mr. Robathan: The Secretary of State said that Sinn Fein has condemned atrocities that it committed. Can we cease the fiction that Sinn Fein and the IRA are anything other than a bunch of terrorists whom we cannot trust? Seven years after the Belfast agreement, we should understand that we cannot appease a bunch of terrorists, and we should cease doing so.

Mr. Hanson: The hon. Gentleman has heard the statements by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and other Ministers, and he should recognise that the Government's paramount objective is to end criminality and paramilitary activity. That is the purpose of the process, and we will work to that end. When the IRA makes a statement, the Government are committed to ensuring that we have verifiable, positive proof that paramilitary and criminal activity have ended. That is the Government's objective.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): In a month in which the McCartney sisters have indicated that they are leaving Short Strand because of IRA intimidation, and on the day after Gerry Adams and other leading Sinn Fein members were seen at the forefront of a riot in which unprovoked attacks were made on Orangemen in north Belfast, does the Minister believe that there is any hope of IRA-Sinn Fein and its political leadership adopting exclusively democratic and peaceful means? If not, why does he insist that those political leaders should be included in the Government in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hanson: As I have said, the Government's prime objective is to ensure that we end criminal and paramilitary activity. I pay tribute to the McCartney sisters and their courageous behaviour in Belfast. We must end the murders, the shootings and the beatings, which are not acceptable in a democratic society. It is our duty to try to reintroduce devolved Government, which is both our objective and the purpose of discussions that take place in Government every day of the week. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the House come to order?

Unemployment

7. Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): If he will make a statement on levels of unemployment in Northern Ireland. [10658]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): A strong and stable economy and policies such as the new deal have led to unemployment falling by more than 50 per cent. Seasonally adjusted figures from the labour force survey for the period March to May 2005 estimate that 38,000 people are unemployed in Northern Ireland and that the unemployment rate is 4.9 per cent.

Mr. Anderson: I thank the Minister for that positive response. Does she agree that the proposals for public service reform could have an impact on the level and conditions of employment in Northern Ireland? Does she agree that early and positive meetings with trade unions in Northern Ireland would commit to full implementation of the Warwick agreement, as agreed in the manifesto, in Northern Ireland?

Angela E. Smith: My hon. Friend has considerable experience and a good track record on these issues. I assure him that I regularly meet the trade unions, particularly on areas of public service reform. The Warwick agreement was very wide and there are different legislation issues in Great Britain and Northern Ireland. However, I give him an absolute commitment that as we take forward matters that impact on public sector employees we will want to ensure that workers in Northern Ireland are not left behind. I guarantee that I will meet the trade unions on this issue.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): Will the Minister indicate what steps she is taking to replace the thousands of jobs lost by those in my constituency who were employed in manufacturing? Will she spell out what initiatives Invest Northern Ireland is engaged in to attract jobs into Strangford?

Angela E. Smith: We have several initiatives. Invest Northern Ireland has worked very hard with employers looking to bring in investment. The Bombardier initiative will have an impact across Northern Ireland in providing jobs. It is important that when we work with Invest Northern Ireland and small businesses in providing training and skills—I have met a number of people undertaking such programmes—we ensure that everybody in Northern Ireland can share in the prosperity as we continue on the track of providing employment.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [11627] Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 13 July.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): I am sure that the whole House will join me in continuing to send our deepest sympathy to the families of the victims of last Thursday's attacks, who must be suffering appalling distress at this time. They are in our thoughts and prayers.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Keith Vaz: There has been a profound sense of unity in Britain since the events of last Thursday. The Prime Minister has rightly said that he will use every effort to ensure that the perpetrators and planners of these terrorist attacks are brought to justice, and he will have our full support in doing so. Is he aware that in the past seven days there have been more than 100 reported race hate attacks on members of the British Asian community? Will he ensure that he and his Ministers take every step necessary to bring the perpetrators of these attacks to justice, and that no individual or organisation will be allowed to imperil the diverse and multicultural society that is Britain today and which is the envy of the world?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that the whole House will agree with the sentiments that my hon. Friend has outlined and expressed. Perhaps before I come to his point I should say a word of congratulations to our police and security services on the magnificent work that they have done. As I saw for myself when I visited their joint operations, they have in place an extraordinary system that should give people a lot of heart and hope.

I should also say to the House that the number of confirmed dead still stands at 52. There are some 50 injured in hospital, of whom 12 are in intensive care.

I would simply say to my hon. Friend that I entirely agree as to what he says in respect of the unity of the country and in condemning utterly any attacks against innocent members of our community.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I am sure that I speak for the whole House when I join the Prime Minister in expressing our sympathy to those who have suffered such terrible losses, and in the congratulations that he has offered to the police and the security services on the outstanding work that they have carried out following last week's tragic events.

What we now know is appalling to contemplate. It will take us a long time to come to terms with the fact that these atrocities appear to have been committed by those who were born and brought up in our midst. Does the Prime Minister agree that those responsible for last week's carnage were not acting in the name of Islam but were perverting its teachings? Will he join me and the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) in condemning the attacks that have taken place on mosques? Is it not the case that anyone who reaches for a stone to throw at the window of a mosque and anyone who nurtures resentment against our Muslim community is the enemy of us all, because they would be acting in the way the terrorists want us to act, thus helping them to achieve their objective of dividing us one from another?

The Prime Minister: Once again, I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his strong and supportive stance. I believe that it has brought a lot of comfort to people in the country to know that the main political parties are together on the matter. I agree that there will be a sense of profound shock and anxiety in the country about what has happened, and a need and a willingness to act.

I should like briefly to address four aspects of action that we need to take. First, in accordance with the timetable to publish new anti-terrorism legislation in the autumn, we intend to begin the process of consultation with the other main parties in the next couple of weeks. As we have already said, the legislation will focus on the measures that the police and security services say are necessary. It will focus especially on measures to combat the incitement and instigation of terrorism as well as the acts themselves. Meanwhile, we will use control orders when necessary under existing legislation.

Secondly, we will look urgently at how we strengthen the procedures to exclude people from entering the United Kingdom who may incite hatred or act contrary to the public good, and at how we deport such people, if they have come here, more easily. However, again, we want to consult fully on any measures or procedures undertaken.

We all know that security measures alone will not tackle the problem. We are dealing not with an isolated criminal act but with an extreme and evil ideology, the roots of which lie in a perverted and poisonous misinterpretation of the religion of Islam. Thirdly, therefore, as was urged upon me this morning by our Muslim Members of Parliament, whose leadership and good sense I praise, we will seek to debate the right way forward in combating that evil in the Muslim community with Muslim leaders. We intend to begin that process immediately. In the end, only the community itself can take on and defeat it, but we can all help and facilitate. We will do so, and I am pleased that the Leader of the Opposition has kindly indicated his willingness to participate in such a dialogue. I hope that other leaders will do so, too.

Fourthly, we are talking to other nations, Muslim and non-Muslim, about how to mobilise internationally the moderate and true voice of Islam. Such action is taking place around the world, but we need to ascertain how it can be better co-ordinated, publicised and driven through.

Meanwhile, and finally, I ask for the same measured and calm response from the country that has characterised it since last Thursday. We are considering a small group of extremists. It cannot be ignored because of the danger it poses, but it should not define Muslims in Britain, who are overwhelmingly law-abiding, decent members of our society. We condemn any attacks against them unreservedly.

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to the Prime Minister for that answer. I welcome his decision to meet the leaders of the Muslim community, and, as he said, I have accepted his invitation to join in those meetings. We also stand ready to work through, with the Government, their legislative proposals and, more generally, the security implications of what we now know.

Does the Prime Minister agree that the peril that we face extends far beyond our shores, has taken the lives of countless Muslims and is part of a criminal conspiracy to destroy our shared way of life? What scope does he envisage for greater international action to deal with the terrible danger that we face?

The Prime Minister: Again, I agree entirely with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It is my intention later today to issue a list, which we have been able to put together pretty quickly, of different attacks that have taken place round the world. It excludes attacks in Iraq or Afghanistan, but includes those virtually from the attack on the World Trade Centre in February 1993 onwards. People have been able to see that this process stretches back many years. It encompasses many different countries and thousands of people have been victims of it.

It is heartening, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman implies, that there is a sense in the international community in the Muslim world that this issue has to be taken on. I know of conferences that have either just taken place or are taking place in Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Indonesia, for example. Such countries are now focusing clearly on how the ground may be recaptured for moderate Islam, which is the true voice of Islam, as we know. It is our intention to see what help and support we can give. We are having discussions not only with those Muslim countries but with others as well to determine how we can get real international support and an understanding of how important the issue is, so that, in the countries where the roots of this sometimes grow, through twisted teaching and through the violence that is taught to young people at a very early age, we can pull up this evil ideology by its roots. It is important, particularly after the shock of discovering that those who perpetrated this were born and brought up in this country, that we recognise the worldwide dimension of this, and the need therefore to tackle it internationally.

Mr. Shahid Malik (Dewsbury) (Lab): Does the Prime Minister share my assessment that yesterday's events represent the most profound challenge yet faced by the British Muslim community? Condemnation is not enough, and British Muslims must confront the voices of evil head on, as I believe they are prepared to do. Does my right hon. Friend share my belief that, rather than dividing us, these evil voices will serve to unite the British people in our resolve to deal with them? This is a defining moment for this country. Does the Prime Minister share my confidence that the Muslim community and the wider community will play their role, and that they are equal to the challenge? I can assure him that my constituency of Dewsbury will not be found wanting in that regard.

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for that; it is particularly important that he has stood up in the House today and said it. It will give heart to people not only in the Muslim community but beyond it in this country.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Lochaber) (LD): I too reiterate the shared sense of deep sympathy for those suffering distress as a result of the loss of their loved ones last week. May I also add my voice to the congratulations to the police on the fine work that they have done? We all undoubtedly share a sense of national dismay that these terrorists were British, and it is incumbent on all of us to keep stressing the fact that the vast majority of British Muslims totally condemn the bombings that took place in London last week. It certainly makes sense now for the three party leaderships to stand as one with the Muslim community on that basis, and in so doing, for us all to demonstrate together that this is an issue not for members of the Muslim community alone, but for all of us who share this country and who share British citizenship with them.

The Prime Minister: Obviously I agree with those sentiments. It is important that we all stand together at this moment.

Mr. Kennedy: Following what the Prime Minister said in the House on Monday, I thank him for amplifying today that he will consider on a cross-party basis any further anti-terrorism legislation, including measures covering acts preparatory to terrorism, that might be brought before the House. As part of our presidency of the European Union, the Home Secretary is today very sensibly chairing a special meeting of his opposite numbers in Brussels, at which he hopes to reach agreement on the retention of e-mail and phone data as part of any anti-terrorism legislation. Leaving aside the merits of what the Home Secretary is pursuing, how confident are the Government that he will have the support of the other European Governments, and that the service providers will have the capacity to store the data that will be required?

The Prime Minister: I am confident that other European countries, the majority of which face the same type of threat, will be supportive. I am sure that they will be. The exchange and retention of data are a very important part of dealing with the issue. As I saw at the joint operations centre, it is absolutely vital that we receive co-operation from intelligence services across the board to defeat such terrorism. Links are seldom confined to one country—wherever those who engage in terrorist acts come from, they have almost always had strong links with the outside world.

Q2. [11628] Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): I, too, commend and praise the police and security services for their swift and effective identification of the evil extremists who brought death and misery to our streets last week. Will the Prime Minister join me, however, in condemning those right-wing extremists in the British National party, in Barking and elsewhere, who are cynically and sickly trying to exploit people's tragedy, anguish and understandable anger over the barbaric attack in order to score cheap but dangerous political points? Does not the British National party shame itself and slur the word "British"?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend's sentiments. If we are right in saying that these terrorist attacks are an attack on our way of life, it is most important to say that part of our way of life is tolerance and respect for other people of different races, religions and faiths. It is therefore particularly revolting for anyone to try to exploit these attacks for the purpose of racism.

Q3. [11629] Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): The tube terrorists were British, but does the Prime Minister agree that many of those who organise terrorist training, build terrorist bombs and preach a message of hate from British pulpits have come in from abroad? Will he further agree that it is both unfortunate and unacceptable that Parliament should be forbidden by the highest court in this country from distinguishing between its handling of British citizens on the one hand, and the arrangements that it makes for foreign terror suspects who claim asylum in this country on the other?

The Prime Minister: It is important that we recognise that this issue has a series of different dimensions. One dimension is of those abroad who try to instil and inculcate this extremist ideology and fanaticism in people, and another is of people who come here to preach it. We must deal with every single aspect of it. That is also a reason why the idea of developing electronic borders, which will allow us to track more carefully people coming into our country, which we are undertaking now and which will take some time to build up because of the technology involved, will be essential in the medium term to protect the integrity of our borders.

Q4. [11630] Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that our right hon. Friend the Chancellor told European Finance Ministers yesterday that they must step up their actions to seize terrorist assets—a move, I think, that will be supported by the whole House. Those same sentiments, however, were expressed following the terrorist attacks in Madrid last year. What action is the EU taking now to ensure that all member states have in place the powers to freeze the assets of those terrorist organisations?

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said yesterday, we have taken action against some 45 different individuals and groups to freeze their assets. He rightly said yesterday that there can be no hiding place for the terrorists and those who finance them. It is fair to say that co-operation has increased tremendously across Europe over the past few years. In particular, I commend the help that the Spanish police and authorities have been giving us. It is also true that that now needs to be stepped up, because the threat, as people can see, is very real.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): May I associate myself fully with the expressions of condolence and sympathy from the Prime Minister earlier, and on behalf of Plaid Cymru and the Scottish National party fully support the Government in their efforts to bring to justice the awful men and, I presume, women who are responsible for the attack?

On an entirely separate matter, which is quite urgent, will the Prime Minister intervene personally to alleviate the problems of many licensees in Wales who have availed themselves of the right, under the Welsh Language Act 1993, to submit forms through the medium of the Welsh language? The deadline is 6 August and no such forms exist. Is the Prime Minister not a little discomfited that 12 years since the passing of that Act, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, of all Departments, has no Welsh language scheme? Does he not now agree that there is a need for a proper, new and robust Welsh language Act?

The Prime Minister: I will look into what the hon. Gentleman says, but I understand from my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Culture, Media and Sport that urgent discussions are taking place on this issue.

Q5. [11631] Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): While echoing the sentiments expressed on terrorism, may I, too, turn to another topic? Is the Prime Minister aware of the continuing concern of hard-working public servants, particularly teachers and local government employees, that the Local Government Pension Scheme (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 2004, which were laid before the House last year, have not yet been revoked? Will the Prime Minister give the House and those public servants an assurance that the regulations will be revoked as soon as possible, that no changes will be made to the pension rights of public servants and teachers until full negotiation takes place with the public sector trade unions, and that, should we get rid of final-salary pensions and bring in pensions based on average earnings, that arrangement will be binding on this House and on Ministers of the Crown?

The Prime Minister: I understand that a statement about changes to the regulatory scheme is being made today. I entirely agree, as do all the stakeholders involved, that local authority employees should have a good quality, stable and viable pension scheme. The question is how to do that and how to get the balance right between cost of provision to employers and to the taxpayer, and the value of the benefits to scheme members who pay fixed contributions. That is exactly the issue that we are addressing in the statement later today. I know, however, that my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's tripartite committee is ensuring the full involvement of local authority employers and trade unions. I doubt whether we will be able to satisfy everybody on this issue, but we are doing our level best to find the right balance.

Q6. [11632] Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): My constituent, Joseph, a little boy with complex learning and medical problems, was not suited to mainstream education. He was ostracised by other children, became very poorly and at the age of only eight, he tried to kill himself in order to escape his misery. He is now at Cedar Hall special school, where he is thriving in every possible way. He is happy now. Does the Prime Minister think that special schools are worth keeping? Does he think that the Government's audit of special schools is serious, given that they are being closed, and will he look into the funding of Cedar Hall special school and ensure that it is retained?

The Prime Minister: Of course I value special schools. The question of whether to close a particular school or how to make such provision is decided through the local authority, and I assume that the hon. Gentleman's local authority—[HON. MEMBERS: "Tory"]—is Essex county council, so he can make representations to it about how provision in the area works. But let me make absolutely clear my own view, which is that there will be circumstances in which the right thing for the children is to integrate them in mainstream schooling; however, I totally agree that, equally, there will be situations in which that is quite the wrong thing to do. Both types of provision have to be available, therefore, but I really do believe that the best mix is better determined locally, rather than nationally.

Q7. [11633] Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Here in London on 26 May, my right hon. Friend made a speech during which he said that Europe

"often seems to want to regulate too heavily without sufficient cause".

He quoted the food supplements directive as an example. In the light of yesterday's very disappointing ruling from the European Court of Justice, and bearing in mind the fact that Britain now holds the EU presidency, will my right hon. Friend be making representations in Europe so that we can continue to sell safe and popular food supplements on the shelves of British food stores?

The Prime Minister: We will certainly do our best to ensure that that is the case. I can tell my hon. Friend that I understand that the Food Standards Agency has given derogations to some 500 different substances. I would also say that it is important that any control regime should be extremely light touch, and we are doing our level best to make sure that that is the case. In addition, there is the issue of maximum dosages, which it is also important for us to handle in a way that accords with common sense rather than a somewhat exaggerated view of the dangers.

Q8. [11634] Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): Our NHS is obviously the envy of the world and we should congratulate all those who worked so hard last week in the wake of the terrorist activity. Is the Prime Minister aware that many of the hospital trusts in south-east London are overspent and running out of money? Why does he think that is happening: what is he planning to do about it; and will he reassure patients that services will not be cut?

The Prime Minister: It is worth pointing out that the actual amount of deficit compared with the amount of money going into the health service is very small indeed. In fact, the deficits are far below what they were in the mid-1990s, for example, and I would like to point that out to the hon. Gentleman. In addition, as a result of the extra investment in the NHS, waiting lists in his and other areas have come down, as have waiting times: more people are being treated and more people are being treated better. Without re-running the arguments of a few months ago, it is surely the case that we have got the NHS improving only as a result of the extra investment plus the change. The worst thing that we could do, of course, would be to reverse those policies.

Q9. [11635] Mr. Neil Turner (Wigan) (Lab): The events of last Thursday overshadowed the elation that we all felt on Wednesday when it was announced that London would host the 2012 Olympic games. One of the reasons why we were awarded those games is that we stressed that they would be for the benefit not just of this country but of the whole world. Will my right hon. Friend share his initial thoughts on how he intends to ensure that the benefits of the games are spread to places such as Wigan and, indeed, throughout the whole country?

The Prime Minister: I have to be careful about what I promise my hon. Friend in relation to the Olympic facilities. We are determined to ensure that the legacy of the Olympic games will accrue not just to the benefit of London, though a whole area of London will be regenerated. As a result of our success, there will be sports facilities all over the country. One of the reasons why our bid was so strong and ultimately successful is that we made it clear that the Olympic games of 2012 would leave a legacy not just for the Olympic movement, but for our country and for sport in our country. That was one of the principal reasons that swung the bid our way.

Q10. [11636] Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): The Prime Minister's answer on the vitamins directive simply will not wash with the 1 million people who signed a petition against it. Does the Prime Minister remember that on 26 May he described this directive, albeit belatedly, as "unnecessary interference . . . wholly out of proportion to the risks run."?

If the Prime Minister is not to be regarded as impotent, will he tell us what action he is taking in that regard?

The Prime Minister: I thought for a moment that the hon. Gentleman was about to suggest a vitamin! What is important here is to make sure that, in respect of existing legislation, things are done in a very light-touch way, which we will do. However, there is still a further stage, which is connected with the business of maximum dosage. That is where it is important to ensure that we do not end up with a situation in which the action taken is wholly disproportionate. That is what we will be working towards.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): While I welcome what my right hon. Friend has said about the fight against terrorism, will he acknowledge that during the last few years there has been a series of reports that have set out both the symptoms and the causes of alienation among Muslim young people? While it would be crass in the extreme to suggest a direct cause-and-effect link between the two, is it not the case that extremists fish for a few vulnerable people in that pool of alienation? Will my right hon. Friend tell the House today that he will look again at the evidence of the challenges facing young Muslim people and assess the response that is necessary not just from within the Muslim community, but from the majority community as a whole?

The Prime Minister: What my right hon. Friend says is right, and that is precisely what we will do. The point that I was trying to make earlier is the one that my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Malik) also made very well. It is that there is sensible leadership in the Muslim community that is prepared to stand up and be counted and take on the extremists. It is important that those people do that, but my right hon. Friend is right to say that it is also important that the rest of us get behind them and support them. We must study the reasons and causes behind what has happened, but I fear that it is not something that can be dealt with just by our country alone. When we look at the network of extremism that now exists right around the world and the means of communication that terrorists have, it is clear that, although we must deal with the problem in our own community, it will not be resolved finally until it is dealt with in every community in which it is incubated. That is what happens: young people get indoctrinated in an extreme and poisonous version—and perversion—of the religion of Islam, but nonetheless we must confront the fact that it exists.

Primary Schools (Reading)

Q11. [11637] Mr. Lee Scott (Ilford, North) (Con): If he will make funding available for two new primary schools in the London borough of Redbridge.

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer set out in his Budget statement, the Government have provided unprecedented investment for primary schools in England. That is part of a total school building programme that is six times as large as it was in 1996–97.

Mr. Scott: The residents of Ilford, North and Redbridge will be disappointed by that answer. [Interruption.] Will the Prime Minister please ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills to look into this as a matter of urgency?

The Prime Minister: Well, if they are disappointed by that, it is hard to imagine what they must have felt like in 1996–97. A major school building and refurbishment programme is under way over the next few years. That is why it is so important that we keep the investment going into our school system, and why it is such a shame that the Opposition voted against it when we proposed it.

BILL PRESENTED

CLIMATE CHANGE

Mr. Michael Meacher, supported by Mr. Tim Yeo, Norman Baker, Mr. John Gummer, Robert Key, Vera Baird, Joan Ruddock, Emily Thornberry, Tony Lloyd, Andrew George, Mr. Martin Horwood, and Mr. Mike Weir, presented a Bill to combat climate change by setting annual targets for the reduction of carbon dioxide emissions until 2050; to place duties on the Prime Minister regarding the reporting on and achievement of those targets; to specify procedures to be followed if the targets are not met; to specify certain functions of and provide certain powers to Members of Parliament with regard to ensuring carbon dioxide emissions are reduced; to set sectoral reduction targets and targets for energy efficiency, the generation of energy from renewable sources, combined heat and power and microgeneration; and for connected purposes. And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 10 March 2006, and to be printed. [Bill 43].

Green Belt Reform

12.32 pm

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision about the Green Belt; and for connected purposes.

It was in 1955 that the then Government first encouraged local authorities to establish green belts around our main cities. Over the past 50 years, green belts have become the best known and the most popular of this country's planning policies, yet today they are under greater pressure for development than ever before.

Every year, 2,400 acres of green belt are developed on. In my constituency, 1,500 acres are under threat from one development. My Bill would reform our green belts, re-establish their permanence and thereby encourage much needed urban renewal. I am delighted to say that my Bill has secured support from hon. Members of all the main political parties in this House. My aim is simple: to ensure that green belt policy continues to shape the environment and our communities for the next 50 years.

Despite what some people may assume, green belt land makes up just 13 per cent. of England. The largest single example with which hon. Members will be familiar is the metropolitan green belt, which has prevented London from sprawling right across the south-east. It has protected thousands of acres of countryside and preserved the rural habitat for many thousands of indigenous wildlife species. In many ways, however, the green belt is more important for the way that it shapes our towns and cities by providing natural and permanent limits to them. That limit has stimulated a myriad urban renewal schemes, by encouraging the reuse and regeneration of neglected city land. By creating that natural boundary to our cities, we have been able to prevent the ugly, urban sprawl that sadly characterises some foreign cities—a sprawl that sucks the life out of city centres and generates needless commuter journeys every working day.

For example, without a green belt, Birmingham would have spread out across the Meriden gap to merge with Coventry and elsewhere with Kidderminster, Lichfield and Tamworth. The green belt in the midlands has encouraged the reuse of brownfield land and helped those communities to keep their individual character. I maintain that green belts put the heart back into our cities, by stimulating their renewal.

Unfortunately, our green belts are today shrinking in the face of enormous pressure for development. The latest figures show that since 1997, 284 acres have been developed in the south-west; more than 1,000 acres have been built on in the south-east; and, every year, an area of more than 15 square miles is developed on green belt land. That is the equivalent of the city of Lincoln.

What has gone wrong? After all, there has always been development pressure from developers and investors, but they are now targeting green belt sites far more. What has changed? The answer lies in a subtle but significant change in policy. Two years ago, the Government published a new set of planning guidance.

Instead of reaffirming the permanence of land already designated, they focused on the total acreage. Thus the Deputy Prime Minster has said that he would "maintain or increase green-belt land in every region in England."—[Official Report, 5 February 2003; Vol. 399, c. 275.]

However, that differs from the original policy. In a county such as Hertfordshire, it means that land can be released for development if land elsewhere in the region—near Peterborough, for example—is rebadged as green belt. As hon. Members will realise, that entirely undermines the idea of a permanent green belt that shapes a city. Indeed, what it leaves us with is more like an elastic band, something that is continually stretched as more and more development is forced in. The irony is that the Government's plans for urban renewal are undermined, because developers and investors know only too well that all they need to do is to wait for the greenfield sites to be developed and ignore the awkward neglected city sites.

It is time to reverse that policy change and get rid of the elastic band. I wish to re-establish, in law, the permanent character of green belt land and, with it, the benefits of urban renewal and protection of the countryside. My Bill would seek to reverse the changes of 2003, to make the policy site-specific again, and to ensure that the boundaries of green belt land are clear and permanent. More land could then be designated, but that would not mean that other land could be released for development as a quid pro quo. The result would be to strengthen significantly the protection of our countryside and to help to shape our towns and cities. In a way, it would encourage the often ingenious minds of developers and investors to think how they could reuse a neglected site or develop land that has been overlooked. It would also end much of the current green field speculation in which people are being conned by the unscrupulous, who market plots of green belt land for tens of thousands of pounds on the internet.

Fifty years on from their conception, green belts are still the most effective and popular means we have of protecting our countryside and renewing and revitalising our towns. Green belts have stopped urban sprawl; kept neighbouring towns independent; and have given us all close to hand the open countryside that is so vital to our health and wellbeing.

We need to reform our green belt policy, to restore permanent boundaries and character, and I am delighted to be supported by Members not just from my own party but on both sides of the House, not least because they hope and believe, as I do, that by reforming our green belts we can ensure that they continue to shape our communities and the environment for another generation.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mark Prisk, Colin Challen, Dr. John Pugh, Andrew Selous, Mr. Robert Syms, Mr. Andrew Lansley, Mr. Mark Lancaster, Anne Main, Philip Davies, Mr. James Gray, Mr. Stephen O'Brien and Mr. Edward Vaizey.

GREEN BELT REFORM

Mr. Prisk accordingly presented a Bill to make provision about the Green Belt; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 June, and to be printed [Bill 44].

Business of the House

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Leader of the House, it may be helpful if I say something about the arrangement of today's business. If the Leader of the House's business motion—item 3 on the Order Paper—is agreed to, we will begin a single debate covering motions 4 to 40. It will be in order in that debate to discuss the general question, how the House selects the membership of its Committees, as well as the particular proposals in the motions. At the end of four and a half hours the Chair will put the question on each of the motions in turn.

A notice of my selection of amendments is available in the No Lobby and the Vote Office in the normal way. When we reach a motion to which an amendment has been selected, the occupant of the Chair will invite the Member concerned to move the amendment formally, and the House will decide first on the amendment and then on the motion, amended or not as may be the case.

When all the questions on motions 4 to 40 have been disposed of, the House will begin a separate one and a half hour debate on motions 41 to 44, relating to Standards and Privileges.

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Before I move the motion, I mention for the benefit of right hon. and hon. Members that I have arranged for a book of condolence to be placed in the Library and if Members want to sign it, as I hope they will, it is now available.

I beg to move,

That, at this day's sitting, the Speaker shall put—

(a) the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motions in the name of Mr Geoffrey Hoon, Mr Bob Ainsworth and Rosemary McKenna, other than those listed in paragraph (b) of this Order, not later than four and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Motion for this Order, and

(b) the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motions in the name of Mr Geoffrey Hoon and Mr Bob Ainsworth relating to standards and Privileges, Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards, Committee on Standards and Privileges and Standards and Privileges (Nomination) not later than one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the first Motion; such Questions shall include the Questions on any Amendments selected by the Speaker which may then be moved; proceedings may continue, though opposed, after the moment of interruption; and Standing Order No. 41A (Deferred divisions) shall not apply.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for helpfully summarising my entire speech on the issue so, to save time, I do not intend to repeat it. It is important that we are able to debate the items set out in motions 4 to 40, followed by a separate debate on Standards and Privileges covering motions 41 to 44.

It is in the interests of the House that we agree the motion swiftly and get on to those important debates. I commend the motion to the House.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I thank the Leader of the House for establishing a book of condolence, which is entirely appropriate.

I do not have much to add to the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, except that I am glad that the debate is not being artificially guillotined, as often happens, and that we can have a full debate about a wide range of directly linked issues. Let us get on with the main debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Committees

Administration Committee

12.44 pm

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): I beg to move,

That Standing Orders Nos. 139 (Select Committee on Broadcasting) and 142 (Domestic Committees) be repealed and the following be a Standing Order of the House:

"Administration Committee

(1) There shall be a select committee, to be called the Administration Committee, to consider the services provided for and by the House and to make recommendations thereon to the House of Commons Commission or to the Speaker. Any such recommendation whose implementation would incur additional expenditure charged to the Estimate for House of Commons: Administration shall also be considered by the Finance and Services Committee.

(2) The committee shall make rules and give directions to Officers of the House in respect only of such administrative matters as may from time to time be determined by the Speaker or by the House of Commons Commission.

(3) The committee shall consist of not more than 16 Members, of whom five shall be a quorum.

(4) The committee shall have power—

(a) to send for persons, papers and records, to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House, to adjourn from place to place, and to report from time to time;

(b) to appoint specialist advisers either to supply information which is not readily available or to elucidate matters of complexity within the committee's order of reference; and

(c) to communicate its evidence to the House of Commons Commission.

(5) The committee shall have power to appoint sub-committees and to refer to such sub-committees any of the matters referred to the committee and to delegate to such sub-committees any of the powers delegated to the committee under paragraph (2) above.

(6) Any such sub-committee shall have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House, and to adjourn from place to place, to report from time to time the minutes of their proceedings, and shall have a quorum of three.

(7) The committee and any sub-committee appointed by it shall have the assistance of the Officers of the House appropriate to the matters under consideration.

(8) Unless the House otherwise orders, each Member nominated to the Committee shall continue to be a member of it for the remainder of the Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider motions 5 to 40.

Mr. Hoon: We have before us in this afternoon's first debate 37 motions that relate to the reappointment of the Select Committees and related matters and to the payment of the Chairmen of Standing and Select Committees. In respect of several motions, explanatory memorandums have been made available in the Vote Office. I hope that they have been of assistance to hon. Members.

I shall start with the first proposal on the creation of an Administration Committee. The motion provides for the Domestic Committees—the Accommodation and Works, Administration, Catering, Information and Broadcasting Committees—to be replaced by a new, single Administration Committee. I believe that to be a sensible modernising measure. There is a widespread view that the existing structure of the Domestic Committees has become outdated. Convergence in technology makes it no longer appropriate to have separate Broadcasting and Information Committees, for example. There have been occasions when an issue that cuts across more than one Committee has been delayed because the decisions taken by one Committee have had to wait until another Committee has met. A single Committee should allow a more efficient approach, thus ensuring better Member oversight of the services provided throughout the House.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): Before the Leader of the House gets too far into the detail of all these motions, will he address an item of principle? It is the role of the House to create departmental Select Committees, whose role is to hold the Government to account. Does he not feel that it is bordering on the politically corrupt for the Government to have such an important influence on selecting the members of those departmental Select Committees? Will he therefore take the chance, after today's debate, to look again at involving Members on both sides of the House in considering whether we could have a better system, perhaps one that involves the election of the members of departmental Select Committees by their colleagues in the House, rather than one that persists in allowing the very organisation that is meant to be scrutinised to have the right to put Members on to the departmental Select Committees of the House?

Mr. Hoon: I disagree with my hon. Friend, not least because the great strength of our Select Committee system is that it reflects the great strength of our political party system both in the House and in the country. It is a matter for the political parties represented in the House to determine the appropriate allocation of Members to the Select Committees. I do not know whether he was present at the most recent meeting of the parliamentary Labour party, where it was made clear that an inordinate amount of time had been spent on transparently and fairly selecting the Labour party's representation. I obviously cannot speak for other political parties in the House, but his own political party went to a great deal of trouble to ensure that the nominations were in accordance with the principles of the Labour party. In those circumstances, I do not believe that he can complain that proper democratic procedures have not been adopted. Those are the proper democratic procedures of his and my political party.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): May I perhaps come partly to the aid of the Leader of the House? He will be aware that the Modernisation Committee, which I have no doubt he will be chairing shortly, has considered this matter. Although its recommendations were very narrowly defeated in the House, I am confident that the matter will come before the Modernisation Committee again, and I hope that he is happy that it should do so, so that the House can consider the important matter raised by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen).

Mr. Hoon: I am always grateful for all the help that I can get, particularly from such a distinguished source, but it is important that the will of the political parties is reflected in the way in which Select Committees are appointed. I believe that that is carried out with very commendable concern for democracy and the principles of democracy that inform the House.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): My friend will know that the parliamentary committee of the parliamentary Labour party decided that people who leave the Government—ex-Ministers—should not seamlessly transfer to take up the chairmanship of Select Committees. Does my friend agree with that?

Mr. Hoon: I have made it quite clear that, as Leader of the House, I am not responsible for the internal workings of the political parties represented in the House. I happen to have information available to me because my membership of the Labour party means that, unlike Opposition Members, I am able to attend such distinguished gatherings. However, the principle is a matter for the Labour party. It is not a matter for the House, and thus not a matter for the Leader of the House.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): While the Leader of the House is indulging in tidying up some of these matters, will he explain exactly why a motion relating to the Science and Technology Committee is not on the Order Paper today so that that Committee can be debated along with the other Committees.

Mr. Hoon: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to get to that part of my observations, all will become clear—I hope.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Although I do not want to pry too much into the activities of the PLP, we have just been told that it has come to the decision that somehow ex-Ministers cannot automatically chair Select Committees. Does the Leader of the House think that a similar rule should apply so that if Select Committee Chairmen were invited to join the Government, they should refuse?

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Gentleman makes an excellent point. It is important, however, that I do not go beyond my responsibilities to the House as Leader of the House. It is also important that I make a little progress.

Mr. Allen: The serious point that I was trying to put to my right hon. Friend was that if the House agrees to some of these motions today, we will have four years to consider the matter before it comes round for decision again. Will he consider whether it will be possible to have a discussion, under either his own auspices or those of the Modernisation Committee, to determine whether we can do this better next time?

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that the Modernisation Committee, once established, will want to consider a range of issues, and that might well prove to be one of them. I know that my hon. Friend will pursue the matter with considerable tenacity, as he has done in the House over many years, so I look forward to receiving a letter in due course.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): If the right hon. Gentleman wants to assert to the House that his party has a relatively transparent and democratic means of determining the membership of Select Committees, it is important that the procedure should not be secret. I do not want it to be shrouded in opacity, so will he tell us exactly how the parliamentary Labour party—I am happy to debate my own party's conduct on these matters—determines membership of Select Committees?

Mr. Hoon: This sounds like one of those childhood games of "you show me yours first". It is not necessarily appropriate at this stage to engage in an internal debate about how political parties make decisions. I have dealt with the point already, so it is time for me to move on to deal with the fascinating question of the terms of reference of the new Administration Committee.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) (Lab): Does the Leader of the House agree that if the whole House were involved in the selection of Committee members, it could work to the disadvantage of scrutiny because the majority in the House could impose the Committees that it wanted on the minority? All parties in the House, especially those in opposition, have the prime responsibility to have as effective a system of scrutiny as possible.

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend makes an extremely good point and allows me to return to the fascinating discussion into which I was about to enter on the terms of reference of the new Administration Committee. The terms of reference will reflect those of the Domestic Committees, the only significant difference being that the function of the Committee will be to consider services provided by, as well as for, the House, which will explicitly allow it to consider services provided for the public. Improving the way in which the House communicates with the public is a crucial matter that we must address in this Parliament.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The motion indicates that the Administration Committee will make recommendations to the House of Commons Commission or the Speaker about services provided. When a Select Committee makes a report to a Government Department, it receives a written reply after a period of time to respond to the points that it raises. Under these arrangements, if the Commission decided not to provide a service that the Administration Committee had identified, would it be a requirement that a written report would have to be produced so that hon. Members would know why their Committee's recommendations had been declined?

Mr. Hoon: There will not be such a requirement, but I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion could be considered as a part of the important scrutiny work that Select Committees do and the Government's responses to those Committees. I am sure that that procedure ought to followed as good practice.

Mr. McLoughlin: I welcome the formation of the Administration Committee because far too often in the last Parliament we encountered the problem that Committees decided things that had to be referred to other Committees before progress could be made. Will the Leader of the House confirm that if the Administration Committee makes such a report, there will at least be the opportunity to ask questions about why action has not been taken on its recommendations, if that is the case?

Mr. Hoon: We will need to consider that important point after the Administration Committee has been established and has decided its working patterns. There will be changes as a result of amalgamating the Domestic Committees, so we will need to allow a little time to elapse before determining the consequences of having such a unified Committee, rather than the separate Committees that it is intended to replace.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Exactly in that context, I note that paragraph (6) of motion 4 says that the Administration Committee's Sub-Committees "shall have power to send for person, papers and records".

That power is also given to the Committee itself. Does that mean that the Committee or its Sub-Committees could call members of the Commission to give evidence, precisely to address the point made by my right hon. Friends the Members for Fylde (Mr. Jack) and for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin)?

Mr. Hoon: I was at pains to try to ensure that the terms of reference of the new unified Committee reflected the terms of reference of the Domestic Committees. Having not had my current responsibilities during the period in which those Committees existed, I cannot tell the House whether the motion precisely reflects the previous situation—[Interruption.] I am receiving certain indications that perhaps it does not. Nevertheless, it follows on logically from what the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) pointed out that the motion gives the Administration Committee extensive powers to call for those persons and papers that it requires. No doubt that will be one of the consequential changes that may follow the establishment of this important House Committee.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): As a relatively new Member, I am aware that modernisation needs to take place on many Committees. However, I am surprised by how long it has taken to appoint hon. Members to Committees. Is the Leader of the House also concerned about the delay in appointing Committee members?

Mr. Hoon: I intend to deal with that point when I reach the part of my speech—if we ever get there—on proposals for the appointment of Select Committees. I have been asked about the matter on several occasions in the House and have made it clear, and repeated today, the importance of the role of political parties. If my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) is to be satisfied in his understandable concern about the need to respect democratic principles in the selection of Select Committee members, it is important to deal with such matters thoroughly. I have indicated that that has been the case for the Labour party. Thoroughness takes time, but that thorough approach has allowed the Committees to be appointed before the summer recess, which was an undertaking that I gave to the House, and allowed political parties to be involved in the necessary democratic process for the selection of their candidates. That seems to me to be a perfectly proper compromise—

Mr. Allen rose—

Mr. Hoon: I sense that I am risking reopening this debate.

Mr. Allen: I am delighted that the Leader of the House has moved the debate on. As he mentioned my name, I felt obliged to make a contribution on this issue. To answer the hon. Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie), the process has been relatively fast compared with previous occasions when it sometimes took six or seven months before Committees were set up. The way forward is, again, to remove the power from the Government and the alternative Government, and make it part of Mr. Speaker's duties to convene Select Committees within a given period after a general election. The delay, which is to the benefit only of the Government, would not then occur. Members of Parliament would take control of their own Committees.

Mr. Hoon: I knew that I had made a mistake earlier on, but I am grateful to my hon. Friend for continuing the debate.

I shall conclude that debate by dealing with the fifth motion on the Order Paper, which concerns the Finance and Services Committee. The motion makes minor changes to the order of reference of that Committee consequential to the establishment of the new Administration Committee. It also reflects changes in how we refer to the House Administration and the administration estimate.

Motion 5 modifies the operation of the two-Parliament rule for Select Committee Chairmen. Standing Order No. 122A was agreed in May 2002, following the recommendation of the Modernisation Committee. It was not popular with all Members—I recognise that some members of the Liaison Committee, in particular, felt that limiting their term served to reduce the effectiveness of Select Committees—but the majority of the House felt that there was merit in a degree of turnover: Select Committees should not become the established responsibilities of a few senior Members.

The purpose of the motion today is not to reopen that debate but to ensure that the rule achieves its intended purpose. When the House agreed the rule, it agreed an amendment adding the words in case of very short Parliaments, as in 1974, for example. As a result, I believe unintended by the House, a Chairman who has served for two full Parliaments could be re-elected for a third if the date of his re-election fell just within eight years of his first election. The proposed change would mean that if a Chairman were elected for a third term, the chairmanship would cease at the expiry of eight years from first election.

"or a continuous period of eight years, whichever is the greater"

Mr. Gordon Prentice: What happens if the terms of reference or remit of a Select Committee are changed to reflect the departmental configuration of Whitehall? Is it a new Committee?

Mr. Hoon: It is clear that it is a new Committee, and the term would then begin with the commencement of that new Committee.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): It may sound old-fashioned, but I do not think that the proposal is fair. I would like the Leader of the House to consider my amendment, which would mean that those people who were incumbent Chairmen as at the general election would not be disadvantaged. If my right hon. Friend is convinced of the merits of his new rule, it should operate so that my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), for example, is not disadvantaged in this Parliament by the rules being changed, and the goalposts moved, during this Parliament. The clock started ticking for her period as Chairman of the Transport Committee in the last Parliament.

Mr. Hoon: I do not anticipate that I will betray any confidences if I indicate to my hon. Friend that I have had some serious conversations with my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), in which she made her views known with, it is fair to say, considerable force. I make it clear, however, that the amendment does no more than give effect to what the House intended. There was an unintended consequence of the amendment made when this position was first established in the Standing Orders of the House which would allow, for example, someone who had by chance been elected on 21 July 1997 to continue in office for a further full term of Parliament if the relevant meeting happened to take place on 22 July 2005. That was not intended by the House. The House was clear as to its wish, which was to allow right hon. and hon. Members to serve as Select Committee Chairmen for two terms or for eight years, whichever happened to be the longer. The amendment simply gives effect to that; it does no more than that. It is not intended in any way to overturn the previous rule; it simply clarifies that rule and gives effect to what the House originally intended for its Standing Orders.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman think that this very desirable rule should be applied to other office holders in and outside government?

Mr. Hoon: Term limits are common practice in many parts of the United States. There is a term limit for the President of the United States, and I lived for a time in Kentucky, where governors were allowed to serve only one term. That appeared to have something to do with the history of the office and the opportunities that it afforded to its incumbent—I am sure that that is no longer the case. However, term limits are fashionable in some constitutions. Generally speaking, they have not been considered appropriate in the United Kingdom, save for the wish of the House of Commons to ensure a turnover from time to time in the occupancy of the chairmanships of Select Committees—

Andrew Mackinlay: And save for our having had seven Ministers for Europe in seven years.

Mr. Hoon: It is probably wise to move on to the next fascinating motion. Motion 7 relates to the size of some

[Mr. Hoon]

Select Committees. It proposes that the size of the Defence, Foreign Affairs, Home Affairs, Trade and Industry and Treasury Committees should increase from 11 to 14 members, reflecting the considerable interest in serving on those Committees. It proposes that the size of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee should reduce from 17 to 14 members and that the size of the Regulatory Reform Committee should reduce from 18 to 14.

I appreciate that when the Modernisation Committee recommended a slightly larger increase in the size of the departmental Select Committees in 2002, there was some opposition from the Liaison Committee on the ground that it would inhibit Committee cohesion. The reason for proposing a modest increase today is simply that the interest of Members in serving on some of the Committees is very great. I believe that there is value in ensuring that more Back Benchers are given the opportunity to be involved in the important work of scrutiny that the departmental Select Committees undertake.

Motion 8 makes minor changes to the Standing Orders to reflect the establishment of Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs. Motions 9 to 31 are nominations to Select Committees in the name of the Chairman of the Committee of Selection. I appreciate that these motions have taken a little time to come before the House—longer than I would have liked—but it is very much to be welcomed that most of the Select Committees will, subject to the agreement of the House today, be up and running before the summer recess.

For the first time, as I have said, those nominations are the product, in the Labour party at least, of a transparent party process, and it is inevitable that this should have taken a little time. We hope that the Committee of Selection will be able to bring forward motions to nominate the Science and Technology, Welsh Affairs, and Finance and Services Committees as soon as possible.

I remain committed to strengthening the Select Committee system. Since 2002, there has been a significant increase in the staff resources available to Select Committees and their activity has increased greatly. I will not pretend that this activity is always welcomed by Departments, but that is as it should be. It is widely recognised that the Select Committees now play an important part in our democratic life: they are a crucial check on the work of Government. I pay tribute to the work of Members who served on Committees in the last Parliament, and I anticipate continued vigorous activity in the Parliament ahead.

Motion 32 makes provision for the first meeting of the Joint Committee on Human Rights. Motion 33 provides for the re-establishment and nomination of the Modernisation Committee. The Committee has done valuable work since 1997, but I believe that there remains much more that it can usefully look at. Although I know that some Conservative Members are not enthusiasts for modernisation—

Mr. Forth: That is putting it mildly.

Mr. Hoon: I am delighted to have this opportunity to praise the work of the Modernisation Committee to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. McLoughlin: Can the Leader of the House tell us what the Modernisation Committee can do that the Procedure Committee could not do?

Mr. Hoon: I think that the short answer is probably "deliver", but that may be a little frank for someone who inhabits the Whips Office. My predecessors as Leader of the House have served on the Modernisation Committee and have seen their recommendations through the House. It is important that that momentum is maintained.

Mr. Forth: If it is true, as the Leader of the House has disgracefully claimed, that the Modernisation Committee can deliver where, he says insultingly, that the Procedure Committee cannot, could that be because the Modernisation Committee is, disgracefully, chaired by a member of the Cabinet?

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has put that spin on my remarks. There was no intention on my part in any way to criticise any other Committee or the way that it operates. I was making it clear that there was a real feeling among Members on both sides of the House—not only on the Government Benches—that it was necessary to bring our practices and procedures into the 20th century, if not the 21st century. That has meant that the work of the Committee has been reflected in practice. Other Committees may work in slower time, but there was a degree of urgency felt by Modernisation Committee members of all political parties that are represented in the House, and that urgency has been reflected in the fact that it has been prepared to deliver.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): On the question of delivery, did not the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor as Leader of the House and Chairman of the Modernisation Committee, the right hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), fail to deliver changes in how we appoint Select Committees?

Mr. Hoon: There was a debate in the House and a vote, and in its wisdom the House chose to reject the proposals of the Modernisation Committee. I do not pretend—I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman, who is greatly experienced in the ways of the House, will agree—that all recommendations of all Committees will always be accepted on the Floor. On that occasion, they were not.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am sure that the Leader of House will accept that his chairing of the Modernisation Committee gives it the power to deliver; no other Select Committee has a Cabinet Minister as Chairman. Does he agree that the House works best when Committees that are concerned with the way in which the House operates and scrutinises legislation—the Procedure Committee and the Modernisation Committee—co-operate? Is that not the best to way to proceed? That is why I have chosen again to serve on the Modernisation Committee, having been one of its founding members way back in 1997.

Mr. Hoon: I have always been thoroughly impressed by the hon. Gentleman's work, both generally in the range of activities that he pursues in the House on behalf of his constituents, and specifically in the excellent way in which he has chaired the Procedure Committee—not a Committee on which many right hon. and hon. Members volunteer to serve. He has done so with great distinction and that has informed the work of the Modernisation Committee.

I still believe that there are times in the House when speedy change is required. Perhaps the Modernisation Committee moves more quickly simply because it has the benefit of the Leader of House as its Chairman. That is obviously a matter for the House. However, given the proposal that is before the House, I hope to be re-elected as its Chairman in due course and to be able to continue its excellent work. Crucial to that is the knowledge and experience that Members can bring to bear on its work. If the House so decides, I look forward to the hon. Gentleman again making a valuable contribution to the Committee's work.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Notwithstanding the importance of the Leader of the House chairing the Modernisation Committee, does my right hon. Friend accept that in broad measure it is vital that Select Committees should be Back-Bench Committees? If we are to achieve the cross-party working on which most Select Committees rely, it is important that Opposition Members do not keep on switching between Front-Bench and Back-Bench responsibilities, by being Front Benchers and yet serving on Select Committees. Sometimes, that is used for partisan reasons.

Mr. Hoon: I am dealing today only with the current nominations. Those questions will logically follow later in our proceedings.

Mr. Jack: The Leader of the House will be aware of exchanges in the previous Parliament involving the Liaison Committee following the Hutton inquiry's access to information of a broad-ranging nature. Subsequently, in meetings with the Liaison Committee and others, the Government indicated a more flexible and open approach to the provision of information to Select Committees. Is the right hon. Gentleman yet in a position to be able to define that greater openness and access to information, so that new Chairmen of Committees might be fully apprised of what they can expect when they call for papers in the context of inquiries?

Mr. Hoon: I had hoped that the practice had already improved. I was not aware of any serious complaints from Chairmen of Select Committees. I hope that if there are problems about access to papers, the right hon. Gentleman will write to me about them, and I shall deal with that in the usual way.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: The Government have pledged to revisit the Osmotherly rules. Which of the rules have been changed?

Mr. Hoon: The Osmotherly rules, I am informed, will be issued tomorrow. Perhaps we can have a debate on that rather complex subject if one is required. At one stage in my previous career I studied those rules with considerable care. No doubt my hon. Friend will be able to refer to that in due course.

Andrew Mackinlay: As the question of Osmotherly rules has come up, can we place in Hansard the advice that the Clerk of the House of Commons gave to Lord Hutton that the Osmotherly rules were not agreed between the Government and Parliament? We need to reaffirm that, particularly as coincidentally the rules are to be published tomorrow. There should be no misunderstanding; to these Houses of Parliament, they are not worth the paper that they are written on. They have been handed down like tablets of stone by the Executive. I will certainly not be signing up to them, and judging from the mood the House, I do not think that it will be signing up to them either.

Mr. McLoughlin: It would be nice to see the rules.

Mr. Hoon: Indeed it might be better to see them before we reach clear conclusions on their content.

I was referring to the contribution that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst makes to any reference to modernisation. The work of Conservatives members of the Modernisation Committee has been extremely valuable in taking forward changes in the House, and I look forward to the right hon. Gentleman's observations on the Committee's work during this Parliament.

Mr. Allen: I commend my right hon. Friend for congratulating the Modernisation Committee on its very good although sometimes glacially slow work. I ask him not to be unkind to the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), because by his obstruction, by his keeping up colleagues late at night and by his using the rules as he did, he has caused more modernisation in this Chamber than virtually any other Member. My right hon. Friend should congratulate him on doing that.

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst has made a distinctive contribution to the work of the House, as he did to the European Parliament. I first met him when he was an enthusiastic Member of the European Parliament, which he has tried to live down ever since. We all have records to defend, and at some stage we will be able to debate European matters, but I need to make progress.

I return to the fascinating subject of the terms of reference of the Modernisation Committee, which Members will have noticed are slightly changed from those in the previous Parliament. The function of the Committee will be to consider how the House operates and to make recommendations for modernisation, rather than being limited to the consideration of the practices and procedures of the House. That is intended to ensure that the Modernisation Committee is not constrained in its field of inquiry. It would, for example, be able to consider matters touching on the administration of the House.

Motion 34 provides for the membership of the Liaison Committee. As in the past, it will include the Chairmen of all Select Committees. In addition, as in the previous Parliament, the motion nominates the Father of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), in anticipation of the fact that the Committee might wish to appoint a Chairman who does not also represent the interests of a particular Committee.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): It is a great innovation to put the Father of the House on the Liaison Committee. Does the Leader of the House think that the Liaison Committee reflects the membership of the House? There is still no minority party membership of it. If the arithmetic were applied to reflect the proportions of representation, we should have a place on the Liaison Committee. Will he work to ensure that the Committee reflects the views of all parties in the House?

Mr. Hoon: It is important that the Liaison Committee reflects the Committees of the House. It is there for a particular purpose, which is not necessarily to reflect all the political parties represented in the House. The difficulty in practice with the hon. Gentleman's suggestion is that he would have to persuade the House that the minority parties could agree on who would represent them. I expect that he would experience some problems doing so but, nevertheless, the traditional purpose of the Liaison Committee is to reflect the Committees. It is not necessarily to reflect the political parties in the same way as Select Committee membership.

Mr. Forth: I would like to try to help the Leader of the House by urging him to support the amendment that I tabled with other hon. Members. It says that

"the senior backbench member of the Chairmen's Panel shall also be a member of the Liaison Committee".

That would give the minority parties an opportunity, if they served at length and with distinction on the Chairmen's Panel, to serve on the Liaison Committee. My excellent amendment, which I shall seek to move if I catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, would serve a double purpose and provide the minority parties with the opportunity for which the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) asked.

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Gentleman has assisted the minority parties and me with his suggestion but, following the earlier mention of glacial progress, I doubt whether the minority parties would want to wait quite that long.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Leader of the House must accept that the stature of the Liaison Committee has changed dramatically. It used to bring together Select Committee Chairmen to discuss Select Committee business, but now, twice a year, it conducts a two-hour interrogation or question time with the Prime Minister. The Liaison Committee has changed substantially, so the Leader of the House ought to listen to the minority parties, particularly if they can suggest one person to represent their interests.

Mr. Hoon: I remain open to sensible suggestions. I was simply pointing out that the minority parties may not agree on a single candidate, so the difficulty would then arise of how to choose between the different parties that we loosely call the minority parties.

Pete Wishart: I think that in principle the right hon. Gentleman does not object to minority parties serving on the Liaison Committee. Would he be satisfied if we produced a formula or process whereby we could share a position on the Liaison Committee?

Mr. Hoon: I am a deeply cautious lawyer and I would prefer to wait and see what sensible proposal the hon. Gentleman came up with.

Chris Bryant: An amendment could be tabled.

Mr. Hoon: Perhaps the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) is still thinking about it, but I look forward to considering the results carefully.

The amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) and other hon. Members, which proposes that the senior Back-Bench member of the Chairmen's Panel should be an additional Liaison Committee member, may have something to do with the fact that the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) may unfortunately lose his place on the Liaison Committee because of the two-Parliament rule. I have already expressed the esteem in which I hold him. His experience and independence of mind are widely respected in the House.

Mr. Forth: But—

Mr. Hoon: There is, however, a question, as I have already suggested, about the extent to which we should continue to expand the size of the Liaison Committee. It is a practical question—if the House wishes to have a much larger Liaison Committee with, as the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) suggested, functions very different from its traditional role, it will bring that to bear in its consideration of the amendment. I accept, however, that the amendment opens the way to further membership, not least by the minority parties. I therefore have concerns about the size, functions and nature of the Liaison Committee, but it is obviously a matter for the House to decide whether to accept the proposal.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I am curious about the contradictions in the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. A few minutes ago, he talked about the need to expand the membership of the Defence Committee because of Members' enthusiasm to serve on it, and he has tabled a motion to that effect. He is now expressing concern that the Liaison Committee may become too big. What is the optimal size of those Committees?

Mr. Hoon: I do not think that there is any contradiction in my remarks, and I do not think that the hon. Gentleman seriously believes that there is. The Liaison Committee has had a particular function for a number of years. I accept that that function has changed, but it is for the House to decide whether, as a result, a bigger Committee should perform a slightly different function, particularly in relation to the questioning of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Unfortunately, however, the hon. Gentleman's argument about Members' enthusiasm to serve on the Liaison Committee probably applies to most Members, so we need a practical means to limit membership of that Committee. Traditionally, such membership has extended to Select Committee Chairmen, but it is right to add the Father of the House, because he served a particular role with great success as the Chairman of the previous Liaison Committee. Whether we wish to go further is a matter for the House.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: The Leader of the House has suggested that I may have a limited vested interest in the amendment, but does he accept that the Chairmen's Panel has an important role to play in the House? It is sensible and appropriate for a Back-Bench Member representing the Panel to have an input in the Liaison Committee. The Chairmen's Panel meets under the auspices of the Chairman of Ways and Means, but it should have direct access to the Liaison Committee. Colleagues on both sides of the House support the amendment, and we believe that it is appropriate that the senior member—currently a Conservative, but it could be Labour Member—should have a place on the Liaison Committee because of the Panel's role and experience.

Mr. Hoon: As ever, the hon. Gentleman has made his case with great clarity. He makes a perfectly proper point on which the House will decide in due course.

Mr. Alan Williams: The motion makes a novel proposition that has not been considered by the House before. May I suggest a compromise that could be more advantageous than a likely defeat for the motion? Would the Leader of the House be happy for my proposition to receive urgent consideration by the Modernisation Committee, which would then report to the House as rapidly as possible?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the Father of the House for his suggestion. If the proposal is defeated today, I am certainly willing to consider his offer as part of the work of the Modernisation Committee, once it is established.

I now come to motions 35 to 38, which relate to pay for Committee Chairmen. Motion 35 takes note of the recent report from the independent Senior Salaries Review Body on pay for Standing Committee Chairmen, and expresses the opinion of the House that pay for Standing Committee Chairmen should be introduced. I am sure that the House will join me in thanking its chairman, John Baker, and the members of the SSRB for their careful work in preparing the report. They were asked to consider how, if the House decided that it was appropriate to give additional pay to the Chairmen of Standing Committees, that could best be achieved. They found that there was a good case for making an additional payment, at least to Chairmen of Standing Committees undertaking more substantial duties. They outlined a range of options for methods of payment. They concluded that a two-tier panel, with higher payments for members undertaking a minimum time commitment, would represent the best way to match contribution and reward, but they found that a tiered structure of payment based on length of service, as proposed by the Chairman of Ways and Means, was acceptable if the House was disposed to prefer it.

I have considered those options carefully, and I have worked closely with the Chairman of Ways and Means to structure a manageable system that is both open and transparent to the House. It is the strong advice of the Chairman that a two-tier panel would be unworkable and divisive, and that a tiered system based on experience is the option most suited to the needs of the House. He has assured me that there will be a linkage between pay and work load—the more experienced members of the Panel will be expected to do more work—and performance will be properly managed. While in the past there was no reason to eject a Panel member who was able to commit only occasional hours to the Panel, this will no longer be the case. Members who are, for whatever reason, not able to contribute as expected to the Panel will be discharged and their remuneration will cease with immediate effect.

Andrew Mackinlay: The Minister knows that I was implacably opposed and remain opposed to the paying of Chairmen of Select Committees, but I invite him to consider that his proposition is absurd and will create new anomalies. For instance, there has been a row about Ministers who get compensation money when they cease to be Ministers. Next that will apply to former Chairmen of Committees. It implies that some Members pedal faster than other Members. To suggest that there should be some compensation for sitting in the Chair, as skilled as that is, and presiding over Committees, and that Chairmen should get more than other Members, is unhealthy in a democracy. As the Minister has kindly agreed to refer some matters to the Modernisation Committee, will he do the same with this suggestion—that every Member should be expected to take a turn at presiding over a Standing Committee? That is what happens in the Congress of the United States. It would be healthy for us all to get a slice of the action and we all continue to get the basic pay, consistent with democratic norms. The proposal is extraordinarily dangerous and foolhardy in the extreme.

Mr. Hoon: I do not intend to debate with my hon. Friend the principle, which has previously been established on the basis that there should be an alternative career route for Members who choose not to become Ministers or prefer to serve the House in different ways. [Interruption.] I chose my words carefully.

The proposition that we should not recognise the considerable skill required to chair a Committee effectively is wrong. I served on a number of Finance Bill Committees when I first came to the House. Chairing the Committee was an extremely difficult and delicate task that required a considerable understanding of the rather complex proposals contained in the Bill. We need to give some recognition to those who serve the House in that way. It is not a task that gets any kind of public approval or even respect, as it is highly unlikely that members of the public would appreciate the substantial amount of time given over to those responsibilities by a relatively limited number of Members.

The proposal is consistent with the previous decision taken by the House in relation to recognising the contribution that Members make. In some ways, it is more important than the remuneration offered to Select Committee Chairs, because they at least get public recognition and a degree of public exposure for the work that they do. That cannot be said of members of the Chairmen's Panel.

Mr. Forth: I entirely agree with what the right hon. Gentleman has just said in that regard. As he develops his argument on the motion, could he tell us what precedent there is for someone not going on to the full rate of pay when they are appointed to a position either in the Government or in the House? That might be helpful. Could he also explain why he believes the motion does not reflect the fifth recommendation in the SSRB report, which states:

"We consider that . . . a two-tier Panel would represent the best way to match contribution and reward, whilst ensuring equivalence with the pay of Select Committee Chairmen in appropriate cases"?

It seems that whereas the Government make great play of adhering to and reflecting SSRB recommendations, in this case they have gone in an entirely different direction.

Mr. Hoon: I sought to explain to the House the reason for that. I suggested to the Chairman of Ways and Means that he would have to work fairly hard to persuade me that I should depart from the recommendation of the SSRB, but I emphasised to the House the very strong conviction that he has. He has some responsibility for managing the Chairmen's Panel and he believes strongly that this is the best way of achieving the objective that he requires. I have accepted his advice and I am not in any way retreating from it. If the right hon. Gentleman reads further in the SSRB report, he will see that the board does not rule out, and indeed would accept, a more tiered arrangement.

On the right hon. Gentleman's first proposition, it is important that in ensuring full respect for the decision of the House, if the House accepts the principle and puts it into practice, that there is a clear connection between the amount of work and time that individuals devote to their duties as part of the Chairmen's Panel, and the remuneration that they receive. For the moment there are some members of the Panel who, for perfectly proper reasons, I am sure, are not able to devote the appropriate amount of time to the work, in which case it is not inappropriate that they should be more modestly rewarded. I want to demonstrate that the arrangement is designed to ensure a consistency between the amount of time that is devoted to the task and the appropriate reward.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: An observation, then a question: it is absurd to pay people such vastly different rates on the basis of length of service, when they are doing essentially the same job. Can my Friend remind the House how Members get on to the Chairmen's Panel, what the criteria for selection are, and if Members are ever rejected?

Mr. Hoon: On length of service, if the House accepts the proposition that the responsibility requires skill and ability, that skill and ability are acquired in the course of doing the job. It is not a task that is easy to learn about, other than by chairing the relevant Committees. There is therefore a proper connection between length of service, and skill and ability. I am assured by the Chairman of Ways and Means that he will be able to take account of length of service in the decision that he takes as to which member of the Panel is appropriate to serve on which Committee. In those circumstances, I believe that is the best way forward.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): I can happily make comments, as I have not been a member of the Chairmen's Panel for some time. Would my right hon. Friend emphasise that the job is exhausting and boring, and if it is properly done it requires a considerable amount of time? Chairmen do not get recognition of the extra hours that they put in. Perhaps he will make it clear to the House that if we want to continue to have an important and sensible tradition of using our own Members to chair our Committees, we ought to make sure that we treat them with respect, if nothing else.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her practical observations and her experience of dealing with these matters. She reflects exactly my admiration for those who choose to serve on the Chairmen's Panel, particularly those who put in a considerable amount of time which, as she says, is not properly recognised—it is generally not recognised at all outside the House. That is the underlying purpose of the proposal—to ensure that that recognition is given.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the payments to the Chairs of Select Committees also allow them to have better pension emoluments at the end? Will the new awards that he proposes be part of the pension scheme, so that Chairmen would inherit them for life, as it were?

Mr. Hoon: I am not sure about my hon. Friend's last proposition, but the emoluments are pensionable and will continue to be pensionable so long as they are in payment. I am not sure that I entirely take his last point, but his basic proposition is correct.

The motion provides for a tiered structure: those who have served for five years or more, irrespective of any breaks in service, will be eligible for an additional payment of £13,107, the same amount that applies to Select Committee pay. Those who have served for at least three years but less than five will qualify for an additional £9,960. Those who have served for at least one year but less than three will qualify for an additional £7,340, and those in their first years will qualify for £2,615. Those amounts will be uprated annually in line with Members' pay. The pay will be pensionable, and the necessary regulations will be introduced as soon as possible. The overall cost of the proposal, which is estimated to be some £400,000 a year including national insurance and pensions contributions, will depend on the experience of the Panel at any given time.

The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst has tabled an amendment that would provide an alternative grading structure. Amendment (b) provides for a two-tier structure, with half pay for those with less than two years' service. The appropriate system is a matter for the House to decide, but the amendment would obviously increase the overall cost.

The SSRB recommended that the question of Chairmen's interests and payment for outside activities should be considered before payment is introduced. I hope that the Standards and Privileges Committee is willing to consider that issue and to produce guidance, as it did for Select Committee Chairmen, and an implementation date of 1 November has therefore been proposed with that in mind.

Whether to introduce pay for Standing Committee Chairmen in the form proposed is a matter for the House to decide. Some hon. Members may feel that service on the Panel is honour enough or that it is wrong to reward some aspects of an hon. Member's work and not others. As I have said, however, I believe that it is right to recognise the considerable commitment made by Standing Committee Chairmen, which involves not only time in the Chair, but time for preparation and the requirement to keep available time that may not be required. Chairmanship offers little in terms of public profile—indeed, it requires hon. Members to stay quiet on Bills that they Chair. I hope that hon. Members agree that that contribution should be recognised—

Andrew Mackinlay: Will the Leader of the House tell us—

Mr. Hoon: Shall I give way?

Andrew Mackinlay: Yes; I am enormously grateful. As Ministers go, I am fond of the Leader of the House.

The Crossrail Bill will no doubt be chaired by a member of the Panel. The procedure might last for many months, when a Standing Committee would not be involved. Would the meter run during that time? The motion does not consider that matter. Approximately how many hon. Members will be left on standard MP's pay if the motions are passed tonight?

Mr. Hoon: I am always grateful for my hon. Friend's concern, and I am even more grateful for his questions. I sure that his final point will be tabled as a written question, when I shall answer it, but I cannot answer it off the top of my head

Motion 36 is an effective motion that gives effect to the previous motion to which the Queen's recommendation has been signified, because it involves Government expenditure, including the Treasury contribution to Members' pensions. It will be moved if the House agrees the opinion motion without amendment.

Motion 37 extends the current arrangements for Select Committee Chairmen's pay to those Select Committees that are not already eligible. In its 2003 report on Select Committee Chairmen's pay, the SSRB suggested which Committee Chairmen should be remunerated, but it said that the final decision should rest with the House. At the time, there was some unhappiness that the distinction between externally focused scrutiny Committees and other Committees did not fairly reflect the relative work loads.

In introducing the motion on Standing Committee Chairs, I thought it only right to give the House the opportunity to decide whether the remaining Select Committees should also receive remuneration. The remaining Committees include the Administration Committee—this is contingent on the motion appointing that Committee being agreed by the House—the Finance and Services Committee, the Liaison Committee, the Procedure Committee, the Committee of Selection and the Committee on Standards and Privileges. Those Committee Chairmen's responsibilities are varied, but they are comparable in work load to those that are already paid. In some ways, those Chairmen are even more deserving, because they do their work on behalf of us all out of the media spotlight. The cost of the proposal depends on take-up, but it would amount to around £17,000 a year per Chairman, including national insurance and pensions contributions.

Motion 38 is again an effective motion—it gives effect to the opinion motion on Select Committee pay—to which the Queen's recommendation has been signified.

Motion 39 amends Standing Order No. 4 so that members of the Panel would continue to serve on it until the end of the Parliament, unless they were discharged by the Speaker. At present, the Speaker has to reappoint the Panel each Session. The change is intended to remove an unnecessary complication in the arrangements for additional pay by making service continuous.

Finally, motion 40 amends Standing Order No. 137A to empower the Welsh Affairs Committee to hold formal joint meetings with Committees of the National Assembly for Wales. That would make permanent a change agreed by the House, on an experimental basis, in the previous Parliament. The Welsh Affairs Committee and Committees of the National Assembly for Wales held eight joint meetings under that temporary power for the scrutiny of Bills and draft Bills and other purposes, and the Liaison Committee has pointed out the strong case for making the power permanent.

Taken together, the motions amount to a useful package, which will strengthen parliamentary scrutiny of the Executive and enhance how we operate within this House. They provide a basis for hon. Members to take forward the work of scrutiny and for further modernisation in the Parliament ahead. I commend the motions to the House.

1.45 pm

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I want to establish cross-party consensus on most of those changes, although I shall make some specific comments. I want to address three key points—the formation of Select Committees, the creation of the new Administration Committee and pay for Standing Committee Chairmen.

Having indicated that there is a degree of consensus between Front-Bench Members on the detail of the motions, I shall begin with a clear challenge to the Government on the establishment of Select Committees. The matter has become a saga, which is not good enough, and the public cannot understand why it takes this House so long to establish Select Committees. I was first elected on 6 June 2001, which was one month later than the election in this Parliament, and the Select Committee's were up and running for their first meetings before the summer recess. This time, with an extra month, we are just about in a position to give those Committees the opportunity to meet for a first introductory sitting before the summer recess, but three Committees will not even be able to do that, which is not good enough.

The Leader of the House and the Government should set out a process by which that objective will be achieved more rapidly in future. For example, this House has lost the opportunity to hold a Liaison Committee meeting in July to address with the Prime Minister important issues that have arisen over the past few months, which is simply unacceptable. I hope that the Leader of the House will take away this summer's experiences and return with proposals to speed up the process and to make it more effective, so that the public do not say, "Where are the Select Committees?"

I understand the motivations of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), but he must consider his proposal's practicalities. Many new Select Committee members will be new hon. Members who are finding their way in the House for the first time. An election process for individual Select Committee members is impractical. I understand why he has advanced that option and his desire to speed up the process—indeed, I share his desire to introduce a speedier process. If one examines the motions, however, it is apparent that new hon. Members form the bedrock of Select Committees, and it is unrealistic to expect them to stand for election shortly after they have arrived in this place. Although I share his aspiration to introduce a new approach to Select Committees, his approach is not the right one.

Mr. Allen: If the hon. Gentleman reads the amendment, which is supported by 65 hon. Members from all parties in this House, he will see that it simply requests that we should re-examine the process to see whether it can be done better. He started his speech by making that point, so if he believes it—I am sure that he does—he should support the amendment's sentiment. I have asked the Leader of the House to re-examine the matter, so that we do not experience a delay in four years' time. That can be done by returning Committees from the Government to the House and by involving all hon. Members in the process. It is not beyond the wit of hon. Members to create a system by which new hon. Members, old hon. Members and hon. Members who deserve recognition are on the Committees of their choice. If we continue to allow the system to be run by Front Benchers, we will continue to be in thrall to them.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman will know from my remarks that I share his desire to examine the way in which things work. However, I disagree with some of the detailed points that he has made in advancing his argument in the past few days, as they are not practical. We all rightly share the aspiration of ensuring that in four or five years' time, when the new Parliament meets after the next general election, we do not have a prolonged process for forming the Committees that removes from the House central parts of its scrutiny role and leaves us with the current situation as regards the Liaison Committee whereby it is not possible for the Committee to meet before the summer. That is wrong.

Mr. Allen: I take the hon. Gentleman at face value, as I have worked with him in Committee and know where he stands on such issues. Will he therefore, in the position that he occupies on behalf of the Opposition, do what I am going to do and write formally to the Leader of the House requesting that he and the Modernisation Committee, and anyone else who wishes to be involved, look at this process? We need to create a broad consensus in the House so that perhaps we can do it better.

Chris Grayling: We do not need to write; we merely need to hear the Deputy Leader of the House say when he winds up that the Government accept that too much time has passed before appointing Select Committees and that the Government will consider how to ensure that that does not happen in future.

Mr. Leigh: I understand that there has been no lack of recruits early on in this Parliament. In the last Parliament, the Opposition had some difficulties as a result of our relatively few numbers. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is unfortunate that Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen should serve on Select Committees? On the Public Accounts Committee, we preserved a virginal purity in that matter by having no Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen. In life one should do to others as one might have done to oneself. There will come a time when there is a Conservative Government, and will we want Labour spokesmen on defence serving on the Defence Committee? I think not. This is an opportunity for my hon. Friend to make it clear that this is not a practice that we want to carry on in this Parliament.

Chris Grayling: My view is that we should provide full opportunities for every Member of this House to play a full part in its proceedings in different ways, whether it is on the Opposition or the Government Front Benches, on Select Committees or on Standing Committees. I would not wish to be proscriptive today, but I share my hon. Friend's wish to ensure that Back Benchers who want to serve on Select Committees have the opportunity to do so.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman did not give a straightforward answer to his hon. Friend, who is, as he well knows, making a very clear point—that there should be a principle in this House that Select Committees should consist only of Back-Bench Members because that is important to the working of those Committees. Cannot the hon. Gentleman stand up on behalf of his party and urge that important principle?

Chris Grayling: Will the hon. Gentleman urge his own Front Benchers to ensure that Select Committees are not used as ministerial sinecures when Ministers leave office, as has certainly been the case?

Chris Bryant indicated assent.

Chris Grayling: One of the reasons for the delay in appointing Select Committees is that there has been wrangling behind the scenes about who is and is not going to get which job. The Government have tried to ensure that they can use Select Committee chairmanships as a soft landing for Ministers who have lost office. They have also tried to ensure—I see the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) in her place—that Select Committee chairmanships are not occupied by people who are more robust in their criticism of the Government.

John Bercow: I am sorry to press my hon. Friend on this point, but let me remind him that two wrongs do not make a right. I must, with great respect, ask him to give, in response to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), a verdict on an issue of principle. Does he agree that it is wrong in principle for an Opposition Front Bencher to sit on a Select Committee—yes or no? It is nothing to do with other issues; what is his response to that particular point?

Chris Grayling: My view is that in an ideal world we would not have people performing both roles. Speaking as an Opposition Front Bencher, most of us do not have the time to perform multiple roles. However, there are circumstances that break every rule, and I am not going to give my hon. Friend a cast-iron view that under no circumstances should it ever happen. A range of roles are open to Members of this House. Very often, two should not combine, but there may be occasions when circumstance dictate that they do. I will not give my hon. Friend an absolute answer on that now.

John Bercow: If my hon. Friend believes that there are extenuating circumstances in which an exception should apply and an Opposition Front Bencher should be allowed, or even required, to serve on a Select Committee, will he be good enough to specify such a circumstance?

Chris Grayling: My hon. Friend intends to draw me into a detailed argument that is not entirely consistent with the motions before us. I would be delighted to discuss it with him some time over a drink in the Tea Room.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I suggest to my hon. Friend that there is an extenuating circumstance, although it is undesirable. Her Majesty's Opposition had so few Members in the last Parliament that in order to man all the Select Committees it was necessary for members of the Whips Office from time to time to act as Opposition members of those Committees. I can say from my experience as Chairman of the Procedure Committee that my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) was an extremely assiduous and hardworking member of that Committee. It is, however, an undesirable process, and I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to say that as long as we have sufficient Members that will not happen while he is shadow Leader of the House.

Chris Grayling: I share my hon. Friend's view that it is undesirable. However, there will also be times when it will be to the detriment of the work of a Select Committee to lose expertise as a result of somebody moving into a Front-Bench role. My hon. Friend will be aware that not every Select Committee deals with external policy issues; many deal with issues within this House. It would be wrong, for example, to deprive somebody who holds a junior Opposition role of the opportunity to sit on the Procedure Committee or the Modernisation Committee and play a role in the management and future direction of the House. Simply being a Front Bencher should not preclude one from having views on that.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I understand the difficulties that arise when there are few Opposition Members, but the House of Commons should make it clear that there is no role in the chairmanship of Select Committees for people who are Ministers and no role in the work of Select Committees for people who are spokesmen for their political parties. We get ourselves in the most frightful muddle and into very embarrassing situations when we let go of those rules without thinking about it. We have never done this in the past. It reflects no credit on any Member of this House, on whichever Front Bench they sit, if they do not maintain those lines of demarcation.

Chris Grayling: I understand the hon. Lady's point of view. She will remember, however, that when I served on her Select Committee, sitting alongside us was my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), who was an assiduous and effective performer on that Committee while holding a junior role on the Opposition Front Bench in an entirely unrelated area. In my view, our Committee would have been poorer without her. I am reluctant to give cast-iron views because there are exceptions whereby Select Committees will lose out if they are deprived of expertise simply because someone has moved into a junior role in a separate area.

Mr. Gordon Prentice rose—

Chris Bryant rose—

Chris Grayling: I will make some progress now.

One reason for the delay on Select Committees is that the Government have found that the two-term rule was not quite what they thought. There is no doubt that behind the scenes there have been debates about changes that the Government sought to make but were not possible under a strict interpretation of the rules. The motion on the eight-year limit is sensible, although it is disappointing that the deadline has been set at a particular date. It would be unfortunate to reach the point where a Select Committee chairmanship expires on 22 October, or whatever the date may be, potentially in mid-report while work is still pending. I would have preferred the term of office to expire at the end of the parliamentary Session beyond the date on which the eight years is reached. I suggest that we should review how that works, and if we discover that it causes operational difficulties for Committees, let us be willing to adapt the rule so that there is not a cast-iron cut-off date but a natural termination at the end of the Session of Parliament. From my experience of Committee work, had the hon. Lady been in that position midway through an important report, it would have been a loss to the Committee.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: I did not manage to intervene on the previous point, which was more important. However, machinery of Government changes are made all the time—at the beginning of a new Parliament, through departmental changes and so on. They inevitably feed through to the Select Committees. It appears to me that the eight year rule will not apply in practice to many Select Committees.

Chris Grayling: If we have the same number of departmental reorganisations as in the past few years, the hon. Gentleman will be right. It is not necessary to recast Departments every few months. After the general election, there was the bizarre situation of the Department of Trade and Industry appearing to be about to be reconstituted and then remaining as it was. Regular Committee changes have occurred because the Government have seen fit to tinker with the structure of Whitehall. If they did not do that, the circumstances would not arise.

Mr. Hoon: I hope that the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members will bear it in mind that we are considering a two Parliament rule. The eight year arrangement was added as a way of dealing with very short Parliaments, as happened in 1974. It may also help the hon. Gentleman if I emphasise that, for example, when someone becomes Chairman of a Select Committee in mid-term, that would not count in relation to the two Parliament rule. The rule would begin to apply at the start of a full Parliament. The Table Office would interpret the two Parliament rule as two full parliamentary terms. As that, not the eight year rule, is the primary rule, it would have greatest effect. The rule states clearly,

"whichever is the greater period."

Chris Grayling: I accept the Leader of the House's point. He is right that, in the case of a couple of hung Parliaments in quick succession, it would be absurd for a Select Committee Chairman to be thrown out after a few months because of the two Parliament rule. However, circumstances will arise, probably in this Parliament, in which Select Committee Chairmen leave office under the eight year rule during the Parliament. If that happens, it is more natural for the period of office to terminate at the end of a Parliament rather than on a set date in the middle of the calendar. The Leader of the House shakes his head.

Mr. Hoon: I tried to explain carefully. We are considering a two Parliament rule. Someone who is appointed to the chairmanship of a Select Committee at the beginning of this Parliament, irrespective of the date on which they are elected—that is the harm that the amendment tries to resolve—will serve for this Parliament and the next. That is clear and straightforward. The Chairmen will serve for two full Parliaments. If, by chance, one of the Parliaments lasts less than four years, the eight year rule would allow them to continue, thereby satisfying the requirement of serving for a full Parliament and observing the primary rule.

Chris Grayling: Someone who was appointed a Select Committee Chairman in the middle of the 1997–2001 Parliament could continue serving now, yet the eight year period will expire at some point in the next couple of years. Is the Leader of the House saying that people in that position could continue for the full term of this Parliament or that their term of office must terminate mid-Parliament? My understanding is that the term of office will terminate after eight years if it spreads across three Parliaments.

Mr. Hoon: Again, the primary purpose of the rule is to limit the duration of office to two Parliaments. I have made it clear that if someone becomes a Select Committee Chairman mid-Parliament, the remaining period of that Parliament would not count against the hon. Member in relation to the two Parliament rule. The amendment is essentially trying to avoid circumstances that have arisen whereby specific Select Committees have not met and appointed their Chairmen, for example, until after the summer recess. Chairmen in that position would chair the Committee for that Parliament and the succeeding Parliament. I am trying to get the rule back to the original intention: to apply to the lifetime of a Parliament. I want to remove the unnecessary focus on the eight year period.

Chris Grayling: Can my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) therefore serve as Chairman of the Procedure Committee for the entire Parliament?

Mr. Hoon: No. I shall try one last time. I suspect that the Procedure Committee did not meet until October 1997. Consequently, the election to the Chair of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) was delayed, whereas the various other Committees had been in a position to appoint their Chairmen before the summer recess. That would nevertheless count as a single Parliament, irrespective of the eight year rule, for which the hon. Gentleman was entitled to serve as Chairman. The second Parliament would be that from 2001 to 2005. The two term rule would therefore have been satisfied.

Chris Grayling: I am grateful for that clarification. It remains my view that when an eight year period comes to an end, the term of office should last until the end of the Parliament.

Mr. Leigh: It is important to get that clear. The Leader of the House has made it clear—he can intervene again if I get it wrong. Someone who was appointed as a Select Committee Chair in 2001 would have served for the previous Parliament of four years. If this Parliament lasted five years, that Chairman would be allowed to remain in office until the end of the Parliament.

Chris Grayling: I am grateful for that.

Andrew Mackinlay: Some of us who are on low pay are a bit bewildered. Perhaps the Front-Bench Members can explain it to us simple souls. My understanding is that if there were a casual vacancy soon—say next year—either sadly through bereavement or promotion, the Chair's successor would serve for this Parliament and be eligible to serve for two more Parliaments, thus serving for 13 or 14 years. Am I correct?

Mr. Hoon indicated assent.

Andrew Mackinlay: Good.

Chris Grayling: I think that that has clarified matters.

Let me move on to the Modernisation Committee's new remit. I disagree with the Government's approach to the Modernisation Committee. That Committee should serve from time to time when there is a need for it to do so. If it meets week after week, it will look for things to do and tread on the toes of other Committees. We have already heard in the exchanges between the Leader of the House and my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield about the remits of the Modernisation Committee and Procedure Committee running into each other. The Leader of the House spoke of broadening the Modernisation Committee's remit so that it could examine other issues, especially administration. However, we are in the process of setting up the Administration Committee. Surely that Committee, not the Modernisation Committee, should deal with administration matters. A Committee that meets week in, week out will look for work that may not necessarily exist.

I am in favour of Committees that consider changes that need to be made to the House's procedures and workings, but we do not need a Committee that simply looks for work to do every week. We have other Committees that can make the sort of small changes in procedure, standards and privileges and administration that are inevitably needed in this place. The danger of the Modernisation Committee being in the form that the Leader of the House suggests is that it will get in the way of the workings of other Committees unnecessarily.

I have some sympathy with amendment (a) to motion 34, which the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) tabled, especially given that the Father of the House has rightly been added to the Liaison Committee. The Liaison Committee has gained a high profile because of its work interviewing the Prime Minister twice a year. It has other co-ordinating roles. The Chairmen's Panel has a different purpose from that of Select Committees, but I believe that the House's workings would be strengthened by a bridge between them. The presence on the Liaison Committee of a senior figure from the Chairmen's Panel would be beneficial. Hon. Members should consider the amendment carefully and sympathetically.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: The Leader of the House suggested that the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) was on the Liaison Committee because he was the Father of the House, but I am not sure that that is the case. He is on it because of his merits and because of the role that he can play. May I remind the Leader of the House that the predecessor of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West was neither the Father of the House nor the Chairman of any Committee? He was appointed by the House because of his experience. While I am delighted that the right hon. Gentleman is on the Liaison Committee—I hope that he will soon become its Chairman again—he is not there because he is the Father of the House; he is there because the House wished him to serve on the Committee because of his experience and knowledge of the House. I very much support the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) that a member of the Chairmen's Panel should serve on the Liaison Committee because of the experience and knowledge that they can bring to the work of that Committee.

Chris Grayling: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. His contribution speaks for itself. There would be significant benefits to that proposal and I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will address that point later and give careful consideration to the amendment.

There are mixed views in the House about the establishment of a new Administration Committee, but I believe that it is a logical and sensible step. There are a number of areas in which the work of the previous five Committees clearly integrate, including catering, accommodation, the provision of catering services in meeting rooms, broadcasting and information. If we are seeking to communicate what goes on in this place more effectively, and to learn some of the lessons highlighted by bodies such as the Puttnam commission on the ways in which we can improve people's knowledge and understanding of the workings of the House, it is important to remove the artificial divisions between broadcasting and information, and between some of the other functions of the previous five Committees. Those functions should logically come together. We need to take an integrated approach to running the House and the new Committee will play a valuable role in achieving that.

The proposal that the Chairmen of Standing Committees should be paid has come from the Senior Salaries Review Body. The structure of the proposal on the table today has been discussed by the SSRB, although it is not its original proposal, as the Leader of the House pointed out. It is, however, a proposal that the body has studied and to which it makes reference in its report. Having had conversations with the Leader of the House and with the Chairman of Ways and Means, I understand the reservations about the SSRB recommendation. I was initially taken with the concept of an A list of senior Chairmen and a B list of those in more junior positions. I understand the questions about the viability of such a proposal, but it remains my view that a fragmented, time-based system such as that set out in the motion would not be the right way forward.

Let us take the example of a distinguished, experienced Select Committee Chairman who stands down from that chairmanship at the end of the period specified in the rule that the Leader of the House has described. The former Chairman might return to the Back Benches without a role in the House, and then be invited by the Speaker to join the Chairmen's Panel. That would be precisely the kind of person whom we would want to provide a senior, experienced and respected lead in Committees, the kind of Member who people could look up to and accept in a Chairman's role. Is it really right that such a person should join the Chairmen's Panel on a year's probation, as a junior member? Should not they be brought in with the same status and stature, both in terms of the view of the House and of remuneration, that they would have enjoyed if they had carried on as a Select Committee Chairman?

It is illogical to try to attract to the Chairmen's Panel some of our senior people, perhaps a decent interval after they have left Government and returned to the

[Chris Grayling]

Back Benches, or after they have given up a Select Committee chairmanship, if we are going to bring them in at the bottom of what is intentionally designed to be a career ladder. That is my big concern about the Government's proposals.

We also wonder whether it is right to introduce a system of increments for the first time. Such systems are common elsewhere, but we would, for the first time, be introducing the principle of more pay for longer service.

Mr. Forth: There is another way of looking at that, which would involve calling it a probationary period. I asked the Leader of the House whether he could give me any examples of this being done before, but he was unable to do so. Ministers get full pay as soon as they are appointed, as do Select Committee Chairmen and even Deputy Speakers of the House. Does it not therefore seem anomalous to my hon. Friend that the Chairmen's Panel should be picked out uniquely for this rather odd gradation of probationary treatment?

Chris Grayling: Serving on the Chairmen's Panel is hard work, and sitting in the Chair of a long Standing Committee is a challenging task. Those who do the job have an extremely important role to play. They should be—and, indeed, are—some of the most respected senior colleagues in the House. We should treat them as such.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: May I invite the hon. Gentleman to answer a question that I put to the Leader of the House earlier, to which the Leader of the House did not respond? How do Members get on to the Chairmen's Panel? What are the criteria for selection? Are Members ever turned down or rejected?

Chris Grayling: I hate to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but I cannot answer the Leader of the House's questions for him. I suggest that he puts his question to the Deputy Leader of the House at the end of the debate.

Andrew Mackinlay: I wish the hon. Gentleman a long time in the House. Will he give a personal undertaking that if and when there is a proposal that Members on the Opposition Front Bench should be paid an additional stipend, he will oppose it?

Chris Grayling: I am not aware of any such proposal—

Andrew Mackinlay: Yet.

Chris Grayling: So I am not going to be drawn into speculating—

Andrew Mackinlay: Yet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) is an experienced Member of the House. He knows that he must not conduct a debate from a sedentary position.

Chris Grayling: I think that we should cross that bridge when the Government make such a proposal. I shall not be diverted away from the motion before the House today.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) makes an important point. The Leader of the House does not get a pay rise when he has been in his job for a year, and neither do the Speaker, the Deputy Speakers, Select Committee Chairmen or MPs. So this proposal represents a new dimension in regard to pay in the House, and I am not entirely comfortable with it.

A paid environment requires a formal commitment of time by members of the Chairmen's Panel. The SSRB is quite clear about that. Indeed, certain elements that are missing from the Government's proposals include two specific recommendations by the SSRB, which have perhaps been addressed implicitly, although not explicitly. Its recommendation No. 6 states:

"However in this case it will in our view be important for the House to be clear, before payment is introduced, what administrative or other measures ... are to be put in place to ensure that the different levels of reward are correlated as far as possible with the different contributions of Panel members."

Recommendation No. 8 states that

"before payment of Standing Committee Chairmen is introduced, the House should give consideration to the question of Chairmen's outside interests, and payment for activities outside the House."

The Leader of the House has not addressed those recommendations today and I would be grateful if the Deputy Leader of the House could clarify in detail what is happening in that regard.

Mrs. Dunwoody: When I entered the House, there was a long and honourable tradition among some well-known Chairmen of sleeping happily through the most complex of Standing Committees, particularly on the Finance Bill. So far as I know, they were never removed from the Chairmen's Panel. Once we get involved with these proposed gradations, we shall get into the most terrible mess. That is why I opposed the proposals for paying Select Committee Chairmen. Would it not be sensible just to say, "Pay the gentlemen"?

Chris Grayling: I well understand the fatigue of those Chairmen that the hon. Lady describes. Having sat through Standing Committees myself, I have enormous admiration for the Chairmen who manage to stay alert and involved in certain debates, important though they are. The hon. Lady is right; we should simply pay them. My anxiety about the motion is that it over-complicates what should be a straightforward situation.

In relation to motions 37 and 38, I absolutely agree with the Leader of the House. The Committees concerned are important and should not be separated from the work done by others in terms of the way that they are seen by the House, the way that they are treated or the way that their Chairmen are remunerated. He has our support on those motions.

Today's set of proposals will undoubtedly prompt comment from the Back Benches. Broadly speaking, they are package with which I and my colleagues are comfortable. Above all, however, such motions are not for the Front Bench but for the House. I wait with interest to hear the contributions of Members on both sides of the House to the debate. The House will make up its mind in due course.

2.20 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Before I start my comments on the motions, may I welcome the Leader of the House's announcement about the book of condolences, which will be much appreciated by Members in all parts of the House? I am grateful to him.

We are dealing with a rather belated process of appointing Select Committees, which has been eagerly anticipated by Members in all parts of the House and by many people outside. I detect a huge degree of enthusiasm from Members who are about to be appointed to Select Committees, some of them for the first time. I read in The Times about one of our new colleagues—I do not think that he is in the Chamber at the moment, and I will certainly not identify him—who was so enthusiastic that he sent out a press release saying that he was delighted to have been appointed to the "powerful" and "much sought-after" Education and Skills Committee. He has pre-empted the view of the House a little, but many Members will share his enthusiasm about participating in the work of "powerful" and "much sought-after" Select Committees.

Dr. Gibson: In relation to the time delay in getting these Committees going, does the hon. Gentleman agree that patronage and blackmail take some time to enact?

Mr. Heath: I have the greatest esteem for the hon. Gentleman, who was my Chairman when I served on the Science and Technology Committee, and who I presume is alluding to what the Leader of the House referred to as the principles of the Labour party. I am certainly not in a position to comment on the principles of the Labour party, other than to say that they appear to take a particularly long time, especially in the case of the Science and Technology Committee, of which he was a distinguished Chairman who took the Committee to a new level of respect for its work.

As the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) suggested, we need to consider again the process of selection. There are innate difficulties in relation to a simple election process, and he would be the first to recognise that. Clearly, if we are to ensure that all parts of the House are represented properly on Select Committees, and that there is not a majoritarian view as to who is the appropriate person to sit on a Committee, safeguards must be built into the process. I accept, however, that a simple process by which it appears that it is those on the Front Bench, or worse, solely the Whips, who determine who sits on Committees, for their own advantage in terms of patronage or discipline, is not the way for the House to choose who sits on Select Committees. I hope that we can arrive at a better system.

Mr. Forth: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, first, Select Committees should have equal numbers of Government and non-Government Members, and secondly, that after a proper allocation of chairmanships by party according to the numbers in the House, each Committee could then elects its own Chairman, given the party distribution and given an equal representation of non-Government Members on Committees? Would that not be a step forward?

Mr. Heath: I hear what the right hon. Gentleman says. Certainly, I was one of those who urged, when we were considering the difficulties with regard to the Standards and Privileges Committee, that for self-evident reasons it was not in the interests of that Committee to have a Government majority. Equally, I feel that there needs to be a regard for the composition of the House. Given the strong position of Chairmen of Select Committees in carrying forward the business of the Committee and given the status that they hold, the composition of the House must be a factor in that regard, too. The difficulty, which we need to address, is how to balance those two objectives, which are equally valid but not easy to reconcile. That is why I support the view that we need to consider this matter again.

It would also be greatly to the House's advantage, and would avoid what has happened this year, were we to have a clear timetable, set out before a general election, for the completion of the process. It has taken far too long this time, and the fact that the Welsh Affairs Committee and the Science and Technology Committee will not be in a position to meet before the recess means that the lack of scrutiny will extend from March until October. It does not take a mathematical genius to work out that that is too long for the Government's work, which continues during that period, not to be scrutinised, whether or not there are departmental Select Committees.

John Bercow: Even were one to have regard to party balance in the allocation of Select Committee chairmanships, does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is absolutely no requirement whatever for there to be effectively a mandated requirement for members of the Committee, on pain of defiance of the Whips Office, to vote for a particular candidate as Chairman?

Mr. Heath: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that observation, and I agree with him entirely. At present, the difficulty is that a decision is taken as to who should be Chairman of a Committee without taking into account the views of that Committee. As I said, I think that there is a need for party allocation, and speaking as a former council leader for too many years, I am afraid that I recognise the practicalities of organising these matters to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. Ultimately, however, it seems entirely appropriate that members of a Committee, being aware of the political party to which a chairmanship has been allocated, should nevertheless have a free vote on whom they choose in that capacity. That might circumvent some of the unpleasant manifestations of power struggles within the Government party, which seem to have delayed proceedings on this occasion.

Mr. Allen: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that however a Select Committee is composed—I have some sympathy with the proposal of loosening the composition—the most important thing is how it conducts its business? A Select Committee that had a particular majority or a particular view, and that was unable to talk to the Government, would be marginalised and rendered useless by the Government's response to it. Is not the principle that we need to get over to the Government that they should not be afraid of Select Committees or Parliament and that we can make a contribution to better governance in this country, rather than trying to control, contain and select the membership of Committees that should be exclusively the gift of the House?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. Of course a Committee should have complete freedom in terms of its conduct and the way that it organises its business. It is also necessary for the Government to be prepared on all occasions to respond appropriately to the Select Committee. Having sat on the Science and Technology Committee in the previous Parliament when we wished to consider the scientific aspects of terrorism, to be told by the Home Secretary that he would neither provide evidence to the Committee on that matter nor allow any official within his purview to give evidence to it, because in his opinion that was a matter for the Home Affairs Committee, not the Science and Technology Committee, is outrageous. It was an abuse of power by the then Home Secretary. On that occasion, Parliament, through the Select Committee, should have been in a position to express a more robust view in response to the Department.

Mr. Allen rose—

Mr. Heath: I give way, for the last time, to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North.

Mr. Allen: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. He is leading toward the logical conclusion that unless Parliament's own Standing Orders provide for how soon after a general election Select Committees should be created; unless we take control of issues such as the response that the Government are expected to give to departmental Select Committees; unless we, rather than the Government and Opposition Front Benchers, control this process—the hon. Gentleman's own Front Benchers have not exactly covered themselves with glory in this regard in the past few weeks—the Government will always be able to refuse to reply to a report, or to refuse to create Committees that scrutinise the Government themselves. The anachronism is that the Government are the driving force behind setting up Committees that scrutinise the Government themselves, rather than it being clearly established in our Standing Orders that Parliament is the driving force—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I point out to the House that this subject has been aired very considerably and, in the case of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), repetitively. It is not an item on the Order Paper for decision today, and we have heard enough about it.

Mr. Allen With great respect—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Allen: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Some 65 Members of this House, plus many others, put their name to an amendment that would have enabled us to debate this matter properly, but unfortunately it was not selected for debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Precisely. I call Mr. David Heath.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not intend to prolong the dialogue with the hon. Member for Nottingham, North, other than to say that I do not entirely understand his reference a moment ago to my Front Benchers, about which he might like to speak to me afterwards. So far as I am concerned, on this issue I am the Front Bencher, and I certainly have not entered into any discussions of the sort that he suggested.

The proposition regarding the Administration Committee seems entirely sensible. I hold no brief for the old Catering Committee's independence of spirit, so this is a sensible step forward. My only question concerns the Administration Committee's ability to establish sub-committees. I hope that, having established a single Administration Committee, we are not then going to re-create the old House Committees as sub-committees, in their own right, of that Administration Committee. Doing so would involve simply spawning an extra Committee, with no benefit to the business of the House, so I hope that that is not the intention.

On motion 6 and term limits, through a process of interrogation the House has come to understand precisely what the Leader of the House's proposition means. It seems a little perverse, as the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) said, for an early resignation from the Chair of a Committee to result in someone's being able to serve anything up to just short of 15 years in the Chair, given that others are limited to eight years. That does not seem entirely logical, but of course, there will always be exceptions to any rule. I should also point out that we are already getting desperately near to mid-term, and one wonders whether those who are finally elected as Committee Chairmen after the long recess will be deemed to be serving for a full Parliament, or for a part-Parliament that can be disregarded for accountancy purposes.

There is another illogicality in respect of motion 6. As the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) has pointed out, changes in the machinery of government apparently create a new entity for the purpose of the relevant Standing Order. As the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) said, we very nearly had a new "Department of Productivity, Energy and Industry". Who knows whether the same Select Committee that serves the Department of Trade and Industry would have served that Department? It was to have a different name, so presumably there was some difference in emphasis. It would have been absurd to have turned back the milometer, simply because of a minor change in nomenclature. Given most Members' parliamentary careers, it would surely make more sense to say that eight years, or two Parliaments, spent chairing Select Committees was the determining factor, rather than the time spent chairing a particular Select Committee. It is relatively rare for someone who has chaired a particular Select Committee for two Parliaments to seek election as Chair of another Select Committee.

On motion 7 and the size of Select Committees, I have no quarrel with the broad principle of the proposal. However, the change in the size of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee and the removal of its capacity to have two sub-committees means that we are finally airbrushing agriculture out of parliamentary history. Agriculture has already disappeared, practically, from Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions. It has been overtaken by questions—very important ones, I am sure—about the environment, and it is almost impossible for those of us who serve rural constituencies, in which agriculture remains a significant industry, to raise relevant issues. As a result of this change, there will be no parliamentary entity devoted to agricultural policy. This is a very long way from just a few years ago, when we seemed to talk about nothing else. As a Member representing Somerset, I consider that a retrograde step. How we produce our food, who produces it and what happens in rural Britain are still important issues, and because of this change, we will lose the opportunity to debate them.

In setting up this array of Select Committees today—assuming that the House agrees to the motions before it—I remind the Leader of the House of two issues that are not dealt with on the Order Paper, the first of which is the setting up, hopefully, of a Joint Committee on House of Lords reform. It is eagerly anticipated in some quarters that we make progress on what is a half-finished job. Such a Committee is the starting point, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will give the matter his close attention.

Secondly, I want to renew the suggestion that I made to the Leader of the House at last week's business questions. Following the successful bid for the 2012 Olympics—I have spoken to other Members about this issue since, and I know that a number of them agree with my view—there is substantial merit in setting up a special Select Committee to deal with the Olympic preparations. The Australian Parliament did so in preparation for the Sydney Olympics—[Interruption.] The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) says from a sedentary position that it involves lots of travel. I should make it absolutely clear that I hope that such a Committee will not be created for the purpose of arranging visits to cities that have staged the Olympics, nor in anticipation of the provision of tickets for Olympic events. Rather, it should scrutinise the very large expenditure of public money, cross-departmental in nature, and examine how the benefits associated with the successful Olympic bid will spread beyond London to other parts of the country which we are constantly reassured will benefit, even though we have yet to be entirely convinced. Such a Committee should also provide continuity across the two or three Parliaments during which there may, or may not, be changes of Administration. There will certainly be changes in ministerial responsibility, so we should seek continuity in respect of the House.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman explain how such a Committee would interact with the all-party Olympics group, which already exists in the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is perfectly in order for the hon. Gentleman to refer to a Committee that might have been set up in relation to a motion that deals with setting up particular Select Committees, but we do not want to go down that particular avenue.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I shall move on to motion 34, which deals with the Liaison Committee. That Committee has, to some extent, grown like topsy in both size and responsibilities. It has moved a long way from what it did previously—largely sorting out matters at issue between departmental Select Committees and making common representations on behalf of Select Committees. It now has a regular opportunity to scrutinise the work of the Prime Minister and to ask questions. For that reason, it has become an extremely popular Committee.

It worries me slightly that that has happened, as the Liaison Committee is not necessarily the best vehicle for scrutinising the work of what is effectively, as we move towards a more presidential system, the Prime Minister's Department. I leave it to the House to determine whether that development should be welcomed. Nevertheless, we need a more formal and better way of scrutinising the Prime Minister and holding him to account beyond the opportunities that arise from Prime Minister's questions. As I said, I am not convinced that the Liaison Committee is the best body for doing so, but it is the best that we have at present.

I shall listen carefully to the arguments for adding Members of the Chairman's Panel to the Liaison Committee, but I have to say that I will need some persuasion that that is appropriate. It is not that I oppose further expansion of the Liaison Committee or that I want to deprive the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), if he were the person suggested, of taking on that role for the Committee. The difficulty lies with whether the Chairman's Panel—we should remember that it comprises the Chairmen of Standing Committees of the House—should take on a political role in the sense of questioning the Prime Minister and taking up political matters with the Executive.

We must expect impartiality from Members in their role as Chairmen. Of course they have a separate political role as Members of Parliament when they sit in the Chamber and act in their capacity as Back Benchers, but that is different from how they should act as Chairmen selected by the Chairman of Ways of Means to perform a particular function. In that context, they require a degree of impartiality that should be exercised habitually, but might be prejudiced by membership of the Liaison Committee. We need only think of Mr. Speaker or Mr. Deputy Speaker being asked to sit on that Committee and put questions to the Prime Minister to realise that the development should not necessarily be welcomed. Given that Chairmen are, in effect, vicariously representing Mr. Speaker or Mr. Deputy Speaker in their roles, I am not sure that it is appropriate for a person in that capacity to be put in that position—and I am not even sure that the scrutiny role should be given to the Liaison Committee in any case. There are better ways of providing proper scrutiny.

Finally, I want to deal with the payment of Standing Committee Chairmen. I have been agnostic, at best, on the question of the payment of Chairmen of either Select or Standing Committees. I personally remain to be convinced, though many of my colleagues feel otherwise. I understand the need for a process of career development within the House for those who are neither invited to, nor likely to, take on a governmental role. That applies to members of the Opposition parties as much as to the Government party. If the House takes the view that Select Committee Chairmen should be paid, I understand the argument that there should be payment for the Chairmen of Standing Committees.

I would like to say how much I value the role of hon. Members who are prepared to take on the chairmanship of Standing Committees of the House. In my role as shadow spokesman on Home Office and Department for Constitutional Affairs matters, I have sat on an inordinate number of delegated legislation Committees over the last few years. I have also represented my party from the Front Bench on many substantial Bills, which have required many hours of Standing Committee time, and I have nothing but admiration for those who sit in the Chair—without the capacity to express their own opinions—keep order and uphold the machinery of parliamentary work.

I looked carefully at the Senior Salaries Review Board report, but I do not believe that it has got it right. There is a question mark about the two-tier system, which I am not convinced is workable. Having a one-tier system, despite the superficial attraction, does not take into account the difficulties of choosing new Members to sit on the Chairman's Panel and giving them an opportunity to dip their toes in the water to see whether they are suited to that role in respect of their personal aspirations or their performance.

There is merit in the proposal, which I understand originated from you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as Chairman of Ways and Means, for a gradated system. I can see the advantage of allowing people in the initial stages to leave the Chairman's Panel in order to take on a Front-Bench role within the party. We can fairly establish that once a Member has been on the Chairman's Panel for a few years, it is unlikely that they would be invited to take on such a role, but there is merit in allowing a certain amount of flow in the initial changes. With the best will in the world, paying a substantial amount of extra money from day one may make it much more difficult to allow that flexibility.

I am attracted to the proposal put forward by the Leader of the House. It is a matter for a free vote and I have no idea how colleagues feel on what is essentially a House matter. I shall listen to the arguments, but I am not attracted to a two-tier system because I do not like the idea of having one category of "super Chairmen" and another category of less able Chairmen. That is not the right way to do our business.

The hon. Member for Thurrock alluded to an important matter: we shall quickly reach the stage at which the only people who do not have some sort of supplement to their pay are troublesome Back Benchers on the Government side and Opposition Front Benchers, who will have to undertake their arduous duties with no consideration of extra emoluments. I say that without any expectation of sympathy, but it seems slightly anomalous that the people who most regularly intervene and question the Executive from both sides of the House are the least well paid for the privilege of doing so. Perhaps we should take pride in that position and accept that our reward lies in heaven.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) (Lab): I had not intended to make a speech today, just to make the odd intervention, but I want to follow on from what the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) has just said about the evolution of the Liaison Committee.

When I first joined it, the Liaison Committee was essentially a management committee for the Select Committees, dealing with budgetary and other in-house matters. We managed to evolve a new system for dealing with the administrative side, and that gave the Committee Chairman time to deal with issues relating to Parliament more generally. The Liaison Committee's evolution over the past four years has affected its collective thinking about the workings of the House, as well as allowing it to deal directly with the Prime Minister.

As far as the Prime Minister's visits are concerned, I do not pretend that they are the perfect way to conduct interviews with him. However, what we have is vastly better than anything that we ever had before, because no other Prime Minister has ever submitted himself to regular scrutiny by a Select Committee. We have had to adapt to ensure that we get best value from the meetings.

Fortuitously, the involvement of so many Committee Chairmen in the Liaison Committee means that, collectively, we are able to bring informed opinion to bear on all aspects of Government policy. For the time being, the Committee is the best vehicle that we have for that, but I have no objection to trying to find more effective ways to carry out our work. Even so, I expect that we will carry on as we are in the near term.

We are trying to arrange a meeting of the Liaison Committee for Thursday morning, so that it can be established formally. We hope to get a meeting with the Prime Minister as early as possible in the autumn, and informal contacts to that end are already in hand. After the autumn, we will revert to the normal timetable of holding meetings in January-February and June-July. That will mean that we will not have lost a hearing with the Prime Minister, and that we will have held our full quota of meetings over the life of this Parliament.

I want to touch on a couple of points in passing. First, I agree with those colleagues who think that a single-tier system of payment is to be preferred. Any other system would be too complicated and would lead to inequity.

Another question has to do with the size of Select Committees. The Liaison Committee was unanimous in its opinion the last time that question arose. Indeed, the then Leader of the House has admitted that he was astonished by the strength of feeling that he encountered when the Liaison Committee insisted that a membership of 11 seemed to be the optimum. The Committee made it clear that it believed that a larger membership caused repetitiveness and lacked cohesion. If the House agrees to the proposition before it today, the Liaison Committee will probably conduct a review of its members as to whether larger Committees work, and report to the House accordingly.

Finally, the Osmotherly rules have been referred to. We live in a time of political disenchantment and disconnection, when people have rumbled that they are not very involved in the democratic process. People who live to be 80 have perhaps 18 opportunities to vote in general elections, but that is their total democratic input. As I have said before—and I apologise for repeating it—democracy exists meaningfully only if the Government are held to account every day in the House of Commons.

We are talking today about establishing Select Committees, but that means setting up the process and machinery of interrogation. We must remember that that is the prime objective of the Select Committees. It is a matter not of sharing the spoils between us, but of getting our Committees to work as effectively as possible.

I am worried that the role of scrutiny will slip from Parliament unless the Select Committees are able to assert themselves positively. In the previous Parliament, a gulf emerged between the Hutton and Butler inquiries and the Select Committees. The quality and quantity of information and witnesses available to Hutton and Butler were much greater than any to which the Select Committees had ever had access.

A challenge now faces the House, and the Government. What part do the Government want to play, and where do they want to go with Select Committees? Unless there is greater co-operation with the Committees in the provision of information, the demands for inquiries to be conducted outside the House will grow louder, and that will happen because such inquiries cannot be conducted efficiently inside it. That is why the Liaison Committee told the previous Leader of the House that we needed greater access to witnesses and better provision of information.

An undertaking was given that, in future, there would be a presumption that information and witnesses would be provided when the Committees asked for them. It is now up to the Government to fulfil that undertaking. If they do not do so, they will suffer too: the Select Committees will lose credibility as the centre for Government accountability, and the Government will find that ad hoc, non-representative committees are increasingly doing Parliament's job.

Although hon. Members have been laughing and joking in the debate, the truth is that we have a very short time in which to ensure that our system of accountability works effectively. If we do not achieve that, the role of holding the Government to account will slip away from Parliament.

2.57 pm

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am extremely honoured to follow the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and I hope that the House will heed his very wise words. If our parliamentary democracy is to remain respected and trusted by the electorate, the House as a whole must be able to scrutinise a Government's performance, legislation and management of the country as fully and effectively as possible.

In my experience, the Select Committee system is the only way to achieve that. Therefore, the usual channels—that is, the Government and Opposition Front Benches—should not have a major patronage function when it comes to appointing members of Select Committees. I think that the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) is trying to achieve that, although I am not sure that I go along with the procedure that he proposes. In the previous Parliament, the Modernisation Committee put forward proposals that could have achieved what many Back-Bench Members want but, sadly, those proposals were rejected by the House by a narrow majority.

Shortly, the Leader of the House will be elected Chairman of the Modernisation Committee. I hope that he and the shadow Leader of the House will review the appointments of hon. Members to Select Committees so that those Committees can fulfil their functions on behalf of the House.

My contribution to the debate will be brief, but I wish to reiterate a point that several hon. Members have already made, which is that the Government of the day have a duty to appoint Committees as quickly as possible after a general election, so that the House can properly monitor and scrutinise legislation and the performance of the Government.

I remain somewhat confused by the explanation that the Leader of the House provided to other hon. Members on the question of term limits for Chairmen of Select Committees. It appears that there is an eight-year rule, but that that period could be extended to 12 or 13 years. I am sure that that cannot be right or fair in any situation. The period should be two Parliaments or eight years. If someone is appointed in the middle of a Parliament, the three years of that Parliament should not be entirely ignored so that they can go on to serve as Chairman of a Select Committee for a further two Parliaments.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: The important point is that if the remit of a Select Committee is changed in any way, it becomes for all intents and purposes a new Select Committee.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am not sure that that is a helpful intervention in terms of the confusion that I am expressing. The Leader of the House gave contradictory answers to the questions that were put to him. I hope that the shadow Leader of the House will clarify the matter in his inimitable way, because it is very important. I am likely to be affected by motion 6 in due course, which I suspect will be passed later tonight, and I have some concern about the rule and the inflexible systems that it would impose. Perhaps because of the time that I have spent in the House, I believe that experience is important, especially in matters relating to how the House operates and its procedures, including modernisation proposals. Great experience of the House is very helpful in such debates and in deciding what proposals should be put to the House.

Whether it is appropriate or not, I wish to pay tribute to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the role that you have played in the issue of pay for Standing Committee Chairmen. The role of Standing Committee Chairmen is critical. Those Members who undertake it often work long hours, as the Leader of the House said, unappreciated and without publicity, depriving themselves of other activities in the House, including perhaps speaking in the Chamber and receiving media exposure as a result.

The House cannot do without the Standing Committee Chairmen. I do not subscribe to the view that many of the Committees that I have had the privilege of chairing have been dull, because I happen to be hands-on and I enjoy the job. I have done it for nearly 20 years and I am happy to continue to do it as long as Mr. Speaker and his Deputies ask me to continue to serve on the Chairmen's Panel. It is rewarding work. I am delighted that the Senior Salaries Review Body has been involved and that the Leader of the House and others have brought pressure to bear so that the House will decide whether Standing Committee Chairmen should be paid, at the highest rate, at a rate equal to Select Committee Chairmen.

I shall not enter the debate about graduated or non-graduated pay structure. I say only that those who have put forward proposals have done so in the knowledge of what is involved. I respect the Chairman of Ways and Means for the views that he has expressed, because he has an intimate knowledge of the experience that is needed and the time that is taken up to do the job that the House expects of the Chairmen of Standing Committees.

I pay tribute to the work of the Liaison Committee, because of the amendment that indirectly involves me. I would point out to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) that it is possible for Members on either side of the House to bring a non-party political influence to bear on debate and discussion, especially when it relates to the way in which the House of Commons operates, deals with legislation and its procedures to ensure proper scrutiny. Towards the end of the last Parliament, for example, the Procedure Committee, which I chaired, produced a well-balanced report on programming, which recommended changes to programming to make it more acceptable to all parties in the House. That shows that Members who could sit on the Liaison Committee could bring a non-party political experience and knowledge to bear on some of the important matters that the right hon. Member for Swansea, West mentioned in what I consider to be a keynote address in this debate.

Mr. Heath: I do not doubt any of the points that the hon. Gentleman has made. Indeed, it is essential, especially in matters of procedure, that Members take a quasi-judicial view of matters. What I cannot understand is how that fits with the work of the Liaison Committee. The point that I wanted to make was that the Liaison Committee has two roles—an organisation role, in which the Chairmen's Panel is not involved, and an interrogatory role with regard to the Prime Minister, in which the Chairmen's Panel should not be involved.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I accept that, and a member of the Liaison Committee has no need to take part in the questioning of the Prime Minister if he or she thinks that it is inappropriate to do so. However, I also remind the hon. Gentleman that in the last Parliament, the Liaison Committee produced two excellent reports—as I am sure the right hon. Member for Swansea, West remembers, because he chaired the Committee—on how Parliament could better scrutinise legislation and hold the Government to account. The reports also addressed the role of Select Committees. That had nothing to do with party politics, and it is important that the Liaison Committee—one of the most powerful Committees, if not the most powerful, in the House of Commons, because it is composed of the Chairmen of all the other Committees—should have a non-party political input into matters relating to the way in which the House undertakes its work. The reports published by the Liaison Committee were very important, but they were not heeded sufficiently by the Government. I hope that in the future such reports will receive better attention and a more sympathetic hearing from the Government of the day.

I hope that the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook), my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and other distinguished Members on both sides of the House will receive a little more sympathy from the Deputy Leader of the House than, sadly, it received from the Leader of the House. It offers a constructive way of bringing an element of continuity in the Liaison Committee from one Parliament to another. As the hon. Gentleman will, I am sure, work out, there will be many new members of the Liaison Committee, so an element of continuity will do no harm. I do not make that point out of any particular preference for myself, but in future the senior Member on the Chairman's Panel could add usefully to the work, knowledge and experience of the Liaison Committee.

In the main, I warmly support the motions that the Government have tabled today. It is important that the Select Committees be set up, and I was extremely encouraged that the right hon. Member for Swansea, West indicated that the Liaison Committee would meet before we break for the summer recess. That is a fantastic gesture and I hope that it will be taken up and that it will prove possible to hold that meeting.

3.11 pm

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Before I aggravate anybody, I commend motion 15 to the House. I have a selfish interest as I want to be a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee. I extend thanks in good measure to the Government Chief Whip and, I suspect, to the elected Members of the parliamentary Labour party who worked hard to draw up the list of Labour nominees. Sometimes, I think that the holy spirit may have intervened, as I understand that it was a close-run thing as far as I was concerned, so I am grateful to be on the list. However, the process gives rise to questions about the way that Select Committees are set up, as other Members have pointed out.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) is not in the Chamber, unfortunately. I disagree with his proposal, although I share his objective in taking decisions on all these issues away from Front-Bench Members. We should be looking ahead four years, and the negotiations on the apportionment of Chairmen between the political parties and the size of Committees should be determined by the chairman of the parliamentary Labour party, the chairman of the 1922 executive and/or an appropriate officer and appropriate representatives of the other political parties. There are two reasons for that. First, it would remove, or reduce, the feeling that there is patronage, especially when the payment of Chairmen is involved. Secondly, it would help in the expedition of business. With the best will in the world, after a general election Government and Opposition Whips are preoccupied with other things.

After a general election, all Members could indicate to their parties which Committees they are interested in from day one, and the necessary processing would be expedited if it was dealt with by the party secretariat and Back-Bench representatives of the political parties rather than the Whips, which only delays things and creates jealousy and suspicion about patronage.

I confess to emotional swings as I listened to the debate, especially the speeches of the two Front-Bench speakers. At one point, I thought that I had my whole career before me, but then I swung the other way and thought that my wilderness years were going on for rather a long time. There would be so many people who would have the opportunity of receiving enhanced payments and so many distinguished people who would have to find a role. I am confused. We are elected to this place as Members of Parliament and it is part of our job to decide how we discharge that duty. I can understand that the principal Officers of the House and senior members of the Government should receive substantial payment, but the whole drift towards extra payments is unhealthy for democracy. There is vast disparity in the pay of Ministers and we are aggravating that situation by paying Chairmen of Select Committees—and we now propose to extend that further. That is unhealthy. We should be working towards a situation where every Member of Parliament is deemed equal. He or she should defend stewardship of their office before the electorate when they seek re-election. There should be no additional payments such as those we instigated in the last Parliament and are likely to extend this evening. That will make things extraordinarily difficult.

Nobody has noticed that one aspect of government on which we are not setting up a Select Committee is security and intelligence, for which there is no parliamentary oversight. We must be unique among democracies in not having a parliamentary Committee providing such oversight. There is a Committee made up of parliamentarians, appointed by the Prime Minister, who is in charge of the security and intelligence services, but it is not a parliamentary Committee. Indeed, I can make a double whammy and draw attention to the perversity of the fact that that Committee, which I do not recognise—indeed, the Clerk of the House made clear to Hutton that it is not a parliamentary Committee—has a Chairman, my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy), who will not be paid a penny. He cannot be paid, because if he were, it would be an office of profit under the Crown and there would have to be a by-election in Torfaen. Nobody seems to have thought about such ridiculous anomalies. As we are only doing half our job, perhaps we should propose a motion setting up a parliamentary Committee on security and intelligence. If there are payments for Select Committee work then no doubt the Chairman of that Committee could receive payment, too. There is a big void in our scrutiny arrangements.

People pray in aid the Senior Salaries Review Body. Has there ever been an occasion when a reference to that body met with the reply that not a penny extra should be paid? Of course not. Its members are the great and the good—the glitterati—who enjoy being part of that body. When they are invited to make a recommendation they always do so. I can give no credence to the fact that the SSRB has said that there should be payments. In any case, who are they to say that? They are not Members of Parliament. They do not know what goes on here or what the duties of a Member of Parliament are—the diligence, dilatoriness or otherwise of individual Members.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) is not in the Chamber, but she is relevant to the debate. Motion 6 is absurd. Its genesis goes back to when the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) was a constant irritant to the Thatcher Government. The convention of service for two Parliaments was instigated at that time, but I cannot escape the conclusion that the Labour Government found the conduct and stewardship of my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich an irritant, too. We should not go about things as the motion proposes.

Soon there will be a casual vacancy of Chairman of a Select Committee in this Parliament. The expectation is that this Parliament will run for a long time. I am an optimist and I hope that after the next two elections Labour will win and that the next two Parliaments will be for four or five years. The person who fills the first casual vacancy as a Chairman could continue in office for 14 or 15 years.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman should not let his charming paranoia completely run away with him. There is a much simpler explanation, which I remember with great clarity. When the motion to pay Select Committee Chairmen was first tabled, my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) tabled the amendment for an eight-year limit simply as a quid pro quo. His feeling, which was supported by the House, was that as a balancing factor to paying Select Committee Chairmen we should put some limitation on the length of time to which that should apply. It was as simple as that. There was nothing hidden—no conspiracy—and most people have been happy with that situation ever since.

Andrew Mackinlay: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for clarifying the history of the matter. In any event, I remain to this day implacably opposed to the payment of the Chairmen of Select Committees. I tabled a motion, which is on the Order Paper today, although it will not be selected, to repeal that decision. It is interesting that we were able to repeal other things on our hours. I wish that we could revisit that decision because that would a sensible and fair course.

I mentioned my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich. She also intervened to pay tribute to the Chairmen of the Standing Committees. In case there is any misunderstanding, I also pay tribute to them. I recognise that they often require considerable concentration, precision and commitment to quite complicated issues. My limited experience was of chairing a special parliamentary Procedure Committee that was particularly fractious. One had to be conscious of the need to act almost in a quasi-judicial position and to ensure adequate time for the objectors to proposals to be able to articulate their case before Parliament. I found it a very demanding task.

I do not want to denigrate the skills and dedication of our colleagues who fulfil that role as the Chairmen of Committees, but I return to the point that that is their choice, their style and their approach to the office of

[Andrew Mackinlay]

Member of Parliament. Some of us approach that in different ways. I cannot for the life of me understand how, in the 24 hours in a day, they somehow pedal faster. I suppose the job is so onerous that they could be given more Heineken to make them go faster.

We are also creating new anomalies. When I intervened on the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), I asked about what would happen if a proposal was made to pay Opposition Members. That was a relevant question for me to ask, given that my case is to say, "Look, no further." If we go back and look at the Hansard when we debated paying the Chairmen of Select Committees, we see that hon. Members said that the next suggestion would be to pay the Chairmen of Standing Committees. How prophetic that was.

There is creep, and if the House passes these motions tonight there will be further anomalies. For instance, does the person who runs the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, the Inter-Parliamentary Union, the British-American parliamentary group or the British-Irish Inter-Parliamentary Body not work extremely hard? Incidentally, the co-chairman of the British-Irish Inter-Parliamentary Body, in which I take some interest, is paid in the Dail Eireann, so our representative sits next to someone who gets emoluments when our person does not. I am not suggesting that those people should be paid; I am just saying that new anomalies are being created at every stage.

Ministers, not Members of Parliament, carry on being paid during general elections. I understand that our colleagues who are the Chairmen of Select Committees had a hiatus in their payments. When Parliament was dissolved, their salary plummeted—presumably, after this evening, it will pick up again—but that could have an impact of pensions in certain circumstances. We are told that Ministers need compensation—it is highly justified, we are told, but I do not accept that—when they leave office. If that principle is good for them, presumably, it will be advanced in respect of the Chairmen to whom we have already decided to pay salaries and those whose payments will probably be endorsed by the House tonight. Such creep is unhealthy, and I do not say that facetiously; I say it very seriously.

I hope that the Minister will give us some indication in his reply about the arithmetic of what proportion of Members will be paid in addition to the Back-Bench Member's salary. Almost 90-odd members of the Government are paid extra, as are the Chairmen of Select Committee, and now the proposal is to pay the Chairman of Standing Committees. That would buttress my point about the fact that the proposal represents an unhealthy growth of patronage and the development of two tiers of Members of Parliament, which diminishes our democratic responsibilities.

The other issue is the Liaison Committee, the Chairman of which has left the Chamber. I remember talking to a member of new Labour some time after the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) became Prime Minister. In fact, we were all new Labour, but that guy was hyper-new Labour. I told him that it would be a good idea if the Prime Minister appeared before a Select Committee. His response was, "Mackinlay, I now know that you're completely off your trolley." A few weeks later, the Prime Minister, to his eternal credit, said that he would appear before the Liaison Committee. That was an important departure, but, alas, people do not have ambition about providing scrutiny. I think that that Member has now received great advancement—I am very pleased for him—but he could not understand that it was logical that we should make such progress. The Prime Minister, to his credit, on his own initiative, said that he would submit himself for questioning before the Liaison Committee, but that Committee is clearly not the best vehicle. We should have a smaller Committee—

Mr. Gordon Prentice: With my friend on it.

Andrew Mackinlay: I think that the holy spirit will not go that far. That is testing faith to the limits. The Prime Minister should appear before a smaller Committee chosen by the House, rather than by those on the Front Benches. I hope that we will look into that in the coming years. It seems a natural development that that important constitutional innovation should involve not a very large group, but a small group of senior Members, who can focus on the issues.

My final point relates to the Chairmen's Panel. My understanding is that, hitherto, hon. Members could be tested and invited to join to find out whether they could make a good stab at things. I imagine that there will be logistical problem in the future. Someone—I do not know whether it is you, Sir—invites hon. Members to serve, but regardless of whoever makes the selection or the invitation, those selected will cross the rubicon and they will need some time to familiarise themselves. Something will be lost if new members can no longer be invited to get a feel for chairmanship, probably by chairing a less fractious Committee, and so on.

I cannot understand how the incremental scale, which I oppose anyway, is logical. If it is based on time, it does not reflect the volume or difficulty of work. I have mentioned the Crossrail Bill, which could be considered for a year. Probably, some new hon. Members will be sufficiently skilled almost immediately, like ducks to water, to preside over the Committee that considers that Bill, but that would involve a very long commitment. We will create new problems in selecting, recruiting and inviting people to preside over Committees by instituting that incremental system.

For all those reasons, although the House is not packed, I hope that I may be able to persuade some hon. Members to join me in the Division Lobby tonight to oppose the proposition that not only discriminates against my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich, in particular, but has been shown during the debate to be ill thought through, perverse and illogical. At the very least, we should send the homework back for it to be done again. We should reject the dreadful creep of creating two-tier Members of Parliament and making additional payments to some of our colleagues.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I respect the hon. Gentleman for the sincerity of his argument, but could he indicate how many businesses that people might enter at, say, the age of 22 or 23 will give them, after 25, 30 or 35 years' service, the same salary as is obtained and offered to someone who joins the company at the age of 22 or 23?

Does he not believe that there should be some recognition of the responsibility and level of work undertaken by Members of Parliament?

Andrew Mackinlay: First, I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's premise that any comparison can be made between business—entrepreneurial functions, or pushing through great new innovations in the public sector—and our unique role as legislators and that of legislators throughout the world. I am open to correction, but I think that we would struggle to find any other Parliament that is setting up great differentials such as those that we are debating today.

The hon. Gentleman's second point was about pay. There was a big queue to get my job. A lot of people wanted to be the Member of Parliament for Thurrock—both Labour candidates and those who stood against me. I signed up to the job and knew the price and the ground rules, so I am not complaining about the pay and rations. It is a great privilege to be here. I do not know how the hon. Gentleman can suggest that we could translate something that happens elsewhere into our procedures.

I return to the obsession with the idea that time served here somehow creates gravitas and makes people great parliamentarians. We all have different views about our conduct and stewardship here, but none of us can escape the fact that the way in which we behave here and our enthusiasm, or lack of it, will eventually be judged not by us, but by the people at the election. They should take the decisions, and we should not give little brownie points to our colleagues here in the way suggested. I hope that hon. Members will join me in the Division Lobby to resist the measure.

3.30 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I wish to move amendment (b) to motion 34 and amendment (b) to motion 35.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he can only speak to an amendment that has been selected by the Speaker.

Mr. Forth rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Did I mishear the right hon. Gentleman? Does he wish to speak to amendment (a) to motion 34 and amendment (b) to motion 35?–

Mr. Forth: I apologise if I said (b) instead of (a), Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): The right hon. Gentleman is learning from experience.

Mr. Forth: Yes, I am always prepared to be taught by Members with superior experience.

I shall try to rise to the challenge posed by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who quite properly asked why amendment (a) to motion 34 suggests that

"the senior backbench member of the Chairmen's Panel shall also be a member of the Liaison Committee."

I accept that that would be a departure. However, as has been pointed out several times during the debate, the House is in an evolutionary process. Several hon. Members have identified the Liaison Committee as a developing instrument of the House and there is no doubt that the roles that it has now taken on are radically different from those that it had even a few years ago. Most hon. Members agree that that is a good thing and I am sure that the fact that we are honoured to have the Father of the House chairing the Committee adds greatly to its effectiveness. The fact that the Prime Minister now appears before it is a testament to the enhanced role that it now has.

Amendment (a) would make a modest yet important addition to the Committee's development. It reflects the different yet vital role that members of the Chairmen's Panel play in the House. Adding the senior Back-Bench member of the Chairmen's Panel to the Liaison Committee, as the amendment would do, would strengthen the Committee in several important ways.

I shall now attempt to answer directly the question posed by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome. Members of the Chairmen's Panel have a unique and wide perspective. Anyone who has been on the Chairmen's Panel for a considerable time—the person identified in the amendment—must, by definition, have a lot of wide-ranging experience of chairing a substantial number of Committees considering Bills covering huge areas of policy. Additionally, by dint of being on the Panel, that Member would have considerable experience of procedure and many other aspects of the work of the House. Such experience would add to the effectiveness of the Liaison Committee in its deliberations and its questioning of the Prime Minister.

There need be no great fear that this particular member of the Chairmen's Panel would compromise his or her impartiality by playing a political role with a different hat on. After all, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome pointed out, we all have to make that distinction from time to time in our different ways, not least the members of the Chairmen's Panel, who are able—effectively, I hope—to chair Committees with complete impartiality, yet still play a role in the Chamber and elsewhere as politicians. The amendment would be a modest but important step in further enhancing the role and effectiveness of the Liaison Committee, and it is in that spirit that I and the other signatories wish to move it at the appropriate time.

Moving on to my second amendment, I should first make a declaration of non-interest. I am in the fortunate position of already being the Chairman of a Select Committee and therefore in receipt of the established payments to that chairmanship, which disqualifies me from payment as a member of the Chairmen's Panel. I therefore feel free to discuss, without embarrassment, the matters that I am about to embark on, which relate directly to payment of members of the Chairmen's Panel.

I have always taken the view that we got this the wrong way around. I was always an advocate of payment of the Chairmen's Panel rather than of Select Committee Chairmen, because I took the view that Select Committee Chairmen already had a number of tangible privileges. They have a public profile and many of them travelled extensively on fact-finding missions, globally and intergalactically. I felt that that was probably reward enough. The members of the Chairmen's Panel, by contrast, do their work silently, surreptitiously and without public recognition, but they do essential work in the service of the House. Having now established the payment to Select Committee Chairmen, however, I believe that it is absolutely right and proper that we now move towards recognising the work of the Chairmen's Panel.

As I understood it, the argument was about recruitment, retention and recognition of what the Panel does. In that regard, I wish that my other amendment, which sadly was not selected, was before the House, because it proposed that members of the Chairmen's Panel go straight on to the full rate of pay. As I suggested in an intervention, I am not aware of any other position, in government or in the House, where a probationary period has to be served. We do not ask Select Committee Chairman to serve on part pay before they are fully paid; nor do we ask Ministers to do that. Indeed, if I may say so, Madam Deputy Speaker, you and your colleagues did not have to serve a probationary period before you got your well-merited rate of pay.

Suddenly we are moving into new territory. The argument, as I understand it, is that some measure of the effectiveness of the new Panel members has to be made before they can go on to the full rate of pay. I am not sure about the merits of that argument, but even if we accept that, I am afraid that the motion before us is a complete dog's dinner. The graduations suggested here are almost incomprehensible and would fail almost completely to meet the tests of recruitment, retention and recognition by their very definition. That is why the amendment in my name, which, happily, has been selected, recognises the probationary element—which I am reluctant to include, but inevitably, I think, have to—but makes it much simpler, cleaner and neater.

The amendment simply says that if appointed to the Panel, one would get half-pay for two years, when a judgment would be made as to one's suitability. If one was not cutting the mustard, as they say, one would be quietly dropped—sacked, dismissed or whatever. If it was deemed appropriate for one to continue in that service, one would go on to the full rate of pay. That neatly provides fairness, effectiveness and, as it is not unduly complicated, comprehensibility. I hope that the amendment will have widespread support. I am happy that recognition is being made of the important role played by the Chairmen's Panel, but I do not think that the original wording fits the purpose, and I hope that I have persuaded Members that my simple solution is in order.

I am conscious that other Members want to speak, so I shall wind up my remarks by saying a brief word about the nature of Select Committees, a subject that has been touched on several times—just to get my view on the record, for what it is worth. To make Select Committees more effective we should consider having equal numbers of Government and non-Government Members on them. That would be a major step in the right direction. Although I concede that it is proper that chairmanships to this or that Committee be allocated on a party basis, after that the Committee members should be able to elect their own Chairman from among their membership.

That would go a long way to meeting the objections that many Members, such as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), have expressed, while retaining some proper party balance across the chairmanships. I would like to think that such things will be looked at further following our deliberations, and I hope that progress will be made in that direction.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): I had not intended to speak, but it has been such an interesting and engrossing debate that I thought that I would have my penny's worth. I want to pick up on what the Father of the House said.

In our system, we have very strong government and we need strong scrutiny, a point that my Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) constantly makes. If we do not have strong scrutiny, we need to do something about it. I am sure that it is not unique to this Parliament, but we have a terrible curse of patronage. The stain spreads everywhere and we must clean up our act in so far as it is possible.

On the powers of Select Committees, the Leader of the House quite casually dropped into the debate the important announcement that changes to the Osmotherly rules will be published tomorrow. Is not that amazing? The Osmotherly rules go to the very heart of our system. When my Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) wanted John Scarlett to appear before the Foreign Affairs Committee, he was told no. When he said, "We want John Scarlett and we can meet in camera", he was again told no. Then, along came Lord Hutton, who posted everything on the world wide web so that everybody all over the world could see it. Lord Hutton said to Scarlett, "Come before me", and John Scarlett dropped everything to do so. What do the Osmotherly rules do? They set out the framework within which civil servants and those in the Government sphere appear before Select Committees. It will be fascinating to see the new rules when they are published tomorrow.

When the Public Administration Committee, on which I served in the previous Parliament and to which I have been fortunate to have been reappointed, was inquiring into Government communications, we summoned Alastair Campbell, as we were entitled to do. He said that he was on a speaking tour or some such thing and could not appear before us. We asked him to think again. I thought that that would become a great constitutional spat, but Alastair Campbell came before us and that went well. We cannot have people refusing to appear before Select Committees and we cannot have someone—whoever—telling Select Committees that people cannot appear before them, as in the case of John Scarlett.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am in very strong agreement with my hon. Friend, but I would be happy if the changes to the Osmotherly rules which we are told are about to be made included special advisers. My hon. Friend will remember that Select Committees have got into great difficulty when they have tried to call before them people who were not paid but who were special advisers and apparently had great influence.

Mr. Prentice: I did not make my point as clear as I should have done. When the Public Administration Committee summoned Alastair Campbell, he had ceased to be a special adviser at No. 10—I was going to say he had left the Government. That is an important point.

It is very important that all political parties lodge in the Library of the House a memorandum setting out their procedures for appointing their party members to Select Committees. I would like the Labour party to do that, as I would the Liberal Democrats, the Conservatives and all the parties. I have suggested it before. When I was on the executive committee of the parliamentary Labour party, which is elected by all Labour MPs, I was constantly struck by how difficult it was to change the lists that came from the Chief Whip. A strange alchemy was used.

Nigel Griffiths: It has got better.

Mr. Prentice: I shall come on to that. If the parliamentary committee suggested any changes, we were told, "You have to watch the gender balance, which new Labour cares about." We were told that there was a regional balance or an experience balance to maintain; there was a balance between new Members and old Members, and so on. The situation was very difficult indeed.

People who had been sacked from the Government could move seamlessly to the chairmanship of Select Committees. That was not acceptable then, and it is even more unacceptable now, given that Select Committee Chairmen will be paid an additional £13,100. The situation has changed, because the new parliamentary committee elected by the PLP only a few weeks ago has asserted itself and said that no Minister who has just been sacked or who has just left the Government can transfer seamlessly to the chairmanship of a Select Committee that is monitoring their erstwhile Department. We all welcome that change by the PLP.

In most cases, Select Committee membership will increase from 11 to 14, which is too big. I think that 11 is good enough. However, we should do something about Select Committee members who do not turn up to meetings or contribute in any way. Given that some Members who would like to serve on Select Committees are unable to do so, that grieves me. Some Labour Members serve on two Select Committees—for example, a Departmental Committee and a House Committee. Some even serve on three Committees. I hope that we will revisit that problem after six or 12 months, once the new Members have found their feet and have woken up to the fact that Select Committee membership lasts for the entire four or five-year Parliament. People who serve on more than one Select Committee should be invited to stand down in favour of colleagues who do not serve on any.

I agree with the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), who suggested that the rules on term limits were opaque. It is an incontestable fact that there are regular changes to the machinery of government. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister was introduced for goodness' sake, and the Department of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee brought together responsibilities for the environment and for agriculture. Who knows, in the course of this Parliament there may be changes in the Home Office, with justice responsibilities being hived off. Reconfigurations of Whitehall Departments feed through to Select Committees. As I have made clear, a new Select Committee is formed, but the original Chairman can continue to serve.

Finally, on the business of additional salaries, I voted against the extra money for Chairs of Select Committees, but the proposal remains. As my Friend the Member for Thurrock said, function creep is taking place. It was only a matter of time before the members of the Chairmen's Panel clamoured for recognition, and I daresay that the proposal will be agreed. It is wrong, however, to introduce gradations that are supposed to reflect experience and the fact that some members are more distinguished than others. We do not need incremental salary scales. Like the old public service trade unions in the 1960s, we are introducing incremental salary scales to reflect length of service in the House. That is wrong, and I shall join my Friend the Member for Thurrock in the Lobby to vote against the proposal.

Finally, I have always believed that the real Stakhanovites on the Chairmen's Panel would sit through Committees that last for weeks and months, keeping everyone in order—[Interruption.] Is it not like that? The scales fell from my eyes when my good Friend the then Member for Burnley, Peter Pike, who has now left this place, told me that he had frantic calls to chair the Committee considering the Hunting Bill. He was told that if he did not chair it, the Bill would fall because there was no one else available from the Chairmen's Panel to chair that sitting. He realised that if he chaired the Committee, he would lose the right to vote on the Hunting Bill when it came back to the Floor of the House of Commons. Peter Pike feels as strongly as I do on the issue, but because he had been approached and the situation had been explained to him, he put his views to one side and chaired the Committee.

It is a little sad that we have to pay the Chairmen's Panel up to £13,000 to coax individuals to chair Committees. That is what is behind the proposal. The Peter Pikes of previous Parliaments are no longer available, so we have to pay people to take on the responsibility. That is unfortunate. We are creating different classes of Members and we do not need that.

John Bercow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Prentice: I was about to finish, but I will.

John Bercow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way so near to the conclusion of his speech. He inquired earlier, and he received no satisfactory response to his inquiry, about the basis on which Members are chosen for membership of the Chairmen's Panel or the basis on which, perhaps, they offer themselves. Has he ever offered to serve—unpaid, of course—on the Chairmen's Panel?

Mr. Prentice: I have not offered to join the Chairmen's Panel, and I have never received an invitation, either.

3.51 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice). Perhaps I could pick up a point that he made towards the end of his speech, which reflected what the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) said. They made it clear that they were opposed in principle to the payment of Select Committee Chairmen and that therefore they oppose what they call the "creep" represented by the motions on the Order Paper today. I shall try to persuade them both that what we are doing is right.

Both hon. Members are good House of Commons men. One of the problems for the House of Commons is that, as new Members arrive, they tend to get drawn by the political and financial attraction of becoming Ministers. The principle of paying Select Committee Chairmen seeks to provide some gravitational pull the other way, so that the Government do not hoover up all the talent and there is an alternative career. I very much regret that the talents that both hon. Members have displayed this afternoon have been consistently overlooked by the Government, but I hope they recognise that there is an alternative career in the House. In order to add value to that alternative career, the decision that the House took a few years ago was the right one.

I am delighted to see the newly appointed Chairman of the Committee of Selection, the hon. Member for Cumbernauld, Kilsyth and Kirkintilloch, East (Rosemary McKenna), in her place. She has taken to her new task like a duck to water, and I welcome what the Committee has done. Apart from her, I am the only non-Whip who attends the Committee of Selection, and it is rather like an atheist turning up at the General Synod.

Perhaps I could reflect on the change of character of this debate, compared with the corresponding debate at the beginning of the previous Parliament. That was not a happy debate, as those who were there will remember. It was an animated debate and at the end the Committee of Selection's motions were overturned. Although we have taken longer than we should have this time round, the mistakes that were made in the last Parliament have been avoided—mistakes, may I say, mainly on the Government's side.

What I was looking out for from the Committee of Selection was whether any Ministers who had recently lost their job had been parachuted on to Select Committees, and the answer was no. Have the minority parties had a square deal? On the whole, they have, and they are not represented on the Committee of Selection. What has happened to what I might call the awkward squad—the independent, fearless Members? Are they still on their Select Committees? For me, the litmus test was whether the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) was still on the Foreign Affairs Committee, and he was. As a relatively neutral member of the Committee of Selection, I concluded that it did a better job this time than last time. However, we can do even better next time by revisiting the Liaison Committee's recommendations, which involve a completely different means of choosing Select Committees. I was interested in the exchange at the beginning of the debate in which it was suggested that the Modernisation Committee might revisit that matter. In this Parliament, I hope that we have an opportunity to rerun a debate that we held in the previous Parliament, in which the proposition that we should move to a more independent system was narrowly lost. The Executive still have too much control over appointments to Select Committees, and the House of Commons should repatriate such decisions.

I like the idea of a timetable, which was suggested by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). Under his proposal, we would have a set timetable for the establishment of Select Committees. There would be no doubt about the target, which would prevent delay.

On the Liaison Committee, I support the proposition that the Father of the House should be reappointed. He skilfully chaired the Liaison Committee in the previous Parliament, when we developed a new role of interrogating the Prime Minister.

Subject to one qualification, I support the proposal that the senior hon. Member should join the Chairmen's Panel. If one examines the nominations for Select Committees, roughly half the Liaison Committee will consist of new hon. Members. There is a strong argument for continuity in the membership of the Liaison Committee as we continue to interrogate the Prime Minister. By adopting that proposal, we would achieve additional continuity on the Liaison Committee. I am pleased to hear that the Prime Minister has already been approached about finding a date in his diary to recapture the sitting that we missed in July, hopefully by holding an early meeting when we return in the autumn.

In an earlier exchange on the Modernisation Committee, the Leader of the House was asked what it can do that the Liaison Committee cannot, and his answer was illuminating—"delivery". That answer is dangerous: the Modernisation Committee has delivered on measures that are sympathetic to the Government, but it has not delivered on measures that are sympathetic to the House of Commons, such as the vote in the previous Parliament on an alternative means of appointing Select Committees.

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is an extraordinary anomaly that what is supposed to be a Committee of parliamentarians is chaired by a member of the Government? There is no role for the Government in Select Committees, which are scrutiny Committees of this House. That is not a personal criticism of this Leader of the House or any previous Leader of the House, but there is no role for the Government in scrutinising themselves, and it is absurd that the Modernisation Committee should be chaired by a member of the Government.

Sir George Young: I agree, and the case is even stronger than that. The Leader of the House, as a member of the Cabinet, is responsible for delivering the Government's legislative programme. It is quite wrong that that same person should chair the Modernisation Committee, which indicates how the House should process legislation, and that appointment is a clear short circuit of the system. The Procedure Committee, not the Modernisation Committee, should consider the matter, and it should be chaired by a Back Bencher. The House should decide how it addresses the legislative programme.

Mark Fisher: Although the Government are in some ways culpable, does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that the remedy is in our hands? If hon. Members had some spine and recognised our role as parliamentarians, we would use our ability to vote off such processes. We do not have to vote for a member of the Government becoming a member of a Committee of this House.

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. I think that he will recognise that the power to change matters rests inevitably more with Government Back Benchers than with Opposition Back Benchers. I hope that he will use his substantial influence among his colleagues to persuade them of his case for reform.

My final point concerns the Administration Committee. I welcome the appointment of an Administration Committee rationalising the domestic Committees that we had before. I used to find it somewhat odd that somebody who wanted to become a Member of Parliament, won an election, came here and wanted to hold the Government to account found themselves appointed to the Catering Committee. Given the pressure on Members' time, it must be right to streamline administration matters and have one Committee doing all those tasks, freeing up Members for more important jobs in holding the Government to account.

I was impressed by what my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) said in moving his amendment, and I shall listen to the arguments from Members on the other side of the House, but I am minded to support my right hon. Friend and the Chairman of the Speaker's Panel.

4 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): I must apologise to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and to the House, because my presence has been required on the Committee that is considering regulations to do with the Water Act 2003. My Whips informed me that it was a three-line Whip, and in case I had difficulty in recognising three lines on a piece of paper they carefully wrote it in words as well. I apologise to the House for my apparent discourtesy in nipping in and out during the speeches.

Select Committees of this House have proved themselves, not only in the last Parliament but in previous Parliaments, to be a tremendous advance because they have the time and opportunity to scrutinise Government Ministers. Competent Ministers have no difficulty in dealing with Select Committees as long as they know their own subject, because they are prepared to engage in the sort of exchange that good scrutiny encompasses by explaining their policies and where they want to go with them and being prepared to take on difficult arguments. I pay tribute to the Secretary of State for Transport, who is not only happy to come and talk to us about the things that he wants to do but prepared to defend them. I will not say that he always takes notice of everything that my Committee says—would that he did—but he is extremely careful to engage it in discussing the detailed work of Government. What more can one ask of any Secretary of State? Some Ministers are capable not only of benefiting from the system of Select Committees but of producing positive results.

However, I voted against paying Chairmen for a simple reason. Any Government, offered the opportunity to exercise patronage, in whatever form, will take that opportunity. It is not particularly surprising that when politicians are offered a weapon they use it, and in my experience they do so consistently.

There are one or two things that the House of Commons should be very clear about. It is not acceptable for a Minister to leave Government and instantly move over to become the Chairman of a Select Committee, because what they are doing, in effect, is giving a verdict on the work that they have just performed, which inevitably means that, whatever their instincts, they will not come up with the degree of perception that is necessary for them to be a good Chairman. It is essential that we in this House insist that the rule—always unwritten but very clear—that chairmanships go to Back-Bench Members is supported in every conceivable way.

Andrew Mackinlay: I can see the Whip, my right hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth) and I reassure him that I will gladly vote for the anointed Chairmen. However, in view of what has been revealed about casual vacancies and the impact of the rule that will be passed tonight, is not there a case for every one of us, at the Select Committees' inaugural meetings, to ask each Chairman to give an undertaking to take on the obligation for the lifetime of the Parliament and to spurn any offer of advancement from the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition? That is a reasonable proposition. It cannot be written into the rules, but I believe that Chairmen should give that undertaking.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I have no difficulty in giving my hon. Friend a firm commitment that I have no intention of leaving the chairmanship of the Select Committee unless someone offers me the opportunity to be a hereditary duchess. I rather fancy the title Duchess Dunwoody of Crewe, which has an endearing music hall ring. However, I intend to stick with the Select Committee, no matter who tries to dissuade me.

Select Committees operate best when their members and their Chairmen are Back Benchers, when their membership has a balance of all the relevant parties and when they understand that they are there to scrutinise—to ask the awkward questions and make them public. I therefore take issue with some of motions.

The Liaison Committee did much work on the size of Committees, took evidence and worked with the Hansard Society to try to ascertain how Select Committees could be made better—"improved" is the word that I was looking for but nowadays English is out the window. I am therefore sad that Her Majesty's Government have gone for more than 11 members.

I have served on and chaired Committees with more than 11 members. Unless one intends to extend the session to an unwieldy length, all the members cannot get in to question Ministers. That leaves the Chairman in the difficult position of either excluding some members, who have every right to ask questions, or allowing the person who gives evidence to escape proper scrutiny because one is trying hard to get members in, irrespective of the quality of the questioning. It is a recipe for disaster. We have been there and done that. The Liaison Committee produced a report, which carefully set out the reasons why we believed that big

[Mrs. Dunwoody]

Committees were unworkable. Nevertheless, we appear to be reverting to the status quo ante. I hope that that will not be pushed. It is a retrograde, not a progressive step.

The open manoeuvring on not only the membership but the chairmanship of the Committees does not reflect well on this place, even if it was slightly different from previous occasions. We ought to have had enough common sense last time to vote to retain the selection for Select Committees in the House of Commons. We should have had enough confidence in our judgment to accept that. The Whips Office comprises men and women of such superior intellect, tact, ability and charm that one could not under any circumstances criticise anything that they do. However, there is the odd occasion when the House of Commons would do better to decide for itself in the Chamber not only the membership but the chairmanship of Select Committees.

There used to be an assumption that the Committee chose its Chairman. That was a pretty good system. In my time, before the Labour Government came to office, my Whips Office put me on a Select Committee to take the Chair. The then members had already decided that they wanted someone else and they voted the other person into the Chair. I accepted that with as much dignity as a short, fat Welsh woman can. It is vital that we get ourselves organised in regard to what we want from the scrutiny Committees. At the moment, that is not the case. We see-saw between accepting the usual channels arranging these matters and then saying publicly that we do not like the results.

Many Members give many years of service without ever becoming a junior or middle-ranking Minister, but they are no less talented than those who progress through the Government system—believe me, I have watched this process for 30 years. Having been a junior Minister, I can say that those who frequently go in and out of Government are no more talented than those who are never offered such opportunities. I was even approached to join the Chairmen's Panel, and I served on it very happily for a long time. That, too, involved an arrangement that was difficult to evaluate. Nevertheless, it was an honour to serve on it, and I was glad that I was able to do so. Members of Parliament are no longer prepared to take on these duties. There is no longer the same degree of understanding. That is because we have created the totally artificial and, to my mind, unacceptable theory that a person can fulfil their role as a Member of Parliament only as a junior Minister in a large Department. That is a very short-sighted and limited attitude, and it is one that I do not want to see.

The Select Committees operate best when they are a reasonable size, and when they are made up of Back Benchers who got there because they really have something to contribute, and want to do so. They operate best when the Chairmen are chosen by the members of the Committee, and when they are able to call before them people and papers in a wide and open manner, so that they cannot be told that they may not call special advisers because they are not paid, or that they may not call people who are known to be taking policy decisions but whose influence on the Government it is thought undesirable to demonstrate. Such Select Committees are an important part of the working of this place. They are something to be proud of, and we should stop trying to dilute them. We should not regard them as a dumping ground for people for whom we have no other occupation.

Mark Fisher: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way in the dying moments of her speech. In her interesting, admirable and entirely correct list of characteristics of a good Select Committee, she mentioned the role of a Select Committee in choosing its own Chair. Am I missing something? Has that changed? We are selecting the members of a Committee; we are not selecting any Chairs. Surely there is nothing to stop a Committee nominating anyone among its number to be its Chair, the moment that it meets. Another arrangement might have been suggested to members of a Committee by other people, perhaps in the Whips Offices or on the Front Benches, but such suggestions are not binding. If the members of the Committee are of independent mind, it is up to them to select from among their number the Chairman who is most suited to the job.

Mrs. Dunwoody: My dear, well educated and hon. Friend does occasionally display a degree of naiveté that I would hardly think possible in one so intelligent. Would that events took place as he describes. One thing that I deeply regret is the real erosion by both major parties of the rights of Back Benchers. When I first came here, it was possible on Fridays to vote on private Members' Bills—which could involve very controversial legislation—not because one party wanted that to happen but because the House wanted it to happen. When I came here, it was possible to accept that Select Committees chose their own Chairmen, although that has worked against me. It was also possible for Back Benchers to influence Government policy in a number of ways.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) told the truth: surely the answer to the membership and the selection of the Chair of these Committees lies in the membership of those Committees. The reflection is on us as representative Members of Parliament. That is what is being lost. Surely that was the substance of the hon. Lady's comments.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Absolutely. If in any way I implied, even as a joke, that I thought that that was not the case, I was totally wrong.

Andrew Mackinlay: In view of the intervention of our hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher), it is important to note that my hon. Friend and I can say that we have been there. We were part of the electorate for the late Robert Adley, who was not nominated by the Conservatives in 1992 to chair the Transport Committee—I will not embarrass the distinguished Member who had been so anointed. The fact is, however, that we did revolt, and we still have that option. On this occasion, I indicated to the deputy Chief Whip, who is sitting close to your Chair, Madam Deputy Speaker, that I would support the person who was anointed. That is my choice, as I am pleased that he has been so anointed. Each and every one of us, however, has an obligation to decide how we vote in Select Committees, and we should say to the Members concerned, "Will you give an undertaking that you will not take Government office from Mr. Blair or Mr. Brown during the lifetime of this Parliament?"

Mrs. Dunwoody: I assure the House that my hon. Friend and I are indeed very revolting. The reality is that it was true—we supported the choice of a Conservative Chairman, because we thought that he was, as he proved to be, an excellent Chairman. Indeed, his report on the privatisation of British Rail still stands as one of the best criticisms. If only his Government had followed such recommendations we might not be in the current mess.

The matter is in the House's hands. Why did Members, at the last opportunity, vote down taking the power back where it belongs? It is no use talking about the rights of Back Benchers if, when people are offered the opportunity, they either vote with their feet by going home, which is always a difficult political decision for many Members, or they vote to keep their chains. That is indescribably sad. A lot of Back-Bench powers have been lost. We have quietly allowed those in control to take away from us, with the acquiescence of those who should know better, several powers that meant that independent Members of Parliament could have an impact. We will regret that, and some of us regret it already. Some of us tend to stick on because we think that when the oral memory of the House is lost, new Members will not know what it is possible to do. Until we reach the point at which Members themselves restore the powers, we shall be in continuing difficulty.

4.18 pm

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): As far as I am concerned, this is not a personal matter. I have nothing against the Government Whips, and relatively little against my own. I strongly object, however, to the time that it has taken to reconstitute the Select Committees, and to the manner in which it is proposed this afternoon to do so.

My starting point has been articulated by several right hon. and hon. Members throughout the House—the significance of the Committees. The Committees have an absolutely invaluable role, if only we dared to recognise and demonstrate the fact. That role is scrutiny of the Executive, of the quality of their policies, of the effectiveness of their administration and of their expenditure of taxpayer's money. When the context for the debate is set out in those simple and unmistakeable terms, it seems to me to underline the House's criminal neglect of its responsibility to get the Committees up and running earlier than we have done.

It is, I think, 69 days since the general election, and tomorrow it will be 10 weeks since polling day. It is 57 days since the Loyal Address and the opening of the debate on the Queen's Speech. To those who say, "Well, we haven't done too badly this time; the process could have been more protracted than it has proved. We did a bit better on this occasion than we did on the last", I say that that is unduly complacent. Frankly, we could have done a lot better, and I make no bones about the fact that in apportioning blame, I attribute the bulk to the system and to those charged with its administration—apparently, they are only too happy to be so charged—the Whips.

It is wrong that the composition of Committees whose purpose is to scrutinise the Executive should be determined by representatives of that Executive. Members who know me know that I try to be dispassionate and fair-minded. I am not interested in making a purely party political point, any more than the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) is; frankly, the issues are far too salient and pressing for that. Fundamentally, this is a clash between Front Benchers and Back Benchers in all parts of the House.

I hope that Government Back Benchers will not cavil or object when I say that the inappropriateness of Executive control is particularly acute where the Government are concerned. The reason why is simple. Government Whips choose who scrutinises other representatives of the Government. The Government run the country and introduce policies, and they have a range of powers that, frankly, do not apply to the Opposition, so it is particularly serious when Government Whips decide who scrutinises their ministerial friends and colleagues.

That said, I do not in any sense think that the representatives of Opposition Front Benchers can be exonerated from responsibility. Members know perfectly well that many of these matters are determined on a consensual basis behind the scenes, between what we call "the usual channels". So that we do not talk in terms that mean absolutely nothing to people outside this place—who think when we refer to the usual channels, "What on earth are they talking about?—we ought to make it explicitly clear that we are talking about the Government Whips Office and the Opposition Whips Office.

It is quite wrong for Opposition Whips to determine who participates in Select Committees. I have to tell you, Madam Deputy Speaker—despite your vast and varied experience in this place, I feel certain that you will be shocked by the revelation that I am about to vouchsafe—that one Opposition Whip said recently to me that he personally was keen that a particular Member, who had previously been, surprise, surprise, in the Whips Office, should be appointed to a given Select Committee with a view, perhaps, if all went well, to that individual's becoming the Chairman of said Committee. He gave the following reason. "We think it important"—I am not quite sure whom he meant by "we", but presumably he was speaking for Front Benchers—"to strengthen co-operation between that Select Committee and the relevant shadow Secretary of State and his team." That strikes me as absolutely wrong. Just as it is wrong for the Government to seek to "nobble" a Select Committee in order to defuse criticism of the Executive, so it is wrong for Opposition Front Benchers to seek to steer membership or chairmanship of the Committees in a greater, lesser or different way than would otherwise have been the case, in order to oppose the Government.

Mr. Forth: If the system is as invidious and insidious as my hon. Friend suggests, how is it that he has been recommended for membership of the International Development Committee, which I suspect he wanted very much?

John Bercow: I make it absolutely clear to my right hon. Friend that I strongly object to the way in which it is being done. To answer his question, I shall hazard a guess. The answer is probably that representatives of the Opposition Whips Office think that I am marginally less of a nuisance if I am busying myself with the important work involved in membership of the International Development Committee than if they were thoroughly to brass me off by denying me that membership. I must say to my right hon. Friend, who has never been a lackey at any time, that I made it clear all along to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), the deputy Chief Whip, who is sadly not in his place—if he were, he would be visible—[Interruption.] He is in the Tea Room, I am told. I told him that I did not believe that it should be done in that way. What I think about the operation of the Whips in these matters is well known.

Of course the Whips will not voluntarily relinquish their power. They have the power; they exercise it; they enjoy its exercise; and they go about the House feeling a sense of fulfilment. After all, they are very senior, very respected, very influential, very busy and consequently have very full diaries.

Andrew Mackinlay: And they are paid!

John Bercow: Yes, they are paid as well, as the hon. Gentleman helpfully observes from a sedentary position. In response to the inevitable inquiry, "Grandma or Grandpa, what did you do today?", the Whips will be able proudly to say to their grandchildren, "Well, I managed to stitch up the membership of a Select Committee, and we had to make a choice between the good boys and good girls on the one hand and the bad boys and the bad girls on the other." An intelligent grandson or granddaughter will say, "Oh, I understand what you mean, Grandpa—that the good boys and good girls are those who ask helpful and intelligent questions and go about their work and responsibilities independently of the respective Front Benchers". At that point, the senior Whip will say, "No, no, no, you quite misunderstand the purpose of our work in constructing Select Committees. We want people who are, in Sir Humphrey's terms, 'sound'—people who will do things in a way that we approve of".

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): My hon. Friend is right, but there is another point to be made. The Whips Office controls the parliamentary party—or, at least, tries to control it—and one of the ways it does so is through the use of patronage. It is one of the least attractive features of parliamentary life today and it is a reason why we should have nothing to do with allowing the Whips Office to choose the composition of Select Committees.

John Bercow: My right hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right. I do not know whether the sensation has afflicted other right hon. and hon. Members this afternoon, but the infuriating thing for me is that we have been here before. This afternoon, I feel as though we are playing a very long-running tape all over again. To put it another way, I have the sensation that I am once again, after a gap of about 15 years, reading that magnificent novel by Kafka—"The Trial", in which K is treated appallingly by the bureaucracy and goes round in circles. There is also his other magnificent tome, "The Castle", in which the hero thinks that he is advancing closer and closer to it, but on every step towards it that he takes, he discovers that he is a step further away than he was before. Well, I have that sensation, Madam Deputy Speaker, in relation to the composition of Select Committees.

We have had these debates before. As long ago as July 2001, the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), who was then the Leader of the House, my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Angela Browning), who was then shadow Leader of the House and the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), who was not then but is now the Father of the House, all argued that the process needed decisive reform, and needed it then. Four years later, that has not happened and there appears to be no enthusiasm among those on the Front Benches for it. What is even more depressing is that there is insufficient enthusiasm for reform on the Back Benches on both sides of the House. That is what is urgently needed.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman picked on the wrong author. Is there not a stronger resemblance to what happens in "Alice Through the Looking Glass"?

John Bercow: I must say that the literary reference that the hon. Lady has invoked is probably better than mine. I had a recollection of the Kafka novels, but the hon. Lady is right that this is an absurd way in which to operate. The truth is that we can have many nuances on a theme, but in the end the real argument is about whether we opt for appointment or for election.

I accept that there the scourge of Whip domination is objectionable. In the nicest possible spirit, however, I say to the House—and to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), who spoke about this earlier—that I do not think that the other proposals for reform are satisfactory either.

The House will recall that the Liaison Committee report "Shifting the Balance" of March 2000 said that the system was wrong and needed to be changed so that it was independent of the Executive. It proposed that a trinity of very senior and distinguished hon. Members should make up a panel to which aspirant members of Select Committees could appeal. That might be marginally better than allowing the Whips to dictate membership, but it is still a poor and unsatisfactory way to proceed. That would amount to a system of patronage in itself, and hon. Members desperately keen to get on a Committee would feel that they had to ingratiate themselves with the panel.

Subsequently, in February 2002, the Modernisation Committee recommended that a committee of nine hon. Members should act as a filter for applications for Select Committee membership. I do not approve of that either. The systems that I have described are alternative and only marginally less objectionable forms of patronage. Sherlock Holmes said that, when all other possibilities have been eliminated, the remaining possibility, however improbable, must be the truth. In this case, the remaining possibility is that the House will decide to take the composition of Select Committees into its own hands—that is, it will determine that composition by election.

We can go about that in various ways. One possibility, which I do not necessarily advocate, is that the process should be a complete free for all, in which all hon. Members have the right to vote for all the members of all Select Committees, with no reserved rights for Opposition or other minority parties. I accept that there would be a danger that hon. Members would vote in a very partisan way and that Select Committee membership would be skewed as a result.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) has proposed that the conduct of these matters should be vested in the hands of Mr. Speaker, but I believe that it would quickly become evident that that was not entirely satisfactory or fair. Speedy amendments and revisions of that process would probably be made, but that option is what might be called the pure democratic model.

A second, alternative method would be to protect the respective strengths of the parties in the House, in terms of the numbers of Select Committee members—or Chairmen, or both—that are allocated to the parties. However, all hon. Members would still be allowed to vote for all members of the Select Committees, subject to the understanding that, depending on the strength of the parties' representation in the House, the Government party will have, say, seven members of a Committee, the main Opposition three and a minority party one.

If we are committed to the principle of democratic engagement, the seam is pretty rich. A third possibility is that we say that members of the Conservative party will vote only for Conservative members of a Select Committee, that Labour Members will vote only for Labour members, and so on.

I confess that I prefer the second of those options. I believe that all hon. Members should elect Select Committee members, subject to some protections for the minority parties. The system is not perfect, and it could be amended subsequently. Yes, there is a danger—possibly even a likelihood—that the first set of elections would not achieve the necessary balance between geography, gender, youth and experience, and so on. Nevertheless, under that system, the House would decide who should be on the Select Committees that scrutinise the Executive.

It baffles me constantly that in an age in which the pervasive principle of democratic legitimacy applies we seem always to find an excuse for not applying it in the context of composing the Committees that we so value.

Mr. Shepherd: I hope that my hon. Friend will take my comment in the spirit in which it is intended, but his elegant ruminations could have found expression on the Order Paper and we would have had an opportunity to vote on them.

John Bercow: Well, my answer is that I was happy to go along with the credible proposal made by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North, which allows for a degree of flexibility, under the auspices of Mr. Speaker, as to how the method of election would operate. Insofar as my hon. Friend has, gently or otherwise, rebuked me, I do not think that the rebuke is actually fair, because the hon. Gentleman has peovided for a system of election.

In essence, we have to ask ourselves whether we want to will the means of change. I do. If Members want to be respected, we have to show respect for ourselves. If we want our Select Committees to be credible, we have to give them credibility. If we want them to be effective overseers of Government policy and to hold Ministers to account, we have to recognise that they will be far more effective and respected in fulfilment of that role if they enjoy the support of the House. It would not work perfectly, but it would work a lot better than the present arrangements.

If we wait for Government Whips or Opposition Whips to say, "We will give up our power", we will wait for eternity. Even waiting for the Leader of the House or shadow Leader of the House to make the change will not work.

Andrew Mackinlay: I say in all seriousness to the hon. Gentleman that in the past two weeks, we have seen a seismic shift in the way the procedure happens in the Labour party, and I am proud of that. It is not the end, but probably only the beginning of the end, but—and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House mentioned Labour's selection process earlier—we can say that a shift has happened. That should be written up by political journalists. It means that I and many others are being recommended to the House for the membership of Select Committees on the initiative of our peers, our Back Bench representatives, our shop stewards. That is a healthy development and should be put on the record, because we can all be justifiably proud of that advance.

John Bercow: The hon. Gentleman is right. He may think, and others may agree, that I am being slightly uncharitable. I did not mean to be, but if I have been, I am prepared to acknowledge it.

I recall that in July 2001 the right hon. Member for Swansea, West, who is now of course our esteemed Father of the House, objected to the idea that ex-Ministers should be parachuted in as members and, immediately, Chairmen of Select Committees. He said, in a telling phrase, that a Select Committee chairmanship should not be regarded as "palliatives for injured pride". He made the point that being a Minister involved all sorts of great advantages and privileges and, once someone ceased being a Minister—in the full knowledge that that was bound to happen sooner or later in the slippery slope business that is politics—he or she should be pleased to have served and should not expect any particular preferment.

I would go further and say, as the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) did, that precisely because an immediate past Minister would lack a perception of what is required—I would go further and say that they would lack the dispassionate interest that is necessary for effective Committee membership and, especially, chairmanship—such people should be ruled out. From looking at the Order Paper and hearing about the subterranean and private methods of the Labour party, I welcome the fact that a decision appears to have been made along those lines. No ex-Ministers have been so parachuted, and that is a good thing. I still feel, however, that we have not had the culture shift that we need.

I say that because of a good-natured and illuminating exchange that I had with the Leader of the House much earlier in the debate. He was talking about how the Labour party was being pretty democratic, transparent and fair, as the hon. Member for Thurrock just said. The right hon. Gentleman said that Labour had a pretty open process. There was just one problem: I asked the leader of the House to divulge the secret. I wanted to know exactly how the Labour party goes about the process. The right hon. Gentleman laughed and seemed genuinely quite amused by my question, and said that if he told me how Labour did it I might be prepared to tell him how the Opposition did it. Actually, it was a deadly serious question. I was in no sense casting aspersions; I was not even being cynical. All I wanted to know was how the parliamentary Labour party goes about the process.

I have not been invited to a meeting of the parliamentary Labour party—[Interruption.] and I am making no application to attend such a meeting now or at any time—but I suspect that the PLP probably goes about things in a more transparent and democratic way than my party. All I wanted to know was what the procedure was. The interesting point was that the Leader of the House immediately took refuge in the notion that how Labour does it is purely a matter for Labour—in essence, a private question. I would put the point differently. I believe that the way the Labour party does it is important business for Labour, but it is important to the House as well. How the Tory party does it is important business for the Tory party, but it is important for the House as well. I readily tell the Deputy Leader of the House that how we do it is his business. He is perfectly entitled to probe and scrutinise and, if he thinks our procedure is less democratic, to chide. I believe that our process needs vastly to be improved.

The Conservative Chief Whip sends a note to all Members with a list of Committees and asks us to specify upon which Committee or Committees we wish to serve. It is possible to lobby. I admit that I said two things to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire: first, that I strongly disapproved of the whole method and, secondly, that in the event that I was kicked off the Select Committee on International Development, he would inevitably find that I had a vastly greater amount of time to devote to all the other political interests on which I might conceivably have independent-minded views that I was inclined to express. My right hon. Friend, for reasons unknown to me, decided that my application for continuing membership of the Committee was acceptable, but the notion that he should determine whether I serve on the Committee is quite wrong.

I should be perfectly happy to subject myself to the will of the House, as other right hon. and hon. Members should be prepared to do. If the House took the view that I did not have much to contribute and that it was not much interested in my views, expertise or background in the subject of international development and that other people were to be preferred for membership of the Committee, I should accept that without complaint. What I dislike is the notion that a small coterie of people in whom excessive power is vested should, for all sorts of reasons that they have neither a responsibility nor frequently an inclination to explain, be able to decide that Bloggs will serve and Smith will not, or the other way round. That is a hopelessly antiquated, fossilised, old-fashioned and undemocratic way to operate.

The House of Commons must decide whether it wants to be a serious, modern, forward-looking, transparent and accountable democracy. I believe that it should be. We should not have this debate again in four years' time. We must change the system and we must trust Members. Some decisions will be good and some will be bad, but it will be a better system. Let us dip our toes in the sea and discover where that leads us. If we are too frightened to free ourselves from the chains of Government domination, we have no right to complain.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) pointed out that strictly speaking the determination of the chairmanship of a Committee is a matter for its individual members. He is right. We should assert ourselves, but would not it be better if there were a recognition throughout the House that the process should be open, transparent and democratic, and that no hint of Government whipping, cajolement, enticement, bullying or threat should enter it at all?

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), who is a truly independent-minded Member. I am not sure whether to rejoice with him in his membership of a Select Committee, which, I hope, we are about to endorse in a few minutes, or to commiserate with him about the fact that he has been gagged by his Whips from displaying his independence on an even wider platform.

John Bercow: I used that line with the deputy Chief Whip to try to persuade him that it was probably in his interest to allow me to continue to serve on the Select Committee, but if it is of any interest to the hon. Gentleman, I will endeavour to find enough time to pontificate on other matters as well.

Mark Fisher: I would be amazed if that were not the case.

As the hon. Gentleman said there is an element of déjà vu about the debate. Looking around the Chamber, I see in attendance hon. Members who have debated the issues that lie behind the debate time and again over the years. Those issues are the quality of scrutiny and the independence of Members of Parliament. The only thing that is rather sad is that, throughout most of the debate, only one or two new Members have been in attendance—that is to their credit—but in a Parliament where I have been surprised that the new Members on both sides of the House have been assiduous in their attendance in other debates, it is very sad that they are not attending this debate because it is about the quality of scrutiny and their role as Members of Parliament throughout their time in the House. Anyone listening to the debate or who reads the report of it will learn quite a bit about those issues from the enormous amount of experience that Members, such as the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), have had in trying to tease out such issues.

Mr. Hogg: In a sense, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will agree that what the debate illustrates is that the political parties have been captured by their Front Benchers. Until political parties recover power from their Front Benchers, in truth, this Parliament is but a rubber stamp.

Mark Fisher: I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that I wholly agree with him on that. That will be burden of my remarks, which I hope will be brief to give other hon. Members the opportunity to speak. I had not realised that the debate was time limited, and I will endeavour to be very brief.

The hon. Member for Buckingham had an interesting exchange with my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) about the relative relevance to the debate of Lewis Carroll and Franz Kafka. Although it was amusing and enjoyable to hear their literary expertise displayed, both of them were right to suggest that both those authors' books show a nightmare vision of a world turned upside down. That is what we are seeing in the House at the moment.

As the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham said, we are fast becoming a House that rubber-stamps political parties. It is hardly surprising that the public have less and less respect for the House and, indeed, for politics generally when the idea of independent parliamentarians is in such decline. That is what the debate is about, and it is why analogies to the bleak and serious vision of the world of both Lewis Carroll and Franz Kafka are very good to draw.

Given the shortage of time, I will not go into the details of the debate—the method of selection for membership, the pay of Chairmen and so on—important though they are. They are emblematic of a number of issues, and it has been a good, interesting and experienced debate on them. The Father of the House put the whole issue in a wider context in his contribution about the importance of Select Committees; their role in scrutiny, as the hon. Member for Buckingham has said; and, crucially, their independence. That is what we should be debating, and we have been doing so this afternoon.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) said in a characteristic, intelligent, very gentle and courteous speech that his criteria for determining whether this dispensation of Select Committees has achieved greater independence was that there are no ex-Ministers, where it has succeeded; that minor parties should be well represented, where it has also succeeded, and that the awkward squad on both sides of the House should be represented. He cited my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), who is certainly a fully paid-up member of the awkward squad, but he did not mention my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who has made a particular and professional contribution to our debates on science and technology, as most hon. Members realise, yet amazingly is not among those selected. It might be said that this dispensation is a marginal improvement on previous dispensations of Select Committees members, but the fact of the matter is that the thumbprints of those on the Front Benches are as evident as they have ever been, albeit in a marginally different way.

Much as I respect the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire, he should have set tougher criteria to judge whether the way in which the Select Committees were chosen was truly independent. We should not judge the independence of individual hon. Members, but whether this generation of Select Committees will be fearlessly independent of the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich rightly said that one way in way such independence could be indicated would be if Committees were able to choose their own Chairs. She chided me for what I suggest was calculated naiveté, but Committee members do have such a power in their grasp. On the first day that the Committees meet, their members can choose their own Chairs. I doubt whether they will do that, but they should. If they do not, they must recognise that they are simply being directed by their Front Benches.

Why should the Chairman of the Modernisation Committee be a member of the Government? It is outrageous for any Committee that is set up to scrutinise the Government independently to have any Government Ministers on it, let alone the Committee that discusses the whole future of the Chamber and the House. That has nothing to do with the Government because this is our House. The Executive have their own role and function in our constitution, but it is not running the business of the House.

We should have more Joint Committees with the other place, although only one is being selected today. Both the other place and this House are set up to scrutinise the Government. We have complementary roles and interests, so Joint Committees are an important part of the process. Too often Members of our House and the other place see themselves as being in competition, but that is wholly in the interest of the Executive because it gives them an easy time. Scrutiny of the Government should be parliamentary scrutiny—not scrutiny by the Commons or the Lords, but by Parliament. When we scrutinise the actions of the Executive, it is in the interests of rigour and the good name of Parliament to work together.

The most crucial criterion that should be used to judge the independence of Select Committees is the fundamental question of who runs the business of the House. That will not be determined by the Select Committees, so we should have a business Committee, as the Scottish Parliament does. The Government should of course be represented on such a Committee because they have an absolute right to the time that they need to get through the programme for which they have a mandate, but the idea that they should dictate when the House sits, what it debates and when we debate it is absolute nonsense. That is not the business of the Government. The Government's business is to run the country and to suggest taxation and action programmes, but it is not to run either of the Houses of Parliament. Until we have a business Committee through which we take responsibility for our own business, we will always be ciphers. We understandably lost that ability in the late 19th century due to the astute parliamentary work of Mr. Charles Parnell, but we must regain it if we are to regain our independence.

Mr. Hogg: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman on one matter. He says that the Government have an absolute right to get through their mandated business, but they do not. The fact that something is in a manifesto does not give a Government an overwhelming right, and in any event, they must allow sufficient time for discussion.

Mark Fisher: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is quite right. What I intended to say is that the Government—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I wonder whether we could confine our remarks to Select Committees and the matters on the Order Paper.

Mark Fisher: Of course, Madam Deputy Speaker. I shall just correct myself. I meant to say that Government have the right to the time to try to get their business through. I accept your admonition and I shall draw my remarks to a close so that other hon. Members can contribute.

It is very sad that there are so few new Members in the House, but it is to the credit of the new Member who is here that he is listening to this debate. We have to decide whether we are parliamentarians or just simply representatives of our political parties. Obviously, we are both. That interesting paradox is inherent in our roles, and it leads to many good conclusions. However, we must remember that we are parliamentarians as well as representatives of our parties.

During the last Parliament I took part in an extraordinary radio debate with another member of the parliamentary Labour party. That person, when asked by the interviewer whether they were a parliamentarian, was outraged and said, "I am not a parliamentarian; I am a Labour Member of Parliament. I am sent here to vote for the Government, not to think for myself and be a parliamentarian." That Member was outraged by the idea that they should be considered anything other than a Labour Member of Parliament who voted with the Government 100 per cent. of the time. Therein lies our problem.

Of course Members on both sides of the House want to be loyal to the party of which many of us have been members for 20 or 30 years—or, in my case, over 40—but we are here to scrutinise Government as Members of Parliament as well. If we do not stand up and shake off the shackles of our Front Benches during this Parliament, we will lose yet more years and yet more independence. These are very important issues. This Parliament must assert our distinct identity—our role is different from that of the Executive—and we do so particularly through these Select Committees. We will vote these motions through tonight, and I hope that when the Select Committees operate, they bear it in mind that they have a sacred role in the independent, rigorous scrutiny of Government policy.

4.57 pm

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): I want to make one point, which, given the time that we have left, I hesitate to dwell on. I would be grateful if the Minister elaborated on the term limits for Chairmen. As a new Member, I am still not entirely clear on exactly the period that one can serve. We need to clarify when in a Parliament that period starts so that we are clear about the exact time that someone can serve.

That point highlights another contradiction in a number of the motions: the concept of having term limits for Chairmen and paying members of the Chairmen's Panel. On the latter motion, one of the arguments for paying Standing Committee Chairmen was that with time served in the House came experience and wisdom. If that is true, it seems a little foolish artificially to limit the period for which one can serve as a Chairman of a Select Committee, as it would seem that the same argument should apply to the wisdom and experience gained in that role over time.

The main point that I want to make concerns the importance of scrutiny in the House. The hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) said that it was incredibly important that the House took scrutiny seriously. It is true, I think, and it may be sad—the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said that it was disappointing—that Members of the House are not prepared to take on duties and chair Standing Committees. We may have to accept that if the House is to take scrutiny seriously, we need to provide an alternative career structure for Members, one in which they can come into the House and see chairing a Select Committee or Standing Committees and taking part in the business of the House as something that they want to do as a career rather than necessarily wanting to achieve a position in government.

It may be that, in the past, people were willing to do that without remuneration, but it seems from remarks that I have heard from experienced and distinguished Members that that is less true nowadays. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) that it may, sadly, be necessary to pay people to be Committee Chairman to enable sufficient Members of sufficient calibre to take on those tasks and allow scrutiny to take place.

I will draw my remarks to a close because I would like to allow a couple of minutes in this time-limited debate for my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and for the Minister to wind up. I have enjoyed listening to hon. Members, and it is a shame that more new Members were not present to listen to some distinguished speeches.

5 pm

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper). I will be extremely brief, for reasons that are obvious.

I draw the House's attention to motion 33 on Modernisation of the House of Commons. The House has talked about scrutiny; the whole process is about scrutiny. At the heart of scrutiny is this Chamber. When Members vote for this motion, I ask them to reflect on the fact that among those appointed to the Committee is one Mr. Geoffrey Hoon. Mr. Geoffrey Hoon is a Minister; he is the Leader of the House. That illustrates best the way in which this Chamber and this Parliament are controlled. The Modernisation Committee is no more an independent Committee than a fly in the air. That is the truth of the matter.

The restrictions and the motions, to the disadvantage of the Procedure Committee, which has been sidelined by so many of them, originated in the Modernisation Committee. This House should look very carefully at what the Modernisation Committee does. The reason why we have been reduced to systematic guillotining of Bills originated in the Modernisation Committee. The Committee that we shall vote for in a moment has been the instrument by which the Government have seized total control over the timetabling of business, and this House can stand for or represent very little if we cannot unpick that which is brought before us in the form of motions, orders and Bills.

I draw to the attention of the House the fact that a Minister of the Crown who is responsible for the business of this House constructs and has constructed the very motions on the Order Paper that many Members present have resented, argued against and tried to bring to the sense of a wider House. This House is nothing unless it stems from ourselves. As I have always said, we are temporary Members of this House, but we are passing on very much a diminished inheritance. Yet, there is value in Select Committees and the value afforded by expressing those views on the Floor of the House is all too often lost because of the work of the Modernisation Committee.

5.2 pm

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): It is a particular pleasure to respond to the debate, because it has been both well-informed and broadly good-natured. I know that some mock modernisation in this place, but I was one of the Members who, for the first three months on being elected, did not have a desk or a phone but had a place to hang my sword. Many Members went through that experience, so there have certainly been improvements.

I welcome the broad support that has been offered to us by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), the shadow Leader of the House, and I will cover his points first and then embrace some of the other points made and answer some of the questions that have been put to me.

The proposal to remunerate Chairmen of Standing Committees has been advocated by the Senior Salaries Review Body. Its report advocated a two-tier panel, with higher payments, but did not find fault with the proposed tiered structure of payments if that was the wish of the House. It agreed with the principle of linking pay to workload, which is why we have done so. Apprenticeships were mentioned disparagingly, and it was said that they did not apply to ministerial positions. In fact, they do—we have junior Ministers and Parliamentary Under-Secretaries, Ministers of State and Cabinet Ministers. Those three levels of responsibility are reflected in three different levels of pay.

The House will wish to examine the code of conduct for Chairmen of Standing Committees, and I hope that the Standards and Privileges Committee has a chance to look at it. In response to the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell, 1 November has been set as an implementation date, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman missed that.

A number of hon. Members raised the proposal that a member of the Chairmen's Panel should serve on the Liaison Committee. That Committee, however, is relatively political. By contrast, the Chairmen of Standing Committees are entirely neutral, as are the Speaker and the Deputy Speakers. I am therefore not sure that their involvement in the Liaison Committee is appropriate.

The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who has considerable experience of the House and its procedures, suggested that there is no incompatibility between membership of the Chairmen's Panel and the work of the Liaison Committee, but I do not share that view. The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell spoke about the two-term rule, and a number of colleagues asked for clarification. There is consensus that Select Committee Chairmen should serve for no more than two terms. We must, however, look at recent circumstances to understand why the eight-year rule was introduced. A Select Committee Chairman who was appointed in 1970 would serve until the end of the Parliament in 1974. If they were reappointed by the will of the House for the Parliament of February to October 1974, without the eight-year rule, they would then complete their two terms of office. With the rule, however, they would go on to serve for a further four years in the next Parliament until 1978, before handing over to their successor. A number of hon. Members said Select Committee Chairmen should complete their term of office only when a Parliament ended. Previous Speakers have chosen to hand over to their successor before a Parliament ends so that the new Speaker can gain experience in the Chair. Select Committee members—I accept that they are the individuals who are most likely to become Select Committee Chairmen—may have distinguished service, but they do not necessarily have experience of chairmanship.

I shall give another example to demonstrate how far the elastic band of time can stretch. If a Committee Chairman was selected in 1981, two years after the Conservative Government had been elected, they could, if it were the will of the House, serve the full term from 1993 to 1997 and then from 1997 to 2001, making a total of 11 years' service. We therefore hope that the House will agree with the important principle behind our proposals.

Mr. Harper: The Minister's example illustrates why some Members are confused. It would be straightforward to set a limit of two terms or eight years, whichever was the greater, but it makes no sense and is very confusing if someone who is selected to chair a Select Committee part way through a Parliament can get those extra few years, in addition to another two terms. If we are to have a rule, it should be two terms or eight years, whichever is the greater, or the proposal from the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), whereby the term of appointment runs through to the end of the Parliament. It should not depend on the randomness of the date on which the Chairman was selected.

[Mr. Harper]

In his opening speech the Leader of the House used the phrase "by chance" a great deal. We should have more certainty in our proceedings, rather than leaving them to chance.

Nigel Griffiths: The House is rather good at learning from experience. I have set out how the motion would have worked historically. I hope that it commands the support of the House, and that the House would not want to axe a Member who had not had the chance to benefit from two full terms or, as in the example that I gave from 1992, unnecessarily curtail the Member's term of service to the Committee.

Andrew Mackinlay: My hon. Friend's 1974 scenario does not stack up. After a short Parliament, the new Parliament could, with unanimity, revise Standing Orders to meet that set of circumstances. It would disregard the previous Parliament. I have to say to my hon. Friend, "Come off it.". He is struggling to use the 1974 case as an argument.

Nigel Griffiths: I am sorry that I have not convinced my hon. Friend. I did not think I was struggling to use the example as an argument. The term limitation on Chairmen of Select Committees is designed to stop people, no matter how competent, being appointed almost in perpetuity, or as long as they are Members of the House. That is why we are trying to lay down rules which, I believe, will work to the advantage of the House and are fairly simple and straightforward, but give the flexibility that a common-sense approach would allow.

Let me move on to some of the other issues that were raised. The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell raised the time taken to set up Select Committees and compared that to 2001, but it is not a fair comparison. Since I was appointed Deputy Leader of the House, I have tried to avoid hurtful phrases, so I shall say that the result this time for the hon. Gentleman's party was less disastrous than in 2001. It necessitated at least three changes to the way in which we approached Select Committees. There have been negotiations between the parties on the size of the Select Committees. There have been discussions about which party should seek to have its Members chairing certain Select Committees, and how many Select Committees it is fair for each party to chair. That has been the subject of tough negotiation—

It being four and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

ADMINISTRATION COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That Standing Orders Nos. 139 (Select Committee on Broadcasting) and 142 (Domestic Committees) be repealed and the following be a Standing Order of the House:

"Administration Committee

(1) There shall be a select committee, to be called the Administration Committee, to consider the services provided for and by the House and to make recommendations thereon to the House of Commons Commission or to the Speaker. Any such recommendation whose implementation would incur additional expenditure charged to the Estimate for House of Commons: Administration shall also be considered by the Finance and Services Committee.

(2) The committee shall make rules and give directions to Officers of the House in respect only of such administrative matters as may from time to time be determined by the Speaker or by the House of Commons Commission.

(3) The committee shall consist of not more than 16 Members, of whom five shall be a quorum.

(4) The committee shall have power—

(a) to send for persons, papers and records, to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House, to adjourn from place to place, and to report from time to time;

(b) to appoint specialist advisers either to supply information which is not readily available or to elucidate matters of complexity within the committee's order of reference; and

(c) to communicate its evidence to the House of Commons Commission.

(5) The committee shall have power to appoint sub-committees and to refer to such sub-committees any of the matters referred to the committee and to delegate to such sub-committees any of the powers delegated to the committee under paragraph (2) above.

(6) Any such sub-committee shall have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House, and to adjourn from place to place, to report from time to time the minutes of their proceedings, and shall have a quorum of three.

(7) The committee and any sub-committee appointed by it shall have the assistance of the Officers of the House appropriate to the matters under consideration.

(8) Unless the House otherwise orders, each Member nominated to the Committee shall continue to be a member of it for the remainder of the Parliament.".

MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put the remaining Questions necessary to dispose of the business to be concluded at that hour.

FINANCE AND SERVICES COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That Standing Order No. 144 (Finance and Services Committee) be amended

(a) in line 6, by leaving out from the first 'for' to 'for' in line 7 and inserting 'House of Commons: Administration';

(b) in line 10, by leaving out 'Departments of the House' and inserting 'HouseAdministration'; and

(c) by leaving out lines 14 to 16 and inserting 'the Administration Committee'.—[Mr. Coaker.]

TERM LIMITS FOR CHAIRMEN OF SELECT COMMITTEES

Motion made, and Question put,

That Standing Order No. 122A (Term limits for chairmen of select committees) shall be amended by leaving out 'choose' and inserting 'have'.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Pay for Chairmen of Standing Committees

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House—

(1) takes note of the Report of the Review Body on Senior Salaries on Pay for Standing Committee Chairmen in the House of Commons presented to Parliament on 6th July (Cm 6566); and

(2) expresses the opinion that—

(a) with effect from 1st November 2005, the salary of a Member should be higher by the amount specified in sub-paragraph (b) than the figure determined in accordance with the provisions of the Resolution of the House of 10th July 1996 in respect of any period during which the Member has been nominated by the Speaker to act as a temporary chairman of committees in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order No. 4 (Chairmen's Panel) ('a member of the Panel'), other than to the extent that the provisions of sub-paragraph (d) apply;

(b) for a Member who has served on the Panel for less than one year, the additional amount should be £2,615; for a Member who has served on the Panel for at least one year but less than three years, the additional amount should be £7,340; for a Member who has served on the Panel for at least three years and less than five years, the additional amount should be £9,960; and for a Member who has served on the Panel for at least five years, the additional amount should be £13,107; and for the purposes of this sub-paragraph length of service should include membership of the Panel before 1st November 2005 and should be calculated irrespective of breaks in service;

(c) a period should begin for the purpose of sub-paragraph (a) on the day on which the Member is appointed to the Panel, or on 1st November 2005, whichever is the later; and end on the day on which the Member ceases to be a member of the Panel;

(d) there should be disregarded for the purpose of sub-paragraph (a) any period in respect of which the Member is receiving additional payment as Chairman of a Select Committee;

(e) the provisions of paragraph (2) of the Resolution of the House of 10th July 1996 relating to Members' Salaries (No. 2) should apply, with effect from 1st April 2006, to a salary determined in accordance with sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) as they apply in relation to a salary determined in accordance with the provisions of that Resolution; and

(f) the Speaker should have authority to interpret these provisions.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Amendment proposed: in line 15, leave out from 'than' to 'the' in line 21 and insert

'two years, the additional amount should be £7,340 and for a Member who has served for more than two years'.—[Mr. Forth.]

Pay for Chairmen of Standing Committees (No. 2)

Resolved,

That the following provision shall be made with respect to the salaries of Members of this House—

(a) with effect from 1st November 2005, the salary of a Member shall be higher by the amount specified in sub-paragraph (b) than the figure determined in accordance with the provisions of the Resolution of the House of 10th July 1996 in respect of any period during which the Member has been nominated by the Speaker to act as a temporary chairman of committees in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order No. 4 (Chairmen's Panel) ('a member of the Panel'), other than to the extent that the provisions of sub-paragraph (d) apply;

(b) for a Member who has served on the Panel for less than one year, the additional amount shall be £2,615; for a Member who has served on the Panel for at least one year but less than three years, the additional amount shall be £7,340; for a Member who has served on the Panel for at least three years and less than five years, the additional amount shall be £9,960; and for a Member who has served on the Panel for at least five years, the additional amount shall be £13,107; and for the purposes of this sub-paragraph length of service shall include membership of the Panel before 1st November 2005 and shall be calculated irrespective of breaks in service;

(c) a period should begin for the purpose of sub-paragraph (a) on the day on which the Member is appointed to the Panel, or on 1st November 2005, whichever is the later; and end on the day on which the Member ceases to be a member of the Panel;

(d) there shall be disregarded for the purpose of sub-paragraph (a) any period in respect of which the Member is receiving additional payment as Chairman of a Select Committee;

(e) the provisions of paragraph (2) of the Resolution of the House of 10th July 1996 relating to Members' Salaries (No. 2) shall apply, with effect from 1st April 2006, to a salary determined in accordance with subparagraphs (a) and (b) as they apply in relation to a salary determined in accordance with the provisions of that Resolution; and

(f) the Speaker shall have authority to interpret these provisions.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Pay for Chairmen of Select Committees

Motion made, and Question put,

That this House expresses the opinion that, with immediate effect, the resolution of the House of 30th October 2003 relating to Pay for Chairman of Select Committees (No. 2) should be amended in paragraph (1) by leaving out "or the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments" and inserting "the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, the Administration Committee, the Finance and Services Committee, the Liaison Committee, the Procedure Committee, the Committee of Selection or the Committee on Standards and Privileges".

PAY FOR CHAIRMEN OF SELECT COMMITTEES (NO. 2)

Resolved,

That, with immediate effect, the resolution of the House of 30th October 2003 relating to Pay for Chairman of Select Committees (No. 2) shall be amended in paragraph (1) by leaving out "or the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments" and inserting "the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, the Administration Committee, the Finance and Services Committee, the Liaison Committee, the Procedure Committee, the Committee of Selection or the Committee on Standards and Privileges".

CHAIRMEN'S PANEL

Ordered,

That Standing Order No. 4 (Chairman's Panel) be amended by leaving out the words ", for every session," in line 1.

JOINT ACTIVITIES WITH THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY FOR WALES

That Standing Order No. 137A (Select Committees: power to work with other committees) be amended, in line 23, at the end, by adding the words—

'(3) The Welsh Affairs Committee may invite members of any specified committee of the National Assembly for Wales to attend and participate in its proceedings (but not to vote).'.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Standards and Privileges

6.17 pm

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the Fourth Report of the Committee on Standards and Privileges, Session 2004–05 (House of Commons Paper No. 472), and approves the revised Code of Conduct set out in the Annex to the Report.

Motion 41 is the first of four motions before us in this debate. The House approved the original code of conduct and guide to the rules on 24 July 1996. A slightly revised code of conduct and substantially changed guide to the rules were approved by the House on 14 May 2002. In 2002, the Committee on Standards in Public Life recommended that in each Parliament the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards should initiate a review of the code of conduct and guide to the rules. That was endorsed by the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges and supported in a debate in the House on 26 June 2003.

The commissioner therefore conducted a review last year, consulting all Members of the House, and made recommendations for some modest changes to the code to the Standards and Privileges Committee. The principal changes that he recommended are, first, the addition of provisions to make clearer the purpose and scope of the code; secondly, the inclusion of new statements of Members' duties in respect of the commissioner and the Standards and Privileges Committee, implementing recommendations made by the Committee on Standards in Public Life; and, thirdly, the extension of the existing provisions regarding misuse of parliamentary allowances to misuse of facilities and services provided by the House.

The Committee on Standards and Privileges endorsed all the changes proposed by the commissioner and added another: that there should be added to the principle set out in the code that Members have a public duty to uphold the law, the words "including the general law against discrimination".

Those changes have been incorporated in the proposed new code of practice printed in the annexe to the report, which the House is being asked to approve today.

I believe that the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), who chaired the Committee in the last Parliament, will speak in the debate and explain the background to the proposed changes in greater detail—although I hope in not too great a detail.

One of the Committee's recommendations is not reflected in the motions before us. In paragraph 20, the Committee supports the commissioner's recommendation that the House should consider whether the Director of Finance and Administration, the Serjeant at Arms and other relevant House authorities should henceforth have an obligation to refer to the commissioner for investigation under the code the more significant instances of misuse that come independently to their attention, particularly where there is prima facie evidence of deliberate abuse. The Committee recommended that the House should take a decision in principle on that proposal when it considered the proposed new code. It would be a significant change, with potentially serious implications for the relationship between the Officers of the House and its Members. The recommendation requires further consultation and would be better taken forward separately. The Committee recognised that the recommendation was free-standing and therefore capable of independent consideration. I welcome the views of right hon. and hon. Members, and as ever I will listen carefully to what the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire may say on that point.

Motion 42 amends Standing Order No. 150, in line with paragraphs 15 and 17 of the Committee's report, introducing a new, simplified procedure for dealing with some cases of misuse of parliamentary allowances, facilities or services. With the agreement of the Member concerned, the commissioner will be able to exercise discretion to refer such cases to the relevant Officer of the House to secure appropriate reimbursement. Provided that the process is completed in a reasonable time scale, there will be no need for the commissioner to report to the Committee. That represents a useful extension to the rectification procedure in respect of inadvertent or minor failures to register or declare interests.

Motion 43 makes two tidying amendments to Standing Order No. 149, which provides the order of reference for the Committee on Standards and Privileges. It reduces the size of the Committee from 11 members to 10 following the agreement made in the previous Parliament that these should be a gradual movement towards a Committee of 10 in which no party had overall control, as recommended by the Committee on Standards in Public Life.

The order also removes the requirement that the Committee appoint a sub-committee specifically to receive reports from the commissioner relating to investigations into specific complaints. In practice, the Committee has never adopted that approach and if it wished to do so in future its general power to appoint sub-committees would allow that to happen.

Motion 44 nominates 10 members of the Committee. The House will be grateful to those Members for their willingness to serve on the Committee, which is a responsible and often thankless task, but very important to the integrity and standing of the House. I commend the motions.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I echo and support the words of the Leader of the House. This is a sensible set of motions. I offer my thanks to my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) for the work that he and his Committee did on this subject in the previous Parliament. The House should also thank the commissioner for his work in putting together the proposed new code. Beyond that, I have nothing to add except that the motions have the support of my colleagues and I, and I look forward to hearing comments and explanation from my right hon. Friend.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I do not need to detain the House for very long either. Having had the pleasure of serving on the Committee on Standards and Privileges in the previous Parliament under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), I want to put on record my appreciation of his chairmanship, which was exemplary, and of the work of colleagues on the Committee. As the Leader of the House said, it is a responsible but often thankless task. Members are happy to undertake it on behalf of the House, but on occasions we should recognise the difficult decisions that they have to take and the careful consideration that they must give to matters brought to their attention—along with the work of the Parliamentary Commissioner. In addition, I strongly support the proposed extension of the rectification procedure.

As I said in a previous debate, the Committee on Standards in Public Life was right to recommend that not only should the Committee on Standards and Privileges do its work fairly, impartially and well, but that we should ensure that that impression is given to the outside world. The minor changes to the composition of the Committee—reducing the size so that there is no in-built Government majority, ensuring representation of the minority parties, in the form of the representative of Plaid Cymru in the previous Parliament as well as in this if the proposal goes through, and ensuring that Parliamentary Private Secretaries and Front-Bench Opposition spokesmen are not represented—add to the regard with which the Committee is likely to be held by those who look at its proceedings. That is right and proper, and I would recommend it to the House. I look forward to hearing what the former Chairman—and, I hope, the future Chairman—of the Standards and Privileges Committee says about the proposals.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I am grateful for right hon. and hon. Members' kind words about the work of the Standards and Privileges Committee in the last Parliament and for what they said about the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards. I welcome the opportunity to speak briefly in our debate.

The report that we are debating is temporarily orphaned, as the Committee that produced it in March this year is no more and its successor will not be set up until after the end of this debate. I am grateful to the Leader of the House for bringing the matter before the House quickly, as the Committee recommended in the last Parliament, so that the new code can come into force as early as possible in this Parliament. This evening, I am prepared to act as a foster parent. The review, as the Leader of the House said, is the first major review of the code since it was first introduced in 1996. Its genesis lies in the recommendation by the Committee on Standards in Public Life, accepted by the House in a debate in June 2003, that the code and the guide to the rules be reviewed once every Parliament.

A substantially revised guide was approved by the House in May 2002, following an extensive inquiry by the Committee and its predecessor, but before the Committee on Standards in Public Life made its recommendation. In July 2004, the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards initiated a consultation on the revision of the code. In February this year, he submitted proposals for a revised code to the Committee. On behalf of the previous Committee, I thank the Commissioner for the substantial and thorough work that went into that exercise. As the Committee reported, it was clear from responses to the consultation that there was no general feeling, either inside or outside the House, that the code required major revision. As the Committee said in its report, that is a welcome demonstration that "the code continues to achieve the objectives for which it was created in the first place."

It is therefore not surprising that the commissioner recommended no great changes, and that the Committee was happy to accept all his proposals.

The principal changes in the proposed new code, which brings a welcome overall enhancement to the clarity and focus of the code on the issues that matter, include new statements on Members' duties from the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards and the Committee on Standards and Privileges, and the implementation of recommendations by the Committee on Standards in Public Life. They also include the extension of existing provisions on the misuse of parliamentary allowances to the misuse of facilities and services provided by the House. It is right in principle that the misuse of House resources, whether in cash or in kind, should be treated in the same way. The Committee gave careful consideration to the inclusion of a non-discrimination provision in the proposed new code. Such provisions are commonly included in professional codes of practice, and the Committee decided to include one. I believe that it has done so effectively and in a way that will not impose additional burdens on Members.

When considering the new code, the Committee was anxious to ensure that its proposals were proportionate to the regulatory need, and that it should not seek to increase unnecessarily the regulatory burden on Members, which some already find irksome. Nor did it wish to increase the burden on the commissioner for no good purpose. In recommending an extension to the scope of the code to include the misuse of facilities and services, we therefore recommended that the present arrangements for investigating such matters continue to be used as far as possible, but under the oversight of the commissioner. Those arrangements appear to work well and to command general confidence in the House, so we saw no need to change them for the sake of it.

The Committee recommended a procedure whereby the Commissioner could, if appropriate, dispose of certain cases by referring them to the relevant Officer of the House to secure suitable financial reimbursement rather than making a report to the Committee. In a deregulatory move, the Committee recommended that such a procedure should be available in misuse of allowances cases. That is not possible under the existing code.

Speaking personally, I would like to see further deregulatory moves, consistent with proper accounting for public funds. In the House we recognise the importance of a deregulated environment for those whom we represent, while putting more regulation on ourselves. I am not sure which body is the appropriate forum to take this agenda forward, but I detect an appetite for it in the House. I am pleased to see that the Government have tabled motions that will enable the two recommendations to which I referred a moment ago to be implemented.

The Committee also set out a principle which I hope is not contentious—that what happens to a Member should depend on the severity or otherwise of the offence, rather than on the route by which it is uncovered. In principle, we argue that there should be a level playing field. I recognise, as did the Committee, that the proposal in the Committee's report—which, as the Leader of the House said, we are not being asked to deal with today—that Officers of the House should, in some circumstances, report evidence of apparent misuse to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards raises sensitive issues around Members' relationship with those Departments, and that how the level playing field might be brought about in practice may require, as the Leader of the House said, further consultation.

I am happy with that, and I hope that such discussion or consultation could take place in the context of acceptance of the underlying principle that the seriousness of the matter should be the paramount consideration. That can only enhance public confidence in our regulatory arrangements. Handling all serious cases in the same manner, no matter how they arise, will also mean that the procedural safeguards and protection for Members inherent in the procedures overseen by the Committee would be available to all Members concerned.

We made good progress in the last Parliament in building public confidence in the regulatory framework, and in self-regulation in particular. As Peter Riddell, chief political correspondent of The Times, stated in a recent review of the first 10 years of the Committee on Standards in Public Life,

"The revamped system of Commons self-regulation and disclosure is now operating pretty well".

I am sure the new Committee will want to build on that record. In the last Parliament, the commissioner and the Committee rightly emphasised education and prevention, and I was pleased to see the extensive briefings on standards matters offered to new Members. The proposed new code strengthens in a proportionate way the expectations of both the House and the public as regards Members' conduct, and I commend the motions to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards

Ordered,

That Standing Order No. 150 (Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards) be amended by leaving out paragraph (3) and inserting the following—

'(3) No report shall be made by the Commissioner:

(a) in any case where the Member concerned has agreed that he has failed to register or declare an interest, if it is the Commissioner's opinion that the interest involved is minor, or the failure was inadvertent, and the Member concerned has taken such action by way of rectification as the Commissioner may have required within any procedure approved by the Committee for this purpose; and

(b) in any case involving parliamentary allowances, or the use of facilities or services, if the Commissioner has with the agreement of the Member concerned referred the matter to the relevant Officer of the House for the purpose of securing appropriate financial reimbursement, and the Member has made such reimbursement within such period of time as the Commissioner considers reasonable.'—[Tony Cunningham.]

COMMITTEE ON STANDARDS AND PRIVILEGES

Ordered,

That Standing Order No. 149 (Committee on Standards and Privileges) be amended as follows—

(a) by leaving out 'eleven' in line 24 and inserting 'ten'; and

(b) by leaving out from 'committee;' in line 33 to the end of line 35.—[Tony Cunningham.]

STANDARDS AND PRIVILEGES (NOMINATION)

Ordered,

That Mr Kevin Barron, Angela Browning, Ben Chapman, Mr Andrew Dismore, Nick Harvey, Mr Brian Jenkins, Mr Elfyn Llwyd, Mr Andrew Mackay, Dr Alan Whitehead and Sir George Young be members of the Standards and Privileges Committee.—[Mr. Bob Ainsworth.]

PETITION

Exmouth (Development)

6.32 pm

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): Exmouth in my constituency is now the largest town in Devon. It is therefore only right that there should be a proper discussion about the town's future in order to revitalise the local economy, particularly in the light of the weekend's announcement that the university of Plymouth may be planning to relocate the remaining faculty at Rolle college to Plymouth.

There are many different views about what form the development should take, but there is considerable dismay among my constituents at the thought that Exmouth's most valuable asset, its waterfront along the estuary, might be developed. The 10,970 Exmouthians and visitors to Exmouth have signed a petition. The petition of Exmouth Citizens Forum and its supporters Declares that they are concerned at any proposed building on the Exmouth waterfront and along the Exmouth estuary.

The Petitioners therefore request that that the House of Commons takes note of their concerns.

To lie upon the Table.

Co-proxamol

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

6.34 pm

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): I am delighted to have the opportunity to call an Adjournment debate on the availability of co-proxamol, which is a mild analgesic that is used to treat those who have mild to moderate chronic pain. The debate stems from the advice that was given to general practitioners in January this year by the Committee on Safety of Medicines, which recommended that co-proxamol should be withdrawn entirely over the next six to 12 months.

I must declare an interest: I have been prescribed the drug, which I have used regularly for some years, and I take four co-proxamol a day. However, I am not here tonight because I use the drug and might be affected. I am here because a number of my constituents who use the drug contacted me when the withdrawal of co-proxamol was first announced in the press because they are worried about what might happen. When my constituent, Jonathan Russell, who has ankylosing spondylitis, came to one of my constituency surgeries, I began to take an even greater interest in the debate.

Jonathan has been taking co-proxamol, which he has found to be an effective response to his chronic condition. I have known him for a number of years in his professional capacity: he is a social worker who works with disabled people and gets them into employment and he leads an extremely active life. He contends that he can lead his busy life because of co-proxamol, which allows him a good night's sleep and also keeps him supple.

When Jonathan heard about the concerns associated with co-proxamol, he went to his GP, who took him off the drug. Over the past few months, he has tried various other drugs, which are supposed to be as good as, if not better than, co-proxamol, but he has told me that none of them are working. Indeed, some of the new drugs are making him feel very unwell and not allowing him to get the night's sleep that he requires, which is affecting his ability to work.

The desperation caused by his not feeling well and the fear that he can never return to co-proxamol drove Jonathan to seek an appointment with me and to complain. He is not the type of person who normally complains—he deals with a chronic condition extremely well and with an extremely cheery disposition. The effect that the withdrawal of co-proxamol has had on his life must be extremely serious for him to complain. He has learned to live with and manage his pain, which is the meaning of chronic pain, but he cannot do so without access to co-proxamol. The effects of the other drugs mean that he has been unable to loosen up in the morning and that he has been late into work. Indeed, he is afraid that he may have to give up work if he cannot continue to use what he regards as a mild, effective drug that has no side effects.

Why has the withdrawal of co-proxamol been proposed? Is it because the drug is ineffective? The answer appears to be, "No"—patients report that it is extremely effective. Is it because the drug has serious side effects? The answer is also, "No"—patients who use co-proxamol feel that out of all analgesics and other alternative drugs, whether they are COX-2 inhibitors or non-steroidal anti-inflammatories, it is the drug with the fewest side effects. Has co-proxamol been withdrawn because it increases the likelihood of a heart attack, a stroke or any other major health problem in the individual who is taking the drug? Again, the answer is "No"—the alternative drugs, which I shall discuss later are associated with a higher risk of such major health problems.

The reason why co-proxamol has been withdrawn, as was confirmed to me in a letter from the Secretary of State for Health, is that some people might abuse the drug and use it to commit suicide—not that the drug leads to people having suicidal impulses but that it is a mechanism for those who want to commit suicide. The Department of Health says that between 400 to 500 suicides a year are associated with co-proxamol, and that is why it has to take action.

Co-proxamol is quite different from most other drugs that have been withdrawn from the market. In those cases, there is usually an associated health risk for those who take the drug; in this case, the associated health risk is to those who may not have been prescribed the drug but take it in order to commit suicide or those who have been prescribed it but take it in overdose and therefore unconsciously or unwittingly commit suicide.

People who are on co-proxamol are aggrieved about the different approach that has been taken to that drug which means that they are losing an effective analgesic not because of anything that they do in terms of their behaviour or prescribing practices but because of what others might do. If that thinking was applied to all drugs, almost all would probably have to be taken off the market, because all drugs have some kind of associated risk; certainly, many opiates can be used to commit suicide.

Several years ago, we had the same debate about paracetamol. It is interesting that the advice that GPs have been given by the Committee on Safety of Medicines is that paracetamol, the drug that was controversial a few years ago, is just as effective as an analgesic. In medical terms, it might well be, but the people who use co-proxamol believe, from their own experience, that it is a superior drug. What is different about it is that it contains dextropropoxyphene, which can give people a high and be mildly addictive. It is probably that feeling of well-being that people get that makes them believe that it is a drug. But that is not a reason for withdrawing co-proxamol; many drugs, including opiates, will give people a sense of well-being.

The advice to GPs goes on to suggest that if paracetamol is not enough they should consider prescribing a non-steroidal anti-inflammatory such as ibuprofen. There have recently been reports about the risk factors inherent in ibuprofen. We also know that other non-steroidal anti-inflammatories can cause gastro-intestinal bleeds, so they are not risk-free drugs. If that is not enough, GPs are advised that perhaps they could think of prescribing dihydrocodeine, which is a very strong analgesic but has severe side effects—it makes people feel very sleepy and leads to constipation. The alternative drugs that are proposed to replace co-proxamol are not without associated side effects or risks.

The advice recognises that for some people none of this may work, and in such cases taking antidepressants such as amytriptyline is suggested. That is bizarre, because that class of drug is indicated in more suicide attempts than co-proxamol, since antidepressant drugs are generally used by those who may be more likely to have suicidal tendencies in the first place.

Why has it taken six months for us to get this far and have a debate in the House? It is probably because problems are only now beginning to appear. In some cases, patients who were on co-proxamol went to their GP, who prescribed something different and, six months later, they are realising that none of the alternative drugs work. That happened in the case of my constituent, Jonathan Russell. He has found that nothing else works. He has tried everything else and concluded that co-proxamol was the best drug for him.

The second group of patients comprises people such as me. I have not been to my GP but I know about the risks and that, at some point, I shall have to address the matter. However, that will be sometime in the future and I shall worry about it then. Many patients on co-proxamol may fall into that category. Perhaps some are not aware of what is going to happen. As time goes on and more practices determine their strategy on prescribing co-proxamol, that group, like my constituent Jonathan, will become more distressed.

People who are working in health are worried that not only co-proxamol is affected. If the suggestion had been that co-proxamol should be withdrawn from use, there would be less concern. However, many drugs that are used as alternatives to or alongside co-proxamol for chronic pain, especially the anti-inflammatories that are prescribed for people with arthritis, have large question marks over their use and the associated risks. Some have been withdrawn.

For example, the COX-2 inhibitors have proved remarkably effective in dealing with arthritic pain. Again, I speak from personal experience because I was on Vioxx. It was withdrawn and I went back on to co-proxamol. That was ironic because Vioxx was extremely effective and, when I took it, I did not need co-proxamol—as an anti-inflammatory, Vioxx reduced the pain and I did not need the analgesic effects of co-proxamol. Withdrawal of some of the COX-2 inhibitors has meant that people are more reliant than they had been on co-proxamol.

We must consider the exact risk that we ask patients to take. Almost all drugs have some associated risk and side effects, which can differ in different people. It is important that, when patients and GPs make decisions together on the most effective drugs for dealing with pain, they can make an informed choice. It should be up to them to weigh up the risks and benefits associated with their drug. If a drug is extremely effective, as the COX-2 inhibitors seemed to be, would patients be willing to put up with the associated increased risk of heart attack if they could be almost pain free for the next 20 years? Patients, with their doctors, should be allowed to make that informed choice.

Groups such as Arthritis Care have been keen to emphasise that informed choice. It is not a case of asking for all drugs to be available to all people at all times but of making a correct choice. I pay tribute to Arthritis Care. After I had applied for the Adjournment debate,

I realised that I needed a little more background information about what patient groups felt about the withdrawal of co-proxamol and whether the issue was more widespread than the case of my constituent. Arthritis Care has been extremely helpful in providing me with a great deal of background information.

Groups such as Arthritis Care do not ask for co-proxamol to be freely available. It recognises that the Committee on Safety of Medicines has to take account of the public health aspects of any drug's use and misuse. It has to take account of misuse, even by those who have not been prescribed the drug.

I am normally supportive of medical opinion. I am unlikely to go against informed medical opinion and it is therefore strange for me to be in the position of asking the Government to reconsider the advice from one of its committees, which has been established to provide such advice. I have always supported the work of the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, and I believe that we must have independent committees to consider these issues.

It is important that the Government look again at the prescribing arrangements for co-proxamol. Why should a person who lives alone and who takes four co-proxamols a day—which is well below a dangerous dose—be denied a drug with minimal side effects that he or she finds effective, just because other users cannot keep their drugs secure and might allow them to get into the hands of people who want to use them for the wrong reasons? There is a middle way. Arthritis Care does not necessarily want co-proxamol to be made available as a front-line drug. It would like GPs to be given the chance to find another suitable drug. If they cannot, however, it would like them to be able to prescribe co-proxamol, perhaps having sat down with the patient and provided a demonstration, either written or otherwise, to ensure that they are aware of the risks inherent in the drug, and of the risks involved if the drug is misused or left lying around.

Perhaps we could also consider changing the packaging of the drug, as was done with paracetamol. Co-proxamol is packaged in strips of 10 at the moment, which constitutes an overdose, whereas eight would be a safe dose. Perhaps we could consider packaging it in strips of eight. I hope that the Minister will take those suggestions on board.

In the past couple of days, I have noticed a difference in approach. In response to a media request, the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency has now said that "prescribers will be able to continue to prescribe co-proxamol on their own responsibility if the clinical need is justified."

That is not what patients are being told, however. The least that the Minister could do tonight would be to clarify the situation with regard to the availability of co-proxamol. Is it to be withdrawn completely? Is it to be available only while stocks last? Or will it continue to be available under certain conditions? If it is to continue to be available, that information needs to be well publicised. Organisations such as Arthritis Care which have large numbers of members who use co-proxamol will be delighted to have the issue clarified. There is confusion at the moment, and a great deal of distress in the wider community, and I hope that the Minister will be able to give us some reassurance tonight.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) on securing this debate. This is an important issue, and her questions on health and health care issues are always thoughtful and thought-provoking. I acknowledge that the relationship between a GP and a patient in relation to pain management is a very personal one. Each individual needs to describe how pain is affecting them personally, and the response can change from one person to another. As my hon. Friend has rightly said, this is also a very complex issue.

My hon. Friend has brought to our attention the concerns of her constituent, Jonathan Russell, about the withdrawal of co-proxamol. The Department has received about 130 letters from Members of Parliament writing on behalf of their constituents about this issue. My hon. Friend also mentioned Arthritis Care, and I would like to acknowledge the good work that that organisation does to support those who suffer from arthritis. It provides an experienced and knowledgeable voice on the issue of patients' rights, and also works with health professionals. The decision to withdraw co-proxamol was not an easy one to make and followed an extensive risk-benefit assessment, a wide public consultation and advice from the Committee on Safety of Medicines. The Government's independent scientific advisory committee on medicine safety also contributed, as did other experts.

Co-proxamol is a combination of a weak opiate painkiller with a relatively low dose of paracetamol and has been available since 1965, before the current system of medicines regulation existed. As a long-established medicine, it has not been subjected to modern standards of clinical research—clinical trials then were often either poorly designed or of very short duration and on the whole did not produce definitive results. As such there is a lack of evidence that co-proxamol is more effective than full-dose paracetamol. Despite the lack of evidence, many prescribers considered it to be a useful alternative to non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs such as ibuprofen and more potent opiates in situations in which paracetamol alone is ineffective.

On the other hand, the dangers of a co-proxamol overdose, especially when taken with alcohol, are well established and, I am afraid, cannot be ignored. Co-proxamol is involved in 300 to 400 self-poisoning deaths each year, of which around a fifth are accidental. Many deaths involve people taking co-proxamol that has not been prescribed to them. Co-proxamol can be very toxic, and overdose can occur with only a few tablets more than the recommended daily dose. Toxicity from co-proxamol overdose is extremely rapid compared with that from other pain-relieving medicines, so, sadly, victims often die before they reach hospital. Unlike paracetamol, there is no effective antidote to co-proxamol poisoning. Importantly, paracetamol is considered to have a comparatively good safety profile—the onset of toxic effects is slow, allowing more time for effective treatment.

Advice from the CSM aimed at the reduction of co-proxamol toxicity and fatal overdose dates back as early as 1985. You can therefore see, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the issue has been discussed for a considerable time. Sadly, this advice has not been effective in preventing the deaths that occur each year following a co-proxamol overdose. The growing concern was prompted by recently published UK research using data from the Office for National Statistics showing that co-proxamol alone now accounts for almost one fifth of drug-related suicides and is second only to tricyclic antidepressants as an agent of fatal drug overdose. Concerns have also been raised by Sweden in the European Parliament.

In light of the lack of evidence that co-proxamol is any more effective than full- dose paracetamol in pain management, and its high toxicity in overdose, the expert advice of the Committee on Safety of Medicines was sought. During 2004, the CSM comprehensively reviewed all the available evidence regarding the risks and benefits of co-proxamol. A public call for evidence on the risks and benefits of co-proxamol was also conducted for 12 weeks in 2004. The Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency wrote directly to a large number of organisations representing healthcare professionals, patient groups and other stakeholders as well as publishing the request for information on the MHRA website. Comments from patients and members of the public, as well as health care professionals, were welcomed. The CSM reviewed all the responses to this call for evidence and also international evidence on the safety of co-proxamol. During this review, the CSM noted that previously strengthened warnings to doctors and patients on the hazards of co-proxamol have unfortunately proved ineffective.

After considering the wide range of available evidence and the options for action to reduce the risk of overdose—for example, prescriber and patient education, smaller packet sizes and restricted indications, as my hon. Friend outlined—the CSM determined that the risks of co-proxamol outweighed the benefits of allowing the medicine to remain on the market. Following advice from the CSM, the MHRA has therefore agreed with the manufacturers to withdraw co-proxamol over an extended period of time in order to allow long-term users an opportunity to adopt suitable alternative pain management strategies. The CSM advised that the withdrawal of co-proxamol should be phased over a period of up to 36 months, or to an earlier timetable to be agreed with manufacturers. Most manufacturers have indicated that they intend to withdraw the drug over a period of approximately six to 12 months. A few have indicated that they wish to phase the withdrawal until the end of 2007.

Over that period, we expect to see the prescribing of co-proxamol decline as patients are moved to suitable alternatives. To help doctors find the best options for individual patients, the MHRA has issued CSM pain management guidance. Available data on sales at wholesale level suggest that the sale of co-proxamol is slowing down steadily. There has been as much as a 10 per cent. month-on-month decline since June 2004, and total supply has more than halved in the six months since the announcement was made. An article in the May edition of Pulse was authored by a GP who has reduced the number of patients in his care on co-proxamol from 438 to 20. That demonstrates that good GP care and discussing the various issues with patients can effect a change to an alternative that works.

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Caroline Flint: Sensitive discussion that takes into account all the options can effect a smooth transition to an alternative. However, the GP in question does acknowledge that, for a minority of his patients, other alternatives have not proved an option. However, a reduction from 438 to 20 is a significant one.

Miss Begg: To judge by what my hon. Friend said earlier, it appears that stocks will run out, so even for the minority who found co-proxamol the most effective remedy—they include my constituent—there will be an end date by which the drug will be completely off the market. Is that correct?

Caroline Flint: I will address that point shortly, as I want to clarify the situation for the minority of patients who have agreed with, in most cases, their GP that there is a clinical need to continue with the prescribing of co-proxamol.

Many local formularies, including in Northern Ireland, have already phased out co-proxamol altogether. It has been on the market for 40 years and it is clear that some patients have been established on this medicine for a long time, so I realise that the action that has been taken must be very distressing. The Department has received many letters from patients who are upset at its withdrawal. I have sympathy for them, but I am encouraged by the progress that has already been made in shifting to other forms of pain management. The decision to withdraw co-proxamol from the market has tested medicines regulation to the extreme. However, weighed against the difficulties caused to individual users is the clear public health gain in removing a medicine that has been widely implicated in accidental and non-accidental overdose.

At the end of the phased withdrawal, and following the cancellation or withdrawal of licences for existing products, provision will remain for the supply of unlicensed preparations. I understand that the drug will continue to be available on a named patient basis, and that the MHRA will communicate that fact clearly. Its doing so should deal with the question of supply, but I will check this point for my hon. Friend and I am happy to write to her about it.

Individual patient use of co-proxamol preparations could continue, with responsibility for such use falling primarily on the prescriber, who is usually the GP. In this way, where a clinical need exists and alternatives have proved unsuccessful, it will still be possible to prescribe co-proxamol, but in a more targeted way than in the past, and with a stronger focus on the risk-benefit judgment for the particular patient. I hope that that judgment will be reached through a strong relationship between patient and prescriber that establishes the patient's needs and their need to use this drug.

Miss Begg: In making a risk analysis and a public benefit analysis of the withdrawal of co-proxamol, will she also consider the following point, which she will probably be unable to deal with this evening? Those who previously used co-proxamol, and who were active and in work, might lose their job and be unable to work as a result of its withdrawal and their failing to find an equally effective alternative. My constituents' fear is that they will therefore be a burden on the state, instead of contributing to it.

Caroline Flint: It is important that all the alternatives are looked at. We need to ensure, in respect not just of co-proxamol but of other drugs, that GPs have the most up-to-date and most effective pain management care for their patients. Sometimes drugs become a matter of custom and practice, because it is the one thing that the general practitioner knows about, so he or she continues to prescribe it despite evidence that there are better alternatives. I understand what my hon. Friend is saying: I will reflect on what she said and write to her on that issue.

What I am saying this evening is that the primary issue is that we stand by the decisions made by the Committee on Safety of Medicines, while at the same time recognising that, for a minority who have gone through all the alternatives, there may be a clinical need to continue with the prescribing of co-proxamol.

Miss Begg: My hon. Friend is a Minister in the Department of Health, so the calculation may be done on health grounds, but there may be social costs to the withdrawal of the drug, which may not have been factored in with respect to the health costs of keeping the drug going. There could be costs to society if people fail to get an effective drug and co-proxamol is withdrawn.

Caroline Flint: I understand what my hon. Friend is saying. Yes, we have to weigh up all the different factors. However, the information that I provided earlier this evening about the impact of this particular drug on the number of people who die through either accidental or planned overdose is a very serious issue. I understand that all drugs have risks, but we face huge challenges that cannot be overcome through treatment if someone overdoses by accident. Some people, unfortunately, seek to commit suicide, but they may rethink that option if they have a chance of getting treatment—after being saved, as it were. That raises many questions about co-proxamol. From the evidence that I have seen, the option of having treatment, thereby saving life, is much reduced by the accidental or intentional use of this drug when it leads to an overdose. We have to take all those factors into consideration.

As I have already said, it is a complex issue that has focused the minds of many people in establishing what is the best thing to do. No one lightly takes removing a drug from the market when it has become part and parcel of how many people, whether they are in or out of work, cope with their daily lives. I referred earlier to an article in Pulse, which made it clear that GPs are engaging with patients in a sensitive way in planning the withdrawal of co-proxamol in favour of alternatives. The fact that there has been a decline, from 438 to 20, in the number of people who cannot deal with any alternative drug shows that progress can be made, although we must be mindful of the minority for whom alternative treatment may not be an option. There is a process that must be gone through but, as I said, GPs or prescribers retain the ability to prescribe co-proxamol.

I shall write to my hon. Friend about some of the issues that she has raised, and particularly about the question of stocks. Clearly, it is important to determine what the future holds for those people for whom co-proxamol is the only drug that can give them the relief that they need.

I welcome the opportunity to hold this debate. Sometimes, regulation must balance the preferences of the few with the needs of the many, but that is not to say that we do not take account of the individual requirements that my hon. Friend has expressed so ably. I hope that she and organisations such as Arthritis Care are reassured by my acceptance of the possibility that co-proxamol will continue to be prescribed where there is a clear clinical need because alternative treatments are unsuitable.

The Government are sensitive to the problem and accept that pain management is a complex matter. We expect health professionals to engage fully with patients on the range of drugs that are available to manage their pain, and we know that patients have considerable interest in complementary and alternative medicines for the management of pain.

The way forward is to ensure that the relationship between health professionals and patients is developed. It is not good enough for GPs or prescribers to sign off a patient on drugs for many years without any discussion of pain management. The relationship must be a progressive one: it may change with time, but both patient and prescriber must feel that they have attempted to make the best possible progress.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at ten minutes past Seven o'clock.

House of Commons

Thursday 14 July 2005

The House met a half-past Ten o'clock

PRAYERS

Speaker's Statement

Mr. Speaker: The House will know that today at noon the nation will remember those who died in London in the terrorist attacks. I regard it as appropriate that we should join the nation in observing the two-minute silence when the House will be sitting, and I will interrupt business accordingly. I should be grateful if those responsible for chairing Committees would also make appropriate arrangements. Instructions will be issued to heads of departments so that those members of staff who wish to observe the two-minute silence should be enabled to do so. The House will also wish to know that I have received very many expressions of sympathy and condolence from the Speakers and the presiding officers of other Parliaments in all parts of the world. I will place these in the Library for the information of all Members.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Dedicated Schools Grant

1. Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): If she will make a statement on the Government's plans for the dedicated schools grant. [11917]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): Our detailed proposals for the new dedicated schools grant were set out in the consultation document published in February on the proposed new school funding arrangements to be introduced from April 2006. We expect to announce our final decisions on the new arrangements shortly in the light of responses to the consultation.

Mr. Harper: Gloucestershire spends more on schools than the Government formula suggests. Can the Secretary of State assure me that once the transitional period is over the plans will not reduce the amount of funding that would otherwise have gone to our schools?

Ruth Kelly: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on championing the needs of schools in his constituency. It is right that schools in Gloucestershire as well as schools across the country continue to benefit from the substantial increases in funding from the Government. On the detail of the dedicated schools grant consultation, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools has consulted members of the F40 group, including Gloucestershire, and she will meet a delegation from the country to discuss that precise point.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): I thank the Secretary of State for that information. My schools welcome the three-year plans for budgets, particularly because in the past they have not received their annual budgets until July or August, which made budgeting extremely difficult. I spoke to the head teacher of Lethbridge primary school, Ray Norman, earlier this week—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. Member to change her tack? Her question to the Minister must be brief, so I can allow only a very short question.

Anne Snelgrove: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your kindness.

Can the Secretary of State reassure Lethbridge primary school that its revenue budget will allow it to make provisions for two hours' physical exercise and all the other initiatives that the Department is asking for, as well as the incredible—[Interruption.] I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker.

Ruth Kelly: I understand very well the points that my hon. Friend is making with such commitment. Schools need more funding, and they need to be able to introduce more school sports, particularly in the light of the recent announcement on the Olympic games. The dedicated schools grant will help all schools, because it allows them to plan with certainty on the basis of budgets that, for the first time, are set for three years. That stability is important for head teachers.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware that it is not just Gloucestershire that is affected; schools in Kent are concerned about the new funding system, and they are particularly worried that it will not be able to cope with the extra costs of work force reform. What reassurance can she give schools in Kent that have made representations to her that work force reform will be properly covered by the new funding formula?

Ruth Kelly: I have received representations from Kent about the implementation of planning, preparation and assessment time, which will come into force through legislation this September. Teachers have called for such a provision, and it is right that we make funding available to allow schools to plan for the coming years with predictability and certainty. That is the key to the dedicated schools grant. It is the very first time that a Government have been able to respond directly to requests from head teachers so that they have the certainty to allow them to plan, including for PPA time.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): When my right hon. Friend makes changes to the dedicated school grant, may I urge her not to use the current area cost adjustment methodology? Not only is it deeply flawed, but it disadvantages every pupil in Worcestershire.

Ruth Kelly: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the work that he has done in pursuing the case of Worcestershire, along with others in the F40 group. [Interruption.] I can hear my right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools making known her views on the issue from a sedentary position. She is familiar with schools in Worcestershire and their funding needs. My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) will have to be a little more patient until my right hon. Friend has the privilege of announcing the results of the consultation exercise. I hope my hon. Friend will not have to wait very long.

Careers Guidance

2. Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): What steps she is taking to improve the effectiveness of careers guidance and counselling. [11918]

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): We will set out our plans for improving information, advice and guidance for young people in the youth Green Paper, which will be published shortly.

Mr. Crabb: Is the Minister aware that despite the hard efforts of many careers advisers and other professionals, figures from her Department show that the number of 16-year-old males not in full-time education, employment or training has risen by a massive 68 per cent. since 1997, and that unemployment among 16 and 17-year-olds is at its highest since records began in 1992? I strongly urge the Minister to look again at the problem of youth inactivity and in so doing to utilise the skills and experience of organisations such as Fairbridge, Weston Spirit and the Prince's Trust, which have a far better track record in tackling social exclusion than her Department.

Beverley Hughes: As the hon. Gentleman knows, Connexions has met its target of returning to education, employment or training young people who were out of any of those three situations. There is a problem with statistics, in that the national statistics have been derived from different sets of data, and we are examining that. I believe the hon. Gentleman was quoting the national statistics. Connexions' statistics are derived from its own direct contact with young people and represent what it has achieved, but I accept that we need to make sure that the national data and Connexions data are aligned. That is a top priority for the Government and a key target that we are actively pursuing. We want every young person to be in education, employment or training, because that is how they will improve their life chances for the future.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): If the youth Green Paper appears before the recess, I hope the Minister will apologise for the months of delay, which have destabilised and undermined everyone involved in careers guidance and youth work. I know that she will not want to pre-empt her plans for the careers guidance service, but can she at least tell us that those plans will have two principles at their heart: first, that they will apply to everybody, so that all our young people will get quality careers guidance, which has not been the experience under Connexions; and secondly, that they will enshrine the principle of independent careers advice, which is so important to ensure that young people get the full range of choices open to them?

Beverley Hughes: I understand the expectation and anticipation in the various sectors as regards the Green Paper, but I will not apologise to the hon. Gentleman for the delay. We had a general election and it was important that we got the recommendations right. There is a great deal riding on the proposals in the Green Paper, and if not for the events of last week, it would probably have been published by now. I hope that nothing will come in the way of publication very shortly. The principles that the hon. Gentleman outlined are important to us. It is important that young people get impartial advice, that they can relate that advice to their experience in schools, that schools have some accountability for the advice, that it is as expert as possible, and that it is informed by the views and experience of employers. We have tried to bring all that into the recommendations that we will shortly produce.

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): When the Minister produces her plans later in the year, may I urge her to involve business more in careers guidance, and also to consider students with higher academic achievement? Connexions seems to have done a good job in some areas for those who are less academic, but not such a good job for those with higher academic achievement.

Beverley Hughes: I agree on the point about business. We want to ensure that that is built into the system. I know that employers and the CBI feel strongly about that, as do we. Young people should get a range of advice about all the academic, vocational and careers opportunities at an early stage, so that that can inform their curriculum choices. We are trying to achieve that. On Connexions more generally, it has done well with children with additional needs. That is undisputed. There are Connexions services that provide good information and advice, although I accept that the Ofsted picture is more variable on that front. We are trying to ensure that we build on the best of Connexions in what we produce.

Union Learning Fund

3. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): What assessment she has made of the work of the union learning fund in assisting women to improve basic skills. [11919]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): The union learning fund is a major success story. It has helped to train nearly 12,000 union learning representatives in more 3,000 workplaces, and it has brought more than 167,000 workers back into learning. The scheme increasingly engages women workers and helps them to improve their basic skills.

Gwyn Prosser: My hon. Friend shares my enthusiasm for the union learning fund's excellent work with non-traditional learners all over the country. Will he pay special tribute to the work of the GMB union, which is doing a grand job in the southern region training care workers from basic skills to NVQ2? What is he doing to ensure that the union learning fund provides equal opportunities for women, and what would be the impact of scrapping the whole scheme, which is the Conservative party's plan?

Phil Hope: I know the importance of the union learning fund, because, when I visited a factory in Leeds called Pittards a few weeks ago, I was deeply impressed by the way in which union learning representatives were involving shop-floor workers, many of whom had not engaged with learning since they left school 20 or 30 years ago. I pay tribute to the GMB, which is one of the unions that has been involved for many years in training social care workers through the union learning fund. The scheme is being extended to those industries with a higher proportion of women workers, such as social care and retail. I must tell my hon. Friend that 80 per cent. of the workers involved in the learning opportunities at the Transport and General Workers Union Leeds learning exchange are female, and that some 75 per cent. of the skills for life learners at the three Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers centres in Greater Manchester are women.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): Will the Minister join the 192 hon. Members who have signed early-day motion 195, which asks the Government to examine putting learning in the workplace on a more formal basis and to encourage those employers who do not currently engage with learning in the workplace to do so?

Phil Hope: Yes; I welcome the 192 signatures to the early-day motion in support of the union learning fund. Indeed, some Opposition Front Benchers have broken ranks with the Tory's policy of abolishing the union learning fund to support that EDM, and I am delighted that they have done so. Some unions and employers include training and skills in collective bargaining agreements, and the Department of Trade and Industry is currently reviewing the statutory basis for that practice. I remind hon. Members that we have already introduced a statutory right to time off with pay for union learning representatives to carry out their duties. It is a shame that the Conservative party has pledged to abolish the union learning fund, because at least 15 Conservative Members would clearly benefit from the leadership training courses.

Primary Schools

4. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): What the spending per primary school pupil was in (a) Nottinghamshire and (b) England in 2004–05. [11920]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): In 2004–05, the total revenue funding per pupil made available to support primary age pupils in Nottinghamshire through general funding and specific grant was £3,210, compared with £3,560 for England.

Paddy Tipping: Spending on primary schools in Nottinghamshire has doubled under this Government, but the figures show that Nottinghamshire is seriously disadvantaged against the national norm—out of 150 local authorities, it is the 129th worst funded. A new funding formula is being put together, so what hope is there for children in Nottinghamshire of a better, fairer and more equitable system from 1 April next year?

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend will have heard the exchange between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and various hon. Members on Question 1. He also knows that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools recently met representatives from 40 authorities, including his own, as part of the consultation on new funding arrangements for schools. The consultation has finished, and a decision will be made shortly.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): What justification can there be for counties in the same region getting different sorts of funding for primary education?

Maria Eagle: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that all local education authorities receive the same basic per-pupil funding entitlement according to the age of the pupils. Differences in funding occur between LEAs, so there is top-up funding that recognises the incidence of factors such as additional education needs, deprivation, sparsity where there is rurality, and problems in recruiting and retaining staff. That explains the differences between LEAs that seem on the face of it to be similar.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): On the additional money for the deprivation factor, does my hon. Friend acknowledge that under the current system the target of paying extra money for deprivation is missed in the case of up to as many as 45 per cent. of children who come from deprived backgrounds? Does she further acknowledge that new evidence submitted by F40—the fair education funding forum—in response to the recent consultation showed how every school could get precisely the correct amount of money for all the children who come to their school from deprived backgrounds?

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend has been very active in F40, which he chairs, and has demonstrated a full knowledge of the issues. He and others from his group have met my right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools to explain in full their ideas about how the formula might be altered, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend will have taken those representations fully into account. When the decisions are announced my hon. Friend will find out, along with everyone else, what impact he has had.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): In Nottinghamshire, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) knows, we have traditionally topped up Government funding to ensure the best possible deal for our pupils. We are concerned that, under the new arrangements, that will count against Nottinghamshire in future. Will the Minister look particularly at that point before the new arrangements are finalised?

Maria Eagle: Yes.

School Expansion

6. Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): If she will make a statement on her policy on allowing good schools to expand. [11922]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): We strongly support the expansion of successful and popular schools where they believe that they can sustain high quality for their students. We have therefore provided that all schools may publish their own proposals to expand, and introduced a presumption that proposals by successful and popular schools should be approved by the local school organisation committee and the schools adjudicator. That will enable more parents to gain a place for their child at the school of their choice.

Mr. Wilson: Is the Minister aware of the inept decision of Reading local education authority not to allow Emmer Green primary school in my constituency to take 25 additional children despite the support of teachers, governors and parents? That has led to a chain of events unfolding whereby this week the LEA spent tens of thousands of pounds on going to a judicial review challenging the rights of local parents to send their child to a local school. Does the Minister think that that requires her Department's intervention?

Jacqui Smith: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concerns about the position at Emmer Green primary school. I am sure that he understands, however, that in order to maintain the considerable progress that we have made on reducing class sizes in primary schools, there will sometimes be occasions where it is not possible for all parents to get a primary school place. That is part of the background to the issues that the hon. Gentleman mentions. Of course, it is also important that local authorities carry out their responsibilities in respect of planned school places. It is right that that happens at a local level and takes parents' concerns into consideration. Reading recently produced its school organisation plan for 2005–10 spelling out its plans for how it can ensure that more parents are able to get places in the schools that they want. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be engaged in discussions about that with other partners in the area.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that our priority should be making all schools good schools? Is it not about time that the Government addressed the fact that the vocational menu is not right for some children, who need a mix of both vocational and academic subjects? The chief inspector of schools says that A-levels will not be around in 10 years, as does the head of the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority. Something is going on and we should be doing something about it.

Jacqui Smith: I strongly agree with my hon. Friend's first point about the need to ensure that all schools are good schools. I know that he shares our appreciation of teachers' work in improving standards in the past seven or eight years so that there are fewer failing schools and more successful schools from which parents can choose. He also makes an important point about the progress that we need to make in ensuring that options are open, especially for older students, from the age of 14, to pursue an academic route or a vocational route and for there to be equal esteem. We have made considerable progress on increasing flexibility, for example, in key stage 4. However, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear in the 14 to 19 White Paper, there is much more that we can do and we are moving quickly towards ensuring that that progress continues.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): Does the Minister know about Walton high school, which the Prime Minister visited recently, in Milton Keynes? It wants to expand but cannot currently expand its sixth form. The strip of land required was originally valued at £12,000 and was a reserve site. However, English Partnerships has recently revalued it at £234,000. Although the Minister cannot comment on that individual case, will she look into the matter? Does she believe that it is right that unaccountable and unelected Government quangos should be able to hold schools to ransom in that way?

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman is right: that does not fall within my area of responsibility. If he wants to send me further details, I shall consider them. However, I am sure that he knows that all Government agencies have a responsibility to ensure value for money for the assets that they own. That does not undermine our concern to ensure that, whether we are considering the development of new sixth forms or the expansion of popular and successful schools, we do even more than we have been able to achieve up to now by, for example, changing from 1 August the regulations on the speed and ease with which it is possible to make applications to expand schools. That should ensure that such expansion happens more often.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I accept the Minister's point that it may be right in some circumstances to allow some schools to expand. However, does she agree that the free-for-all policy that some advocated during the election campaign, whereby schools anywhere could expand, would lead not only to chaos locally but to an inefficient use of resources?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend is right that we need to ensure the expansion of popular and successful schools to meet parents' needs in a way that recognises the financial position and the requirements of all parents in an area. He makes a good point, which the Conservative party, in its rush to slogans rather than solutions, missed during the election campaign. I hope that Conservative Members will not continue to miss it. Another important factor is that, to enable the expansion, we need investment, especially in capital. Too often, Conservative Members have voted against the additional resources that we are investing in schools, which enable the expansion of successful schools and the renovation and rebuilding of existing schools.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I am delighted that the Minister agrees that we should support the expansion of popular and successful schools—it is right to do that. She will therefore share my disappointment that, in the past year, the Government have backed the expansion of only two schools, increasing places by only 379 when there are more than 50,000 appeals from parents whose children do not get into their first choice of school. Is not it time to make the process easier? The Minister referred to the changes that the Government announced last week. Although they will make the process quicker, they will not make it easier. Is not it time that popular and successful schools can expand and that the expansion is not blocked by unpopular schools or LEAs?

Jacqui Smith: Since we changed the policy in 2003 to enable the expansion of popular and successful applications, we have received 20 applications and approved seven. Eight are still being considered and £3.1 million of investment has been put in. However, the hon. Gentleman is right: we want to ensure that the process is quicker and easier. That is why we are changing the regulations from 1 August and are willing to put in the capital to make it happen.

Key Stage Literacy Standards

7. Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton) (Lab): What progress has been made since 1997 on literacy standards at key stages 1 and 2. [11923]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): Literacy standards in primary schools have increased dramatically since 1997. In 2004, 78 per cent. of 11-year-olds achieved the target level 4 of the national curriculum in English, an increase of 15 percentage points compared with 1997. At key stage 1, 85 per cent. of seven-year-olds achieved the target level 2 of the national curriculum in reading, and 82 per cent. achieved level 2 in writing, compared with 80 per cent. in 1997.

Mrs. Dean: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. As we approach the end of the school year, I should like to pay tribute to all our teachers for the hard work that they are undertaking to achieve those results. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] Will my right hon. Friend tell me how our literacy standards compare with those of other countries?

Jacqui Smith: First, I completely agree with the emphasis that my hon. Friend places on the efforts of teachers to bring about these improvements. She is absolutely right to commend their efforts. She also raises the important question of how we compare internationally. Increasingly, in this globally competitive world, the ability of our young people to acquire literacy and numeracy skills is crucial. I am sure that my hon. Friend will therefore be pleased to learn that in a recent Progress in International Reading Literacy study in 2003, England's 10-year-olds achieved the third highest score out of the 35 countries surveyed. That is a credit to those children, their parents and their teachers.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): The figures that the right hon. Lady has cited have actually plateaued at 78 per cent. for at least five consecutive years, so it is clear that more needs to be done. That is why we very much welcome the Government's decision to hold a review into the use of synthetic phonics in the teaching of reading. That will go a long way towards raising reading standards among the one in five 11-year-olds who are failing to reach the required standard. Will the right hon. Lady assure the House that, if Jim Rose finds in favour of synthetic phonics, the national literacy strategy will be amended to recommend pure synthetic phonics in the first 16 weeks of formal schooling, and the teacher training colleges will be asked to train teachers in the necessary techniques?

Jacqui Smith: I thank the hon. Gentleman for welcoming the review that we have set up under the leadership of Jim Rose, the former director of inspection at Ofsted. We have achieved these successes in literacy not least because we have been willing to consider evidence as the basis for the national literacy strategy. This is a continuation of our willingness to do that. We have asked Jim Rose to look at the evidence to determine what works, particularly in early years learning in relation to literacy, and to consider the emphasis on synthetic phonics. It is worth placing on record that, before the national literacy strategy, there was no approach to synthetic phonics in this country. The strategy introduced the requirement for the use of synthetic phonics every day for children between the ages of four and six, and that requirement continues. Of course we shall want to look very carefully at what Jim Rose, and those who support, advise and work with him, have to say about this issue, and we shall use their findings as part of our review of the literacy guidance that we offer to teachers as part of the primary strategy, in order to ensure that we continue the considerable progress that we have made in literacy since 1997.

Dyslexia

8. Mr. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): What progress is being made on measures to help children with dyslexia. [11924]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): The Department works closely with the British Dyslexia Association and the Dyslexia Institute to help children with dyslexia. A range of materials have been produced by the primary and secondary national strategies with the aim of raising standards in English schools. The most recent is a CD-ROM entitled "Learning and teaching for dyslexic children". This helps schools to increase awareness of dyslexia and to develop approaches to enable learners with dyslexia to succeed.

Mr. Wright: I thank the Minister for her reply. She will be pleased to hear that another Sure Start centre is about to open in my constituency. That is another great example of the Government giving children the best possible start in life. However, one of the gaps in Sure Start's work is the inadequacy of provision for identifying dyslexia in very young children. What additional work will the Minister undertake to ensure that very young children with dyslexia are identified at the earliest possible age, and that suitable training, teaching and resources are provided to ensure that they fulfil their potential?

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend raises an important point. I am glad that another Sure Start is to open in his constituency, because the facilities that it offers can certainly help to identify such issues. It is quite difficult to identify dyslexia in very young children until they begin to develop their literacy skills. Signs of language delay, for example, can be an indicator, but only when specific difficulties in reading, spelling, written language and so on start to show can diagnosis easily be made. The resources to which I have referred will help school staff and those working with children to increase their awareness and understanding of the barriers to learning presented by dyslexia, the behaviour to which it gives rise and teaching strategies to overcome them. The focus on this issue in the special educational needs code of practice will therefore ensure earlier diagnosis and better strategies to cope with the consequences.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Will the Minister agree that there is an important role to be played by private independent schools specialising in correcting dyslexia, of which there are currently eight across England, one of which is at Thickwood in my constituency? Their main clients, of course, are the local education authorities. Does she agree that it is important that we should encourage local education authorities to make use of the outstanding facilities available in those special schools?

Maria Eagle: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. Dyslexia is a spectrum disorder—it does not present in the same way in every individual, and people are affected in different ways. Of the 82,000 or so children who fall into the category and are identified, more than 99 per cent. are in mainstream education. It is therefore tremendously important that our mainstream schools understand the needs of learners with dyslexia. That is not to say that special school provision does not have a role to play for some pupils—there are some 700 children in special schools whose main disabling condition is dyslexia. Given the fact that it is a spectrum disorder, it is important that the provision can cope with both ends of that spectrum. I am sure that the school in his constituency, and the others to which he refers, have an important role to play.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend satisfied with the proposals to close several special needs schools in Coventry? It seems to me that Coventry's education system has been subject to perpetual reorganisation for the past 25 years.

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend will be aware of the fact that following the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, schools reorganisation is no longer a matter for Ministers but for local authorities through school organisation committees. I am sure, however, that he, parents and those in Coventry who are concerned about any such proposals will make the necessary points to those who make these decisions, and that the proposals can be changed to ones that are believed to be more suitable. That is a matter for local decision.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Is the Minister aware of the research that shows that some 20 per cent of pupils in independent schools are identified as having dyslexia, whereas the figure for state schools is just 2 per cent? How does she explain that discrepancy?

Maria Eagle: I am not able to explain that discrepancy. I would be happy to examine the research to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and to return to him on that. As I have said, there are some 82,000 children whose main disabling condition has been identified as specific learning difficulties that include dyslexia. As we have already established, dyslexia is not always easy to diagnose and is a spectrum disorder, so one cannot say unequivocally where a particular individual is on the spectrum.

Mr. Cameron: While dyslexia is difficult to diagnose, will the Minister consider the simple tests being used in one secondary school in Banbury to identify it? Does she agree that alongside synthetic phonics, simple testing for dyslexia and remedial teaching are essential if we are to deal with literacy problems? If one cannot read, one cannot learn, and should not that be a higher priority for the Government?

Maria Eagle: It is a high priority for the Government. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right that diagnosis is the key to remedial activity, and the earlier the diagnosis the better. I have made the point, however, that it is difficult to diagnose dyslexia in very young children, partly because of the way in which it presents itself and because it is a spectrum disorder. I would be happy to return to him, however, in respect of the points that he has raised.

Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): In Sheffield we have developed interventions for children with special educational needs, particularly those with literacy difficulties, as part of the city's primary inclusion strategy. The work has been showcased for the Department. Does the Minister think that local authority initiatives can sometimes be adopted usefully at national level?

Maria Eagle: I congratulate my hon. Friend's local authority. I am certain that local initiatives have a great deal to teach in this regard outside their own area, and that many authorities will be willing to learn from that one. Certainly the Department is.

Adult Education (Lancashire)

9. Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): What recent representations she has received on the provision of adult education by further education colleges in Lancashire. [11925]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): My ministerial colleagues and I meet and correspond regularly with a range of partners across the further education sector, including individual colleges, on both a national and a local basis. That includes Lancashire.

Mr. Borrow: There are problems in Lancashire with the provision of further and adult education. Although there has been a big increase in further education funding in recent years, including the current year, the formula for determining the amount spent on adult education has caused funds to be cut this year. Will my hon. Friend examine the impact of that on Lancashire, and think about ways to improve the position? Does he agree that adult education is crucial, and a major part of further education?

Bill Rammell: I know that my hon. Friend takes a genuine interest in further education in his constituency, but I think it important to address the facts. This year Runshaw college, one of the main colleges that concern him, has received an overall 6 per cent. increase. That mirrors the national pattern: seven out of 10 colleges have received above-inflation increases.

What is rightly taking place, however, is the implementation of the Government's skills strategy, which received widespread support on both sides of the House when it was launched. Within a budget that has increased overall, we are prioritising the needs of 16 to 18-year-olds achieving level 2 qualifications in adult basic skills. Inevitably, that puts pressure on adult leisure and recreation courses. I am not saying that such provision should end; I am saying that if employers and individuals value it, we should look at the fees-charging strategy. Even the current average, £1.42 per hour, represents very good value for money.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): When my hon. Friend considers the representations he has received from Lancashire and elsewhere, will he bear in mind that while the Government's basic skills strategy is very important, many people return to education through courses that do not result in certification? Success in those courses leads them to take other courses elsewhere. Will my hon. Friend think carefully about the squeeze on such courses? They help many people back into lifelong learning.

Bill Rammell: I take my hon. Friend's point. The Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Phil Hope), and I have had several discussions with FE colleges about it. I have told them to ensure that they map such provision carefully in the context of the national framework. When they do so, more often than not they find that the courses are provided for. We must also ensure that the current strategy, which I believe is right, does not have unintended consequences, and we will keep that under review.

Education and Skills White Paper (14 to 19)

10. Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Con): What representations she has received on the Government's 14-to-19 Education and Skills White Paper. [11926]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): My Department has received a number of letters from individuals and organisations following publication of the White Paper. My ministerial colleagues and I continue to discuss the 14-to-19 agenda at a range of meetings and events involving external partners. I am establishing an external advisory group and a 14-to-19 stakeholder group to identify and test ideas, and to provide first-hand experience on delivery in the field.

Mr. Pelling: Has the Secretary of State received any representations from the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, whose chief executive said that the Government's proposals meant that A-levels were out of the door? Does she agree with that? If not, how does she think that the misapprehension arose?

Ruth Kelly: We have regular dialogues with the QCA about our reforms. The hon. Gentleman ought to read the speeches made by Ken Boston, head of the QCA, rather than reading misrepresentations of what he might say in the newspaper. I have had the benefit of reading his lecture, in which he said:

> "This week I read with surprise that today I will say that A-levels are certain to disappear within the next decade. What is far more certain 10 years from now is that if we haven't by then succeeded in establishing the diplomas as the mainstream qualification, having status and values at least equivalent to A-levels in the eyes of employers, higher education, learners, parents and the community, we will have failed a generation."

I completely agree.

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that many schools and colleges, such at the excellent new college in my constituency, are already embracing key features of the 14-to-19 White Paper? Will support continue to be given to the expansion of vocational education, particularly in order to raise its status in the eyes of young people and their parents?

Ruth Kelly: Yes, I completely agree. The historical weakness in our education system is that we have never truly valued vocational education or provided real opportunities for young people to mix academic and vocational learning. We have to provide our young people with the opportunity to do hands-on practical subjects—such as cookery, hairdressing and engineering—that they can learn in a real setting, and which are taught by people who understand them and can teach them properly. If we succeed in providing high-quality, high-status courses, we will have transformed the life chances of a generation of young people.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): In announcing the White Paper, the Secretary of State rightly said that she wants to introduce more stretch into GCSEs and A-levels, not least to allow universities to differentiate between student admissions. She also said then that she will publish the actual mark received by students, which is a very good first step. However, have the representations that she has received suggested anything else that she might like to introduce to promote further stretch in the GCSE and A-level system?

Ruth Kelly: We are taking many actions to make sure, for example, that English and maths GCSEs are made tougher. We are ensuring that functional skills are separated out in both subjects, and that it is impossible for people to get a higher grade in either subject without first having proven that they are capable of passing the functional skills test, and that they have real literacy and numeracy. As the hon. Lady points out, we have received representations about A-levels. She is also right in pointing out that we want to introduce more challenge and stretch into the system, and to make the unit grades available to universities that need them, in order to differentiate between students. We are also introducing an advance extension award paper that students can choose to sit, in addition to their A-levels, to demonstrate their ability in a particular subject. That, too, will be available to universities. Moreover, we are piloting an extended project that will allow students to demonstrate over a prolonged period real scholarship and independent research, and to produce a separate piece of work that could also be made available to the university sector. If we do all those things, we will have a system that really does cater for the extremely bright, who will then be able to demonstrate that fact to employers and to the higher education sector.

Sixth-form Colleges

12. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): If she will ensure that successful sixth-form colleges are not closed. [11928]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): The Secretary of State considers proposed changes to 16-to-19 provision, including to sixth-form colleges, in the light of the needs and interests of young people in a given area. There may be instances where local plans include the closure of a sixth-form college as part of a reorganisation that is intended better to meet the needs of local learners. Individual cases are decided by the Secretary of State on their merit.

Kelvin Hopkins: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer, but I am not fully reassured about the future of sixth-form colleges. I should declare an interest, in that I am vice-chair of the governors of Luton Sixth Form college. As he will know, it recently received a grade 1 rating following its inspection, and it has beacon status. Permitting feeder schools to establish sixth forms will completely undermine entrance to sixth-form colleges, and their future could be in doubt. Such colleges are among the best institutions in our education system, and I hope that my hon. Friend can reassure me that they are guaranteed a future, and that we will have more of them, rather than less.

Bill Rammell: I certainly think that sixth-form colleges can contribute to raising standards in the locality. I am aware of my hon. Friend's concerns; indeed, he has written to Ministers about this issue. The reality is that the area-wide Ofsted inspection of 16-to-19 provision in the Luton area concluded that it was poor, and I welcome the fact that Luton colleges and schools are now working together to respond to that. However, I am not aware of any proposals to close a college within Luton as part of that process. Should any such proposals be submitted, they would be looked at on their merits. However, it is right for us to look towards the expansion of sixth forms within 11-to-16 schools, particularly where it can increase choice and drive up standards. Further to our commitment given during the general election, we will shortly be producing guidelines setting out how best to achieve that.

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): To support successful sixth-form colleges such as Varndean and Brighton, Hove and Sussex sixth-form colleges in the city of Brighton and Hove, will the Minister undertake to look again at the inequalities in funding between sixth-form colleges and school sixth forms? Will he also consider, in particular, liability for VAT on the part of sixth-form colleges and capital allowances for the development of extensions?

Bill Rammell: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. I accept that there is a funding gap between schools and colleges and I have to admit that that is a direct result of the Government's extra investment in schools—and I am not going to apologise for that. In 2002–03, we estimated the funding gap at 10.5 per cent. Since then, we have brought up the overall funding levels for sixth-form colleges and further education colleges, which has resulted in that gap shrinking significantly. We want to make further progress, but we can do so only if the resources are available.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

The Solicitor-General was asked—

Parental Bindovers

21. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Pursuant to the answer of 4 July, Official Report, columns 13–14W, on parental responsibility, how many parental bindovers have been imposed on the parents of young people who have been convicted of an offence in each of the last 10 years. [11937]

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Mike O'Brien): The figures for the year 2004–05 are not yet available. However, in the 10 years up to 2003, 29,526 parental bindovers were issued against 26,568 persons.

Mr. Hollobone: I thank the Solicitor-General for that answer, but is he aware that the vast majority of residents in the Kettering constituency believe that parents should be held far more readily to account for the behaviour of their children? Given that he admitted in a written answer that he had not had any "formal discussions" with the Director of Public Prosecutions about parental responsibility, will he now undertake to meet both the Home Secretary and the DPP to develop proposals to establish effective mechanisms as soon as possible?

The Solicitor-General: We have put in place what we believe are effective mechanisms to deal with the issue of parental responsibility. We also believe that parents need to take responsibility for antisocial behaviour committed by their children. That is why we have introduced parenting contracts, parental responsibility orders, parenting orders, acceptable behaviour contracts and why we have recently strengthened legislation in that respect. Indeed, the necessary legislation is already in place: the hon. Gentleman's concern about parental bindovers, which he raised in the question, relates to legislation passed by the Conservative Government in 1991.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): Can the Solicitor-General help the House about the guidelines in respect of when such bindovers are appropriate? He will be aware that one of the problems confronting a court is deciding whether blame can be attached to the parents or whether the child is completely out of control, making the imposition of a bindover unfair. Sometimes it is felt that much greater parental involvement might help alleviate the problem. I would suggest to the Solicitor-General that the general public are rather unaware of what the criteria are, so will he help us on that and, if there are guidelines, make them available to the House?

The Solicitor-General: I certainly undertake to look further into that matter and to make any guidelines available. In the end, it has to be a matter for the courts and it is for them to decide whether they believe in a set of particular circumstances that parents have failed to exercise the degree of control that we in the House and members of the public quite properly expect them to exercise over their children. Sometimes children get out of hand, but the parents are doing their best and the courts acknowledge it. In those circumstances, it would be inappropriate to oblige them to undertake a course through a parenting order. However, it is clear that other parents allow their children to be out very late, in inappropriate circumstances. In such cases, the courts have discretion to implement a parenting order, or whatever other order that may be deemed appropriate.

To some extent, courts should have a certain amount of discretion when it comes to these matters. We must ensure that they are aware that they must make a judgement based on the facts before them.

Lenient Sentences (Appeal Rights)

22. Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): What steps he has taken to publicise the rights of victims of crime to appeal against lenient sentences. [11938]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service requires advocates who know of a complaint about a sentence to inform victims of their right to refer sentences to the Attorney-General. If the CPS decides not to refer a case, it is required by guidance to notify victims without delay, so that they have the opportunity to complain direct to the Law Officers.

Mr. Turner: I thank the Solicitor-General for that answer. It bears a striking similarity to the one that I was given on 1 May 2002, which can be found at column 822 in the relevant edition of the Official Report. However, his predecessor told me:

"We need to ensure that Members"—

she meant hon. Members—

"and victims know that the right is there"—[Official Report, 4 July 2002; Vol. 388, c. 391.]

That right was the right to complain, and I quoted the right hon. and learned Lady's reply again on 9 January 2003, at column 315 of the Official Report for that date. I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman will look at that extract. Most ordinary people do not read the Home Office's publications or look at its website. What steps is he taking to ensure that people know that they have the right to complain as soon as a sentence is passed?

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Gentleman raises an issue that needs to be brought to the attention of the CPS, and I shall ensure that its staff are aware of the importance that this House attaches to this matter. The CPS must carry out its obligations to inform victims, their families and, where appropriate, witnesses about the various rights that they have. It is not the Law Officers' role to publicise those rights. That is best done by the CPS, which ought to be close to the court proceeding and able to inform witnesses, and victims in particular, of their rights to refer matters. Subsequently, the CPS is under an obligation to inform victims, in writing, that they have the right to refer a matter direct to the Attorney-General. These are important issues, and I welcome the interest that the hon. Gentleman takes in them.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): The CPS has the primary responsibility for referring unduly lenient sentences, but I am a little concerned that it does so only patchily. A constituent of mine, Mr. Taylor, was knocked over and kicked in the head. He was saved from worse injury being inflicted by two young men who had received very nominal sentences for previous convictions for violence. I have much respect for my local senior Crown prosecutor, but it did not appear that that case would be taken on until I had written about it. Are systematic procedures in place to ensure that each sentence is reviewed as soon as it is given out, and that the possibility of review is always at the forefront of the mind of those who work for the CPS?

The Solicitor-General: I hesitate slightly before I answer, as the last time that I responded to Solicitor-General's questions—the first time that I had done so, in fact—I had to apologise to the House for the CPS' failure to refer what had happened in a homicide case to a victim's family. The CPS does not always carry out its duty as efficiently as we would prefer, but the procedures exist and are implemented in the vast majority of cases. The CPS' obligations are much more at the forefront of its staff's minds than they ever have been in the past. There has been a remarkable transformation in the CPS, which now acknowledges its responsibility to do justice and to ensure, along with the police, that victims and their families, and witnesses, are informed of what is happening in court cases. Things are changing, and I hope that the local CPS of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) will be at the forefront of that change.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Considerable publicity was given to the fact that part 10 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 allows retrials in serious cases where compelling new evidence emerges following acquittal. On how many occasions has the Director of Public Prosecutions given consent for an application for retrial on that basis and how many cases are under consideration?

The Solicitor-General: As the hon. Gentleman did not give me any advance notice that he sought such very direct statistics, I will have to write to him with those precise figures. I am sure that they will change from time to time. However, these are important matters, and I will ensure that he gets the precise statistics that he wants.

Police Records

24. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Under what circumstances the Crown Prosecution Service may examine police records of a witness called by the defence. [11940]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service can examine the previous convictions and cautions of any witness, including defence witnesses. At court, the CPS can provide evidence of the bad character of a witness if certain conditions are satisfied.

Tony Lloyd: I concede that it is obviously in the public interest that, on occasion, the past record of the witness should become a matter of record for the court, but what controls are in place to prevent that option from being abused? In particular, when the charge levelled directly involves the police, possibly as victims, where both the defence and prosecution have a motive to look at a witness more cautiously, is there any proper and adequate control to ensure that such checks of criminal records are not abused?

The Solicitor-General: I hope that there are sufficient protections. The Criminal Justice Act 2003, which applies after 15 December last year, imposes enhanced relevancy tests for submitting evidence that relates to the character of certain individuals. There are three grounds on which evidence of bad character can be admitted: first, if important explanatory material is involved and the court consents to its being admitted; secondly, if its use helps to prove important material issues and, again, the court consents; and, thirdly if the defence and prosecution agree that such material should be put before the court. Significant safeguards therefore exist, but if my hon. Friend is concerned about a certain case, I will happily discuss it with him.

Business of the House

11.32 am

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 18 JULY—Second Reading of the Crossrail Bill.

TUESDAY 19 JULY—Second Reading of the London Olympics Bill.

WEDNESDAY 20 JULY—Motion to approve the draft Council Tax Limitation (England) (Maximum Amounts) Order 2005, followed by remaining stages of The Regulation of Financial Services (Land Transactions) Bill.

THURSDAY 21 JULY—Motion on the summer recess on the Adjournment.

FRIDAY 22 JULY—The House will not be sitting.

The House will not sit again until Monday 10 October, and the provisional business for that week, following the summer recess will be:

MONDAY 10 OCTOBER—Remaining stages of the Civil Aviation Bill.

TUESDAY 11 OCTOBER—Remaining stages of the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill.

WEDNESDAY 12 OCTOBER—Opposition Day [6th Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

THURSDAY 13 OCTOBER—A debate on combating benefit fraud on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 14 OCTOBER—Private Members' Bills.

Chris Grayling: Last week's business questions were, of course, dominated by the tragic events in London, as will this week's be, as we will break at midday to pay our respects to those who lost their lives.

The Prime Minister spoke yesterday about his plans to introduce new anti-terrorist legislation at the earliest opportunity, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition pledged the Conservative party's support for him as he seeks to do so. Will the Leader of the House indicate what timetable he envisages for such legislation to be introduced? He will have my personal support in ensuring that the legislation passes smoothly and quickly through the House, but I am sure that he will agree that we must not allow the recent terrible events to interrupt our normal democratic processes, otherwise the bombers will have achieved their objectives. So, may we have an early debate on the financial crisis facing many national health service trusts? In my constituency, the local primary care trust is asking doctors where it should make £8 million-worth of cuts. In other parts of the country, such as Hampshire, doctors are being warned that they may have to stop referring patients to hospital later this year. Will the Leader of the House allow the House time to debate how a big jump in Government spending on health can actually lead to health cuts in many parts of the country and to patients being denied the treatment they deserve?

May we also have an urgent statement from Health Ministers about the food supplements directive in the wake of yesterday's unwelcome decision by the European Court to overturn its preliminary ruling and uphold the forthcoming ban on many vitamins and supplements? Judging by the comments of the Prime Minister and other Ministers over the past few weeks, the Government finally appear to have understood the absurdity of the situation, but can the Leader of the House tell us what they plan to do about it?

Will the Leader of the House arrange for the House to be briefed before the recess about the threat of a withdrawal of services by criminal barristers who are in dispute with the Government over legal aid and who want to withdraw their services in September, before the House returns? He will share my concern about the implications of such a move for our court service. Can he give the House more information about what is happening and when we might expect a statement?

Finally, I congratulate the Leader of the House on his new weekly e-mail rounding up events in Parliament. But will he make doubly sure that the e-mail works? It has helpful links, but when I tried to use them last week I simply saw a sign saying "page unavailable". Next time, will he make sure that the e-mail works? I hope that it is only a blip in his plans for open government.

Mr. Hoon: The Government are committed to bring forward further legislation to deal with the terrorist threat to the United Kingdom. Consistent with what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said, it is important that there is maximum opportunity for consultation and I am grateful to the shadow Leader of the House for his indication of continuing support from the Opposition; I recognise that that is so for all parties represented in the House. It is crucial that we move quickly to provide our security authorities with the appropriate powers that they need to deal with the threat to our society, but at the same time it is equally important that we get any new legislation right and that it is brought forward by consensus. I assure the hon. Gentleman, as I assure the House, that the Government will move quickly in that matter, but it is important that we get it right. That is our clear ambition.

The hon. Gentleman has obviously been reading back copies of Hansard, as the other matters he raised are familiar subjects that have been raised repeatedly at business questions. However, given the huge, record increases in health service funding under the Government, I do not accept that it is unreasonable to expect NHS trusts to manage their budgets properly. In the unlikely event that the hon. Gentleman were to have experience of government, I am confident that he would say the same. As the Government are finding enormous extra funds for our national health service, we rightly expect that money to be spent properly and effectively, according to sensible principles.

Questions on food supplements were raised yesterday and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave a clear answer on behalf of the Government. We want safe supplements to remain on sale, but we do not want to impose unnecessary burdens on industry and we want consumers to have a wide choice of supplements. We shall adopt those principles in ensuring that any legislation is dealt with sensibly and practically.

[Mr. Hoon]

I have dealt recently with the question of legal aid funding for criminal barristers, which primarily concerns efforts by my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor to curb the considerable costs of long, complex trials. It seems to me wholly sensible, and in the interests of lawyers and their clients, that the costs of legal aid are properly administered and distributed to ensure that we continue to have the high standards in our courts that the country has always enjoyed.

I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman's computer did not work properly. Of course, that cannot possibly be the responsibility of the Government, but I am sure that someone can give him appropriate advice on accessing the right links.

Mr. David Wimick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend comment on the proposed industrial action by cleaners employed by outside contractors, which is, I understand, due to take place next Wednesday? Can the Government use their good offices to try to ensure that people employed by contractors have the same conditions as those directly employed by the House, so that we do not have cleaners who are paid only £5 an hour, with no sickness pay and no pension? That is deplorable. We would not stand for it in our constituencies; we would make our protest, and we should do so here. As for the so-called rest rooms, I visited them only the other day. They are slums on our own doorstep. When we consider our accommodation for Members or Officers, why should our fellow citizens have as rest rooms places that Dickens would have recognised in his time? This is totally unacceptable. We must treat those who clean up after us properly and that includes those who are employed by contractors. Why have contractors in the first place?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made his point with his usual considerable force. I can assure him that I have looked to have the matter placed on the agenda for the next meeting of the House of Commons Commission.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): Did the Leader of the House read in today's press reports of a £2 million donation to the Labour party? Does he agree that it raises important issues? Does he recall that on 16 December 2004 I asked his predecessor if we might have a debate on the report of the Electoral Commission, which made recommendations that would reduce the dependence of all parties on large donors and increase the number of smaller donations? His predecessor was sympathetic to the idea of a debate, but nine months later we still have not had it. May we have that debate?

Mr. Hoon: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's concern. The matter has been discussed at length over many years, though he will forgive me if I remark that only rather more recently by Conservative Members than was the case, say, before 1997. I simply make that factual observation and make no criticism of the right hon. Gentleman for raising the issue. The matter seems to interest Conservative Members today in a way that it did not before, possibly indicating their lack of ambition to sit on this side of the House again, rather than remain where they are. These matters are important and the House should discuss them. Given the Conservative party's concern about them, it will no doubt devote some of its Opposition time to the matter.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): In paying respects to all those who have been involved in working on the aftermath of last week's atrocities, we can barely begin to imagine the distress of those who have lost loved ones.

May I raise a difficult and sensitive question? I intend no reflection on the excellent work of the coroner for inner London and his staff, but clearly there are deficiencies in the system that are becoming increasingly evident. Is it possible for the Government to bring forward the anticipated coroners courts Bill so that Parliament can address these issues as a matter or urgency?

I welcome yesterday's written statement from the Foreign Secretary on providing information to Parliament on European Union issues. Can the Leader of the House now tell us what he proposes to do to improve scrutiny of European matters and when we can expect proposals to be put before the House?

May we have a statement or a debate on child protection following today's report from the various inspectorates entitled "Safeguarding Children", which reveals that the sharing of information between the police, the NHS and social services is shambolic? Given that it is now three years since Soham, is it not time that we acted effectively to avoid such a tragedy occurring in future?

Finally, may we have a debate on the civil service? Returning to the so-called yob tsar—I am not sure whether that is a job title or a personal description—Louise Casey, who opined:

"Doing things sober is no way to get things done", and has now received a warning from the Home Office, apparently with the full support of the Prime Minister, is it not time that we introduced a civil service Bill as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Hoon: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments about those who have been engaged in such difficult circumstances, assisting the public and dealing with the aftermath of last week's tragedy. We have all rightly paid tribute to the emergency services, but may I add a further group whose members have not always received the respect to which they are entitled? The people who work for London transport are engaged in a number of important tasks, but they have not always been given the credit that they deserve, not least the remarkable bus driver who, on Friday, was back driving the No. 30 bus, only a day after those terrible events.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman was not criticising in any way the work of the coroner service. There has been misplaced criticism of the timetable, but I urge him to bear in mind the fact that the coroners are engaged in a difficult and sensitive task concerning the bodies of the people who were so terribly killed. They are also collecting evidence and ensuring that material is examined with a view subsequently to pursuing criminal proceedings against those responsible. I note the hon. Gentleman's concern about the need to introduce a Bill, and I assure him that that will be done as soon as possible.

As for improving the House's arrangements for European scrutiny, I am looking carefully at a number of reports. As a former Member of the European Parliament, I believe that it is important that we find more effective ways of linking with the European institutions, and I am keen that that should take place as a matter of urgency. I share the hon. Gentleman's concern about the need for continuing vigilance in child protection. Great progress has been made and, although there are criticisms in the latest report, it is important to give due recognition to those improvements. Obviously, there is still more to be done and the Government will consider the report's findings carefully. We have already addressed a number of issues raised in the report, but it is important that we make further progress.

It is unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman continues to highlight the case of one particular individual. There is a civil service code, and civil servants are not generally in a position to answer back when they face criticism from politicians. It is important that we give effect to the code and allow the civil service to deal with those matters as outlined in the code.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): Following the tragic and evil events of last week caused by terrorism, there is already fallout in the Asian community—not just the Muslim community but the Hindu community and the Sikh community—to which I belong. Given the serious effects on multiculturalism and the great society that we have built up, can my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the matter, as it is important that we discuss it on the Floor of the House and show strong support for the spirit of multiculturalism?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. It may not answer his question directly, but I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will want to keep the House fully informed of developments following last week's appalling events. I am confident that he will want to make a further statement to the House before the summer recess, and I hope that that will provide an opportunity for right hon. and hon. Members to raise the issues that my hon. Friend mentioned. It is vital that there should not be a backlash against our Asian community and that we continue to maintain and support strong principles of multiculturalism. I am grateful for his observations and I am sure that the House is too.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): The thoughts of the whole House are naturally dominated by the terrible events that took place in London last week and yesterday in Iraq. However, it should be aware of serious terrorist incidents that have taken place in Northern Ireland in recent days in Londonderry, in Moira and in my own constituency of north Belfast, where lethal blast bombs were used against police, civilians and journalists the other night. We have had a sinister statement this morning from a dissident republican group warning of further violence. Many people in Northern Ireland, however, are sceptical about the difference between violence by dissidents and violence by mainstream provisionals. Can we have a statement from the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to reassure people in Northern Ireland that the necessary resources will be given to the police and the Army to safeguard innocent people and protect them from the increased threat?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise the broader question of terrorism as it has affected our society. There are times when we say, perhaps rather complacently, that we as a country have had experience of terrorism, without thinking through the implications of that for people in Northern Ireland and elsewhere, who have been directly and personally affected by it. The appalling events of last week bring home to all of us the terrible personal tragedy for the families and friends of those who have lost their lives or been terribly injured, so it is important that we continue to debate and discuss the evil of terrorism from whatever source it arises. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government will continue to do that.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): May I add my voice to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) regarding the cleaners in the House? The problem is that many years ago it was decided to go for indirect employment—creeping privatisation—on these premises. One of the things that the Leader of the House should put on the agenda when he discusses the matter next week is ways and means of bringing the cleaners back under the direct control of the House's facilities. Then they will get paid the same as the other cleaners, and the restrooms mentioned by my hon. Friend could be eliminated at a stroke.

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that is one of the matters that will have to be discussed by the House of Commons Commission in due course.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): Tomorrow I will be at the funeral of a constituent, David Cheshire, a good and honourable man who had done the right thing and paid into an occupational pension scheme for more than 20 years. Two weeks after the occupational pension scheme went into liquidation along with the Dexion Company that he worked for, David found out that he had prostate cancer, which was terminal. He has left a widow with no pension whatsoever. David had done the honourable thing, along with some 80,000 other workers in this country, and paid into an occupational pension, only to have it stolen. Will the Leader of the House find time for us to debate the matter and see whether the compensation package offered by the Government is suitable?

Mr. Hoon: I am certainly concerned about the particular case that the hon. Gentleman raises. Not only have the Government brought forward a comprehensive compensation package to deal with the kind of situation that he describes, but we have taken steps to look at ways in which we can ensure that existing pension schemes are properly managed and properly funded, and impose tougher and tighter regulation on those schemes in order to prevent precisely the kind of difficulties that he so eloquently describes.

Dan Norris (Wansdyke) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House arrange for an early statement or debate on the miners compensation scheme? In my constituency, Wansdyke, the last pit closed more than a quarter of a century ago, which means that the average age of claimants is that much higher than in the country as a whole, and many of them are dying before receiving the compensation from which they should be entitled to benefit. Will my right hon. Friend draw the attention of the Department of Trade and Industry to that, so that the claims of older miners can be prioritised over other claimants, even though that is a difficult challenge?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that important issue—important not least to me as the Member of Parliament for a former mining area. I am familiar with the individual difficulties of large numbers of my constituents and the constituents of other right hon. and hon. Members. This is the largest compensation scheme attempted by any Government anywhere in western Europe and there have been around 400,000 payments already. The practical difficulty is that each case has to be assessed on its own merits. That is part of the reason why the cases have taken more time than we would have liked. I can assure my hon. Friend, however, that great urgency is attached, particularly to the claims of older members of our communities. It is important that we get payments to them as quickly as possible.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): In an answer a few moments ago, the Leader of the House referred to the Government's financial assistance schemes for people who have lost a large part of their pensions. From successive business questions he will be familiar with the case of APW Electronics in Eastleigh, which is one of a very small number of firms—half a dozen, or fewer—that fall outside the scheme. Will he please arrange for a statement from the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, who I am pleased to see has just taken his place on the Front Bench? We feel that the Secretary of State will have more sympathy with those pensioners who have lost three quarters of their pension, given that he is in the fortunate position of having had an £18,000 pay-off when he resigned as Home Secretary only five months before rejoining the Cabinet.

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman feels it necessary to make such a cheap political point in the context of a serious and important issue in relation to his own constituents. If I may say so, he undermines his argument by coupling it with such an observation. I have dealt with the case on previous occasions. It is important that people should receive proper compensation. The Government scheme exists, but this particular case involves a company that apparently has the funding available to provide proper compensation. That is one of the basic qualifications. No one in the House would want to see taxpayers' money being distributed to pension schemes that were in other respects viable. I am sure all hon. Members would stand by that.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Will the Leader of the House consider asking the Foreign Secretary to make a statement on the situation of my constituent, 18-year-old Michael Shields, who is in prison in Bulgaria on a charge of attempted murder, which carries a sentence of up to 20 years? Will he ask the Foreign Secretary to consider particularly whether the court proceedings in Bulgaria are compatible with Bulgaria's membership of the European Union?

Mr. Hoon: I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary responds in detail to my hon. Friend, perhaps not in the form of a statement, but in the form of a letter.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): If we cannot have a debate in Government time on party funding, could we have a debate on Government-sponsored tax avoidance by prominent Labour party donors? Can it be morally acceptable that the richest man in Britain, and the third richest man in the world, pays no tax whatsoever in the UK, or is that £2 million money well spent?

Mr. Hoon: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been vigorous in pursuing those who avoid and evade their taxes. Whenever he does that, we receive loud complaints from Opposition Members about the way in which we seek to ensure that our tax system is vigorous and effective.

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): I thank the Leader of the House for finding time for the Second Reading of the Crossrail Bill. Is he aware that residents and businesses in the Reading area will be looking for amendments to the Crossrail scheme to ensure that the continued service of the excellent high speed trains into Paddington is not impeded?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend will have every opportunity to make observations on behalf of his constituents on Second Reading of the Bill on Monday. We all look forward to reading his speech.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): There seems to be a problem in the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge of what is happening in the NHS. He complacently says there is more money going into the NHS. However, in the Cotswolds the deficits of the primary care trusts are getting bigger and bigger every month, we are making doctors and nurses redundant, and we are closing wards. I had one constituent whose death was certainly accelerated by the changes. Will the Leader of the House pay a visit to the Cotswolds during the long recess? He can have an enjoyable holiday and I will arrange a meeting for him with the heads of all the PCTs in Gloucestershire so that he is aware of what is happening on the ground, so that in the autumn we can have an informed debate with Ministers.

Mr. Hoon: I am not in any way complacent about the magnificent extra funding that the Government have made available to the national health service—I am extraordinarily proud of it. As I said to the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) who raised the same question earlier, that extra funding has to be properly managed and properly spent. It has to be used correctly by trusts to improve medical care. I am a regular visitor to the hospital in my constituency, where

I can see for myself the excellent progress that has been made in providing treatment and facilities for my constituents and those of many of my neighbours.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): The hot weather, unseasonable flash flooding in north Yorkshire and the increased severity of winter flooding all show that climate change is a real problem, and I congratulate the Government on making it one of their G8 priorities. Will the Leader of the House find Government time to debate the achievements at the G8 and what still needs to be done to combat climate change?

12 noon

The House observed a two-minute silence.

Mr. Hoon: I emphasise my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's point in his statement about the G8's achievements that we have made real progress on climate change, and it is important that it continues. As my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) has said, the House must continue to discuss and debate those matters, and I am sure that appropriate opportunities to do so will arise in due course.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): Will the Leader of the House make Government time available to debate the rising number of suicides throughout the United Kingdom and, in particular, in Northern Ireland, where the increase is especially serious, so that we can discuss ways to provide help through the various agencies?

Mr. Hoon: I was not aware of those statistics, but if that is the case, it is an extremely disturbing development. I assure the hon. Lady that the Government will provide her with a thorough response in due course.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 571 on House of Lords reform, which has been tabled by some eminent right hon. and hon. Members?

[That this House welcomes the Government's commitment to a free vote on the composition of Parliament's revising chamber; believes that the House of Lords should be replaced by a chamber which is predominately elected; and believes that the Second Chamber of Parliament Bill, presented in February by the then honourable Member for North Cornwall, endorsed by the Right honourable Member for Livingston, the Right honourable Member for North West Hampshire, the Right honourable Member for Rushcliffe and the honourable Member for Cannock Chase, and supported by other leading Members of both Houses, provides a valuable basis for further discussion and decision.]

When can we expect a debate on House of Lords reform? Does he agree that despite the right hon. and hon. Members of great intellect who have sat in this place over the years, there are many examples of their getting things completely wrong?

Mr. Hoon: Having studied the second volume of the diaries of my distinguished predecessor, Richard Crossman, which covers the period in which he sought to find ways to reform the House of Lords from the position that I currently hold, I recognise the difficulties of achieving the right result. The Government made progress by removing the overwhelming majority of hereditary peers, a change for which great intellects from Tom Paine onwards have argued. The Government are committed to continuing to establish a consensus on the way forward, because a single political party cannot drive through such reform. We must achieve a wide consensus on the way forward and establish constitutional arrangements for the United Kingdom that are consistent with the requirements of a 21st-century democracy.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): The Leader of the House will be aware that the level of council tax is a concern across the country. Yesterday's statement on the changes to the local government pension scheme will have concerned my constituents and, I am sure, other hon. Members' constituents, who fear another council tax hike. Will the Leader of the House make time available for an urgent debate so that we can properly question the Deputy Prime Minister and Ministers from his Department?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister is extremely concerned about the level of council tax and has taken appropriate action in relation to a number of local authorities, most of which are represented by Conservative Members. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman and other Conservative Members should use their considerable influence to encourage those Conservative-controlled councils to hold down their council tax increases, in which case we would all be very pleased.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): One year ago, the APW company pension scheme had a significant but manageable deficit. Government rule changes made it in the company's interests to shut the scheme, which crystallised the debts into tens of millions of pounds and cut pensions by three quarters. Can we debate pensions and examine in detail why the Government's refusal to assist companies when they are still solvent is simply not tenable?

Mr. Hoon: I commend my right hon. Friend, who has pursued that issue with considerable determination and emphasise that the Government are consulting widely on the question of future arrangements for pensions. The issue is complex and difficult, and it is a sensitive subject for many people. I have already set out the rules on compensation for that particular scheme, but we should examine individual cases with a view to making sure that justice is done for the pensioners concerned.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): Given the debate that will take place in the Lords this afternoon and the contribution that the former Chiefs may make, will the Leader of the House arrange for one of the Law Officers to make a statement to clarify the legislation on the International Criminal Court? It would be improper if soldiers were denied the proper protection of the courts-martial system—being judged as professionals by professionals. It would be outrageous indeed if, figuratively, officers were to wake up and find themselves in the cell next to Milosevic.

Mr. Hoon: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern about the general proposition. It is vital that the very high standard set by our armed forces on the conduct of those who serve the country is maintained, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has made that point. I assure the hon. Gentleman that members of our armed forces will continue to benefit from the courts-martial system and to uphold the law, which is something that they have always done excellently.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): When can we debate the disability living allowance and the eligibility criteria? My constituent, Mrs. Angela Jackson of Lisvane, Cardiff, was severely disabled before her 65th birthday. At the time, she was critically ill in intensive care and was in no state to fill in the forms to claim disability living allowance. She is now paralysed from the waist down and is not eligible to claim an exemption from road tax, which accompanies disability living allowance, because she is over-65. The situation is grossly unfair, because she could not fill in the forms before she was 65 and she has now been excluded from those benefits. When can we debate that unfair situation?

Mr. Hoon: I am not familiar with the particular case raised by my hon. Friend, although many similar cases have arisen in my constituency. I understand the concern among those who claim the variety of incapacity benefits that the form-filling and bureaucracy is sometimes extremely frustrating, particularly for those people who are least able to do it. Let me emphasise that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions is looking thoroughly at ways in which we can reform the incapacity benefit system, which is often criticised by people who suggest that those who are not necessarily eligible are receiving benefit. On the other hand, we will all have had in our own constituencies cases where those who are deserving have not been properly supported. My right hon. Friend's ambition is to ensure that we target this financial help from the taxpayer on those who are most in need and most deserving.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Yesterday, the Prime Minister said that he wanted to take a grip on terrorism and deport more terrorists. What he did not say is that under successive Governments the UK has become a haven for different extremist groups, including the Armed Islamic Group—the GIA—which has been raising money here to finance terrorism in north Africa. Can the Leader of the House confirm that the Government will deport all terrorists, including to countries such as Morocco, Algeria, Egypt, Yemen and Saudi Arabia?

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept for a moment the suggestion that this country is in any way a haven for extremist or terrorist groups. I assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that the Government will use the full range of powers available to them to deal with such organisations. Moreover, should the security services require further powers, they will, as I said earlier, be the subject of further legislation that I hope can be taken forward on a cross-party basis.

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): May we have a debate in Government time on the proliferation of mobile phone masts, particularly next generation masts, which are springing up right across the country? The public are deeply concerned about the health implications and have not been reassured by the Stewart report. We need a major debate on the Floor of the House about this issue.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hoon: I know—I can tell—that this matter concerns many Members. Shortly before the election the Government commissioned research on identifying the future direction of mobile phone technology, including the need for mast developments and the potential for increasing the sharing of masts. That research will inform the review of development rights that the Government are conducting. There is a thorough investigation into the planning arrangements for telephone masts, which we take very seriously.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Information has come into the public domain in my constituency to the effect that those responsible for mental health are going to reduce the number of mental health beds by 34, despite the clear need for such beds. Mental illness is still the Cinderella of the national health service. Will the Leader of the House treat this matter very seriously and arrange for the appropriate Minister to make a statement, either before we rise for the summer recess or soon thereafter, on the number of mental health beds in the United Kingdom, or arrange for a debate in Government time?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise this important issue. Mental health provision is not always given the publicity and attention that other parts of the health service receive. That is precisely why the Government intend in due course to introduce a mental health Bill to provide further help and assistance for this important area of our national health service. I am not familiar with the particular circumstances in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, but I will ensure that they are dealt with by the appropriate Minister.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Yesterday, BAT Industries announced the transfer to the far east of all cigarette production in its factory in Southampton—a decision that was taken far beyond these shores and regardless of the efficiency and dedication of the 500 workers in my constituency who will lose their jobs over the next two years as a result. Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the responsibilities of companies such as BAT for the retraining and possible re-employment of people affected by such decisions and on whether there is sufficient capacity in learning and skills councils and regional development agencies for assistance with re-employment and possible re-use of the sites of factories that have been relocated in this way?

Mr. Hoon: I certainly share my hon. Friend's concern about the impact of such an announcement on the individuals who stand to lose their jobs and on the families affected. Let me emphasise that the Government, through the Department of Trade and Industry and other Departments, have a range of measures available for retraining and re-employment. I agree, however, that such multinational companies have a responsibility to assist their former employees in finding new jobs.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): Will the Leader of the House be kind enough to make space in Government time for a debate on centralisation in the national health service? Many of my constituents are deeply concerned that a centre of excellence in my constituency—the upper gastro-intestinal cancer unit in Frimley Park hospital—may close in order to be merged with the cancer services at the Royal Surrey hospital in Guildford. As a result, we may lose consultants, the goodwill of patients, personalised health care and a tradition of excellence. Is not it a great pity that when we get welcome extra resources into the national health service we find that, as a consequence of a failure adequately to reform, we lose consultants instead of bureaucrats and busy-bodies in the Department of Health?

Mr. Hoon: Notwithstanding the hon. Gentleman's observations, I can assure him that dedicated civil servants are working in the Department of Health trying to ensure precisely that facilities such as those that he so well describes continue to be available not only to his constituents but to all our constituents across the country. There has always been a necessary tension between providing that range of facilities locally, at a distance that our constituents can readily take advantage of, as against concentrating specialist services so that the highest standards of medical practice can be followed. It is an extremely difficult dilemma. Nevertheless, I believe that the concentration of specialist facilities providing those very high standards, with the latest research and technology, means that our constituents can enjoy the best services.

I am not familiar with the particular case that the hon. Gentleman mentions, but I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health contacts him and explains the background.

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): May we have a debate before the recess on antisocial behaviour, because this is the time of year when the problems of gangs of young people abusing and intimidating residents can get worse? A debate would give us the chance not only to praise the work of the four save the neighbourhood teams that are already doing an excellent job in my constituency but to hear when the Home Office will be able to fulfil its promise of a neighbourhood policing team in every community. In areas in my constituency, notably East hill, Balham and Northcote, a more visible policing presence is still urgently needed.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to raise an issue that, if my constituency mailbag and surgeries are anything to go by, is raised with all Members of this House on an all too regular basis. The Government have recognised the problem of antisocial behaviour and continue to put extra resources into policing and the provision of community support officers and neighbourhood wardens, all of whom are dedicated to dealing with the problem. However, I anticipate that more action will have to be taken, because the problem is not going away. In due course, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills will make proposals as to how we can provide extra services to support young people. That is the heart of the problem and a matter that we need to address urgently.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): The Leader of the House may be aware that the Department of Health is in possession of a report into allegations that the British Pregnancy Advisory Service helped to facilitate illegal abortions in Spain. Will he ask the Secretary of State for Health to come to this House to make a statement on why she refuses to release that report, despite a request under the terms of the Freedom of Information Act 2000, and why she refuses to accept any further written questions about when she will release the report or even read it?

Mr. Hoon: I was not aware of the report. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will give careful consideration to any recommendations in, or implications of, the report and will inform the hon. Gentleman as and when appropriate.

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State for Health to come to the House and talk to us about the dangerous lack of allergy consultants in the United Kingdom? In my constituency, several children cannot even see a consultant. The best parents can be offered is paying £150 to a GP specialist. That is not good enough. The report of the Select Committee on Health stated that there should be 40 more allergy consultants in the UK as soon as possible.

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that hon. Members would not want the time that they suggest that my right hon. Friend should spend at the Dispatch Box answering their questions on those important issues to detract from her huge responsibilities to continue to improve the national health service. I remind the hon. Gentleman that, every four weeks, there are questions to health Ministers. There are a good number of health Ministers and I am sure that they would be delighted to deal with such important questions on those occasions.

BILL PRESENTED

London Olympics

Secretary Tessa Jowell, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Straw, Mr. Secretary Darling, Mr. Secretary Clarke, Mr. Secretary Hain, Secretary Alan Johnson and Mr. Richard Caborn, presented a Bill to make provision in connection with the Olympic Games and Paralympic Games that are to take place in London in the year 2012; to amend the Olympic Symbol etc. (Protection) Act 1995; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Monday 18 July, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed [Bill 45].

Orders of the Day

Consumer Credit Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

Data Sharing

'After section 36F of the 1974 Act (inserted by section 50 of this Act) insert—

"36G Data Sharing

(1) In this section—

'authorised person' means a consumer credit business, or consumer hire business, or an ancillary credit business or any person acting on behalf of any such business.

'credit reference agency' means any person within the meaning of section 145(8) and who holds a licence in respect of such activities under Part III of this Act.

all reference to 'debtor' shall include a reference to hirer and all references to credit shall include a reference to hire.

(2) Any authorised person may, provided the conditions in subsection (3) below are satisfied, disclose to a credit reference agency, and the authorised person and credit reference agency may use, any information relating to the credit history or financial standing of any debtor of the authorised person, for the purposes referred to in subsection (4) below, notwithstanding any enactment or rule of law prohibiting or restricting the disclosure or use of, or authorising the withholding of, such information.

(3) The conditions referred to in subsection (2) above are that—

(a) the authorised person has notified the debtor that it may disclose the debtor's information under this section; and

(b) the debtor has not, within 28 days of the date of notification, informed the authorised person in writing that he objects to such disclosure of his information.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (2) above, the permitted purposes are—

(a) vetting applications for credit or applications that can result in the giving of credit or giving of any guarantee, indemnity, or assurance in relation to the giving of credit;

(b) verifying the identity of the debtor or any applicant for credit, for the purpose of or in connection with an application for credit, or for any other purpose relevant to the financial standing of the debtor, including the prevention of money laundering;

(c) managing credit accounts including debt tracing and recovery;

(d) preventing, detecting or apprehending crime, and for the enforcement of criminal law whether in England and Wales or elsewhere including the tracing and recovery of any sanctions imposed thereunder;

(e) statistical analysis of credit risk assessment in a case where no individual is referred to by name or necessary implication;

(f) any other purpose to which the debtor subsequently consents; and

(g) any other purpose specified in an Order made by the Secretary of State for the purpose of this subsection (4).

(5) In this section—

'application for credit' includes an application to refinance or reschedule an existing credit agreement;

'credit reference services' means the furnishing of persons with information relevant to financial standing of individuals, which is information collected by the person furnishing the purpose of so furnishing it.".',—[Norman Lamb.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

As we have discussed many times, the Bill contains much that commands broad support. On Second Reading, I said that two specific issues were absent from it. The first is the problem of the calculation of interest. I note that an amendment on that has not been selected but it needs to be resolved. The second is data sharing. I know that the Under-Secretary shares my concern and that of many others, including the Conservative spokesman, that there is a long way to go in resolving the problem.

In a sense, it goes without saying that the best decisions about whether to lend are made when both parties—the lender and the borrower—have access to full information on which to base a judgment about whether it is appropriate to lend and about the amount to lend in the circumstances. However, at the moment, all too often, only the borrower has access to the full information. For many reasons, borrowers may be in denial about their capacity to service a loan or the amount borrowed on a credit card. We must therefore find a way of ensuring that both parties have access to the full information to make objective and wise decisions based on the principle of responsible lending.

Often, people build up unsustainable debt from several different sources. We are told that that is one of the prime causes of the crises that occur when people suffer health problems and sometimes worse. Increasingly, consumers shop around, obtain different credit cards, spend on them and also take out loans. Perhaps there is no defaulting for some time on any of those products, but unbeknown to each lender, borrowers are building up unsustainable debt and the crisis ensues.

There are two broad problems. First, data sharing generally takes places only when there has been a default—when someone has not paid on time or exceeded an overdraft limit and so on. When no default has occurred, but an unsustainable debt might be building up, information is not shared.

The second problem is historic and I shall describe it in a little more detail shortly. Before I reach the core of the new clause, I make a plea to the Under-Secretary to use his authority to sort out the whole problem. The new clause deals with part of it. It is permissive, not mandatory and therefore enables fuller data sharing. However, there is another side to the difficulty: ensuring that the industry does its duty and takes the opportunity that the new clause provides to make sure that data are shared. The Department of Trade and Industry, the Department for Constitutional Affairs, the industry, the office of the Information Commissioner and the Inland Revenue should get together urgently and set a timetable for achieving full data sharing. Even if the Under-Secretary opposed the new clause, I would welcome a commitment from him to ensure that that happens.

The Treasury Committee's inquiry showed that there is a feeling that the talking has gone on for a long time but there has been a lack of action. Part of the responsibility for that lies with the Government in legislative reform, which we are providing today, and in facilitating and putting pressure on the industry to respond. I know from discussions with the industry that, for example, APACS, the British Bankers Association and FLA are up for it and keen to discuss the matter with the Government to get it resolved.

Let me deal with the historic problem, which the new clause tackles. The Data Protection Act 1998 requires lenders to notify individuals that their data will be shared and the purpose for which they will be used. That legislation led in due course to the industry including standard clauses in the application process to ensure the consent and knowledge on the part of the consumer for any new agreement after data protection legislation came into force. There is no problem for new agreements; consumers have given their consent. However, there is no provision for any account opened or agreement made before the introduction of the standard clauses in contracts. Nothing provides for consumers to agree to their data being shared. Many accounts—credit cards and current accounts—have a long life. I have had my current account all my adult life.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): A long time.

Norman Lamb: Thank you. Many people's credit agreements will predate the introduction of the standard clauses and thus fall outside the scope of the new provisions for ensuring that data can be shared. The industry estimates that some 40 million accounts—42 per cent. of the market—fall into the category where there is no data sharing. How can the Government be serious about sorting out the problem of the lack of data sharing if there is no such sharing on 40 million accounts? Yet the industry says that it cannot share data unless there is a legislative change.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I am sympathetic to the hon. Gentleman's argument but I wonder whether that is where the problem lies. There have been genuine problems in my constituency of people accumulating debt that they could never afford. The main problem was people starting with a set of new credit arrangements fairly recently. Surely the problem lies with shopping around on the internet or responding to the many millions of pre-approved applications for loans and credit cards. I wonder whether the measure is necessary when we should mostly be saying: caveat emptor.

12.30 pm

Norman Lamb: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. As I said earlier, there are two problems. There is the historic problem, which the new clause addresses. There is also the problem that there is generally no data sharing in relation to modern accounts in circumstances in which the borrower does not default. A default triggers the sharing of information. The industry says that it is extending that provision, and that by the end of the year, it will have introduced much broader sharing of information, so that it will be sharing the good data as well as the bad data. If that actually happens, we will see a real advance. I am not suggesting that the new clause will resolve all the problems. We need a combination of legislative reform and pressure on the industry to deliver a much wider sharing of information from the kind of new credit agreements that the hon. Gentleman has described.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): The industry has a wide knowledge of people's credit. One area that is very dangerous is the transfer of credit card balances to new credit cards. There are some wonderful offers out there, but the problem is that the credit card companies know that a balance is being transferred to a new card, with a whole new credit limit, yet the existing credit card is not cancelled. So the borrower automatically gets double the amount of credit, and they can do that every six months. There is not one credit card company that cancels the card from which the balance is being transferred. Its credit limit remains in place. If someone with a £5,000 credit limit transfers that balance to a new card, they will find themselves with a combined credit limit of £10,000. They can do the same thing six months later. The danger is that the credit card companies have the information, but they are not using it to protect the consumer.

Norman Lamb: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He makes a good point. There is a big problem with the transfer of credit. Sometimes it can work in the consumer's interest, if they can get a genuinely lower rate of interest and use the system. However, there are real dangers involved. I am not suggesting that the new clause will be a panacea to resolve all the problems of irresponsible lending in the credit industry.

Further to the hon. Gentleman's point, the Treasury Committee noted that people often transfer their credit card balance having received a commitment of a nil rate of interest for perhaps a year. However, they are often not told that new purchases on the card will be charged at the full rate of interest, or that when they pay off some of the balance, it will be taken off the balance transfer, not the new purchases. They therefore find that they are paying interest when they did not expect to. So there are many problems, and they all come down to the practice of responsible lending. We still have a way to go to get the industry fully to understand the importance of that concept.

I am seeking to address one specific historic problem, which is that, in the view of the industry and the Information Commissioner, there cannot be a full sharing of data. The commissioner has advised the industry that it would be a breach of the Data Protection Act 1998 to share data without consent. Incidentally, the problem has got much worse because, as the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) pointed out, there has been a revolution involving people shopping around. In the old days, all our needs were met by one institution—a bank or whatever. Now, people shop around for the best value product, so the need to address the problem of data sharing has grown considerably.

The Information Commissioner has said that, under the old agreements in which there is no provision for data sharing, a lender would need the customer's consent to share such information. The only solution available at the moment, therefore, is for the lender to go to the customer and ask for their consent. Members will appreciate, having sent out political mailings to people, that the response rate to such requests would be tiny. The industry reckons that it would be less than 1 per cent. We cannot resolve the problem simply by seeking consent under the existing rules. New clause 1 seeks to address that.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): I have sympathy with the objectives of the new clause and with the need to promote greater data sharing on an historical basis. Does the hon. Gentleman agree, however, that we need to be careful about forcing consent, as it were, on members of the public? The Data Protection Act is there for a reason, after all. The new clause would give fairly wide powers to credit reference agencies and other organisations to extract consent from individuals. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should think about the implications of what could be quite a serious breach of data protection principles.

Norman Lamb: I fully accept that. I have thought about the issue, and I realise that there is a balance to be struck. We could simply say that this provision breaches the principles of the Data Protection Act; therefore there is nothing we can do. However, the consequence of doing that would be too serious, and I cannot accept that that is the right approach. So while I fully understand the hon. Gentleman's point, it is my judgment that we should reform the law in the way that I have proposed. The consequence of not doing so could be very serious. At worst, it could be a matter of life or death. We have all come across awful cases of people taking their own lives because of the mess that they have got themselves into. There is a responsibility on all of us to address the problem, and to ensure that judgments on offering credit are made with the fullest possible information available.

Some people have expressed concern that the new clause could lead to predatory lending. Other jurisdictions have suggested that, where there are provisions for data sharing, some unscrupulous lenders could use the information to target vulnerable consumers. However, the specific provisions of subsection (4) will address that concern, in that it sets out the conditions under which the information can be shared. It will prevent any risk of the information being exploited for the purpose of predatory lending.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): The information could be used to encourage more blanket mailings. More and more paper lands on our doorsteps each day, and we end up being offered credit for this, that and the other. This results in two problems. First, some of the offers are pre-approved, which can be a problem if that mail is intercepted. We all know from our constituency mailbags that people have had their information misused by others. Secondly, such offers can encourage people to take credit when perhaps they should not. Will the hon. Gentleman comment on the protection offered in the new clause to ensure that those things would not happen?

Norman Lamb: The hon. Gentleman raises a genuinely serious point. We all suffer from those mailshots, but some people are better able than others to identify the dodgy ones. There has been a revolution in the availability of credit, but there has not been a commensurate revolution in financial literacy and education. People are therefore often very vulnerable to such approaches. However, the conditions set out in subsection (4) ensure that the use of information to target mailshots at vulnerable groups would be prohibited. Lenders would not have permission to do that.

Data sharing is of value to both the lender and the consumer, but when we talk about breaching the principles of the Data Protection Act, we must remember that we are seeking to act primarily in the interests of the consumer. From the lender's point of view, it would enable better, more informed decisions. It would mean a reduction in credit losses and in the amount of time spent handling accounts. From the consumer's point of view, which for me is the most important, it captures those cases to which I referred in which unsustainable debts build up unnoticed, and helps to prevent such a crisis from occurring. It helps existing lenders to monitor what is going on with their customers—if they can see, through access to information, that their customer is building up an unsustainable debt elsewhere, it enables them to make an earlier intervention to warn their customer of the potential consequences. At the moment, the lender is completely ignorant of such looming problems.

Consumers who have a good credit record would also be helped. The acknowledgement of that fact, because of the lack of "dodgy data" through data sharing, improves their ability to shop around to get a good deal. There is also a problem with people who have what is described as a "thin file". Because such accounts might be historic ones going back a long time prior to the Data Protection Act, credit reference agencies might have very little information about many consumers. That in itself often makes it difficult to gain credit, and potentially makes it more expensive.

Therefore sharing of information seems to be in the interests not only of the consumer who is liable to get into real trouble but of the consumer who has a good record. Crucially, it also encourages responsible lending. There is interesting evidence that a reduction in arrears occurs when consumers are informed that their data will be shared. When consumers know that information about what they are doing in relation to one particular account will be shared, it does not half concentrate their minds—it ensures that they try to keep their account under control, and therefore encourages responsible behaviour on the part of consumers. According to some suggestions, arrears could be reduced by as much as 50 per cent. simply through the consumer being aware that their data could be shared, because they realise the knock-on effects in terms of access to credit if they get into difficulty.

The new clause is not mandatory—it does not require the sharing of data. It is permissive. Crucially, therefore, it is not just a panacea on its own—it requires the industry to respond by taking advantage of what it would provide and sharing the information. For example, the industry would need to ensure that its codes of practice establish the principle that data sharing is the right approach, and ought to be done as standard practice.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I have been following the hon. Gentleman's argument with interest. I feel that it is flawed in certain areas. He has put forward the argument that the publication of a person's indebtedness will provide a disincentive, but under his proposals such a person has the right to prevent the public disclosure of his personal indebtedness. Those two proposals seem contradictory, because anybody who is likely to run up cumulative debts has the right under his new clause to prevent that being public knowledge.

Norman Lamb: I do not think that that is contradictory in any way. A safeguard is provided that addresses some of the concerns of other Members. We have already established the de facto principle that all credit agreements these days provide a standard clause for the sharing of information—there is no opt-out, it is a fact, and that is what happens. If consumers want credit, they sign up to that arrangement. The new clause addresses the problem of all those agreements that predated the Data Protection Act, and therefore pragmatically helps to address a serious problem that cannot be resolved in any other way, because the response rate to any request for consent would simply be too low.

That is my new clause in a nutshell. It seems to me that there is a strong case for ensuring that there is full data sharing—not the partial data sharing that we have currently. We must do something effective to ensure that that happens. The time for talking is over, and it now seems to me that the Government should act. The new clause is the way of achieving that.

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) for tabling this sensible and constructive new clause. I am pleased to offer the Conservative party's support for it. On several occasions in Committee, I raised the importance of making advances in data sharing. I also endorse what he said about asking the Government to sort out the issue in its entirety. A range of issues are involved and we are all looking for them to be dealt with together rather than piecemeal.

There is concern that a unique opportunity to protect consumers is being missed. The Bill does an enormous amount in that direction, but the Minister rejected our pleas in Committee for controls on credit card cheques, which was an issue raised by the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant).

Mr. Sutcliffe: I do not think that I rejected it. I said that I would deal with it through secondary legislation on credit card cheques.

Charles Hendry: I accept the distinction that the Minister makes, but he still said no to our amendment, even if he could see where it was coming from.

Chris Bryant: The Minister is good at saying no.

Charles Hendry: The Minister is extremely good at saying no, as the hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position. He is the natural heir to General de Gaulle and Margaret Thatcher in saying no so forcefully and regularly.

The Minister also said no to our pleas for measures to stop unsolicited increases in credit card limits and rejected the plea for a responsible lending test, even though it was articulately advanced by his right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (John Battle). We are therefore concerned that things that would greatly help the interests of borrowers are not being taken into account as fully as they might be in this Bill.

As I stated in Committee, we all agree that the nature of the credit industry has changed beyond recognition over the past 30 years, and particularly during the past 10 to 15 years. That is the whole point of the Bill—to bring provisions and consumer protection up to a level at which it can successfully respond to those changes. As Members on both sides of the House will know, in 1971 there was only one type of credit card. Today, there are more than 1,300. Thirty years ago, £32 million was owed on credit cards, but today that figure is almost £50 billion. In fact, there are now more credit cards than people in this country. With that, a range of new issues have arisen. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning) said, when people transfer the balance from one card to another, the initial card does not get closed. Someone drew to my attention recently the fact that, although she thought that she had closed a card because she had transferred the balance, she then discovered that charges were being put against that initial credit card. She was told that that was because she had not reported the card lost or stolen—she could not just close it. To me, that shows a significant loophole in the current way of operating.

Competition within the industry and the ability of consumers to shop around with confidence for credit deals is greater now than ever before. Consumers can now apply for and open accounts over the telephone and the internet, which is relatively hassle-free. While the increases in competition and greater flexibility and access to the market for consumers are welcome, at the same time, the risks and dangers of accumulating debt have become all too apparent. Members will recall that, on previous occasions, I drew attention to specific cases of individuals who have run up multiple debts on numerous credit cards—debts that have been far beyond what their income allows them to repay. As a result, they borrow more and more to try to alleviate their difficulties, but all that that serves to do is to wind them further and further into unmanageable debt. It is a spiral of debt that we all know and many of us fear, which, in a number of the cases cited by Members, has led to tragic consequences.

On the day of the Bill's Second Reading, the Daily Mail reported the tragic case of Stephen Lewis, a 37-year-old production worker from Worksop in Nottinghamshire, who ran up debts of £70,000 on 19 credit cards despite earning only £22,000 a year. In the end, he felt that he could escape from that huge debt only by taking his own life, leaving a wife and two children.

Chris Bryant: In all the examples that I have encountered in my constituency or read about in the newspapers, the issue has been new credit rather than any of the old credit arrangements. The new clause, however, proposes to punch quite a big hole in some of the principles of our data protection legislation. I wonder whether it is proportionate to the real problem. Does the problem really lie with the historic credit arrangements that many of us may have? The hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) himself said that he had been with his bank all his life—quite some decades now.

Charles Hendry: I think that if Stephen Lewis's data had been shared more generally, and if the lenders had known that he was already borrowing on a range of credit cards and was well beyond being able to repay the debt on the basis of his income, the lenders would have been more cautious about issuing new cards. That is the kind of case that concerns us.

I should point out to the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) that the arrangements will not be mandatory, in that if someone says, "You cannot have access to my data", the lender will decide whether lending to that person is appropriate. The lender will have the extra information that he or she may have something to hide. Most of us would be quite happy for our data to be shared because we have nothing to hide, but when people do have something to hide and say, "You may not share that information", the lender should beware. The hon. Member for Rhondda mentioned caveat emptor. I am not sure of the Latin for "the lender should beware".

Mr. Bailey: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but it seems to be based on the presumption that the lender will always act responsibly. I am sure that that is true of the great majority of the credit industry, but it does not apply to all of it.

Charles Hendry: The hon. Gentleman had a chance to vote for the responsible lending test in Committee, but he voted against it. We certainly want more responsible lending and we had the opportunity to make that difference. It was disappointing that the Committee did not accept the amendment to which the right hon. Member for Leeds, West spoke so articulately.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Justine Greening) for drawing my attention to a constituency case that she had encountered. A mother, whose anonymity I shall preserve for understandable reasons, wrote:

"My son . . . aged 45 suffers from schizophrenia and is in receipt of anti-psychotic medication for this illness. He has built up a credit card debt of over £30,000 for which he pays interest of about £500 a month. I do not know the exact amount because he will not show me the credit card statements. The incapacity benefit he receives can just about service the interest on the credit card debt. He does not want to go bankrupt and he threatens suicide. In view of his illness it is very difficult to reason with him and he is very reluctant to give up the cards."

All Members of Parliament encounter such cases, which cause tremendous concern and distress. The data-sharing arrangements proposed in new clause 1 could help to deal with the problem.

The background to the new clause is a growing debt problem. The number of bankruptcies and repossessions increased by 25 per cent. last year, the number of appeals to the Consumer Credit Counselling Service increased by 60 per cent., and credit card arrears and bad debts are also increasing. Those problems could become worse. We should take the opportunity that the Bill presents and do all we can to prevent them from reoccurring. That means taking every possible step to ensure that lending is responsible. Lenders should be able to use information to ensure that borrowers can afford to enter into agreements.

We all realise that we cannot stop people borrowing too much when they wilfully give lenders incorrect information about their circumstances or other cards that they have, but we can do much more to make such activities more difficult. Data sharing is a crucial part of the process, which is why we support new clause 1. The new clause aims to make it easier for credit companies and credit reference agencies to share their data, so that it is easier to prevent people from entering into unaffordable agreements.

Most members of the credit industry already share, or are about to share, data on their credit agreements with the credit reference agencies, but some problems remain. Lenders first issued credit long before they would have seen a need to share data and, as a result, many credit accounts do not allow for sharing in their respective agreements. Accounts that were opened before lenders decided to share data are governed by the current legislation. They are not eligible for inclusion in credit files until the account holders consent to the sharing of their data.

In the case of accounts with a long life such as credit card or current accounts, decades may pass before the whole portfolio is available. The new clause seeks to solve that problem. As the number of agreements continues to increase because it is becoming easier to enter into them, and lenders seek more sophisticated means of risk management, data sharing becomes increasingly important.

It is beyond question that lenders have a vested interest in lending responsibly. Only a very few loan sharks make their money by preying on people and leading them knowingly into debt that they cannot afford. Responsible lending reduces credit losses, thus creating a financial incentive for the undertaking of credit agreements that do not place the borrower under financial strain. There is also the issue of reputation: lenders do not want to be seen to contribute to individuals' misfortune.

By entrenching in the Bill the credit industry's right to share data, subject to the protection offered to consumers by the Data Protection Act, we can help to prevent individuals from entering into agreements that they cannot afford. Protection of that kind is one of the fundamentals of the Bill, and as the industry evolves yet further over the next few years and decades, the new clause will help to ensure that the level of protection offered to consumers meets those demands.

Chris Bryant: As ever, the hon. Gentleman is advancing a rational argument, but the new clause gives a very broad definition of the information that is available. Many people would be nervous about the amount of information that might be available as a consequence. A credit card contains a vast amount of personal information about how people live and many would find it worrying that it could be shared quite so readily. Subsection (4) moderates the position slightly, but nevertheless includes a very broad definition of the purposes for which information might be shared.

Charles Hendry: A recurring theme in Committee was the lack of detail in the Bill. The Minister's response was usually that the issues concerned could be resolved in the courts. I should be happy to see an extra schedule or, alternatively, a provision allowing the Secretary of State to issue guidance in statutory instruments. The new clause, however, heads in the right direction. Of course we do not want information about where everyone spends their money to be available to a range of institutions, but if someone has 20 credit cards and has reached the borrowing limit on all of them, it is surely not unreasonable for a lender to have that information before issuing a further card. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we should be cautious, though. One of the Conservatives' worries about the Identity Cards Bill is the amount of information that would be held and would be generally available.

Mark Lazarowicz: I support the intentions behind the new clause, but may I pick up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant)? The new clause allows the use of "any information relating to the ... financial standing of any debtor".

That could presumably cover details of personal relationships, such as a duty to pay moneys to a former spouse. We need to ensure that we are not giving more extensive powers to credit reference agencies than even the hon. Gentleman would want them to have.

Charles Hendry: One could also argue that, if somebody is looking to take out a credit card or to borrow money, the question of whether they are paying thousands of pounds to a spouse is relevant and should be taken into account in assessing their ability to make repayments. Every time that we take out a mortgage or a loan, we are required to tell the lender about our other outgoings. If we are to encourage responsible lending, it is reasonable for lenders to be able to ask such questions.

The thrust of the new clause is supported by the industry and by organisations that exist to protect consumers, such as Which? The new clause enjoys support from both sides of the argument, which shows that we are moving in the right direction.

Mark Lazarowicz: We all want to reach the right solution, but under the terms of the new clause, people would have to provide not just financial information but any information. For example, they would have to disclose not merely how much they were paying to an ex-spouse, but any personal information that might have a bearing on their financial standing, such as whether or not they have an ex-spouse. The hon. Gentleman's new clause goes too far in seeking to reach an end about which we are all doubtless in agreement.

Charles Hendry: We will all agree that we need to strike a balance between requiring the provision of information that is relevant to a lender's reaching a sensible conclusion about whether lending to a particular person is a fair and reasonable risk, and protecting that person's privacy. However, these issues can be resolved. If the Minister were to say that he accepts the new clause and will bring the Bill back in revised form in another place, but with the word "any" removed, we would be prepared to reconsider this issue.

Mr. Sutcliffe indicated dissent.

Charles Hendry: I had a feeling that the Minister might shake his head. We are of course willing to examine different ways of making progress on this issue.

James Brokenshire: Data sharing is a particularly relevant issue to those on low incomes. Reports such as that produced earlier this year by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation show that it is difficult for them to access credit. A further problem, which is accentuated for such people, is credit assessment and the possibility that their circumstances might change. That strengthens the need for greater data sharing in some form or other. The new clause would enable such sharing and ensure that rational decisions are taken, particularly in respect of those on low incomes.

Charles Hendry: My hon. Friend makes an extremely valid point. We are seeking to protect consumers and ensure that they do not get into vast and unaffordable debt. That must be one of the Bill's most important aims and data sharing is intrinsic to making that reasonable aim achievable.

The Minister will be aware that many people would like us to go much further. He will have seen this week's "debt on your doorstep" campaign, in the Daily Mirror, for an affordability test. We are not going so far as that, but I hope that the Minister sees scope for moving in this direction, that he understands that we have advanced these arguments because we genuinely believe that such measures will help to protect consumers and that, on reflection, he will accept the new clause.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am delighted with the quality of our debate on new clause 1, but as Members have said, in discussing it we have to consider the wider context of the Bill, on which there is considerable consensus within the industry, among consumer groups and in all parts of this House. Interestingly, new clause 1 is a joint arrangement between the Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats—a new pact is emerging. That said, I thank the hon. Members for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) and for Wealden (Charles Hendry) for tabling the new clause, the spirit of which I genuinely accept.

The new clause raises a very important issue that has been debated in the House and by the Treasury Select Committee, of which the hon. Member for North Norfolk was a member. The Government believe that data sharing is a necessary and important means of ensuring responsible lending, but the issues are wider than just those covered by the Consumer Credit Act 1974. They include other types of lending regulated in other statutes, such as the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, and the important question of data protection, which is regulated by the Data Protection Act 1998. Members of the Association for Payment Clearing Services agreed data sharing principles in 2004 and, among other things, they committed to sharing all data that they are legally able to share.

The Department of Trade and Industry is discussing measures to improve current levels of data sharing with the credit industry, so we are taking the lead that Members have asked us to take. Such measures include working with the credit industry to determine the case for possible legal changes that would allow the sharing of data on accounts dating back to before lenders routinely sought permission to disclose data for credit reference purposes.

Norman Lamb: Is the Minister saying that he shares the objective of addressing the historical problem whereby agreements made before the Data Protection Act 1998 have no wording? Does he agree that we need to find a way to ensure that information and data on such agreements is also shared?

Mr. Sutcliffe: Yes, and it is important that we continue to discuss data sharing with the industry and with the various Departments. As I said in Committee and throughout our discussions, I do not want people to be able to hide behind the 1998 Act in cases where extreme detriment has been suffered.

We have to work with the industry and with the Department for Constitutional Affairs to determine the case for possible legal changes and to identify possible legal routes that allow for the sharing of data on accounts that date back before lenders routinely sought permission to disclose data for credit reference purposes. It is important, however, that the industry be able to show that the benefits gained from the sharing of these data are proportionate to the legislative measures involved. We all recognise how important it is that lenders have the best possible information to make responsible lending decisions, while ensuring that proper safeguards are in place on the use of personal information. Indeed, my hon. Friends have made such points in opposing the new clause.

Discussions are taking place and the DTI is taking them seriously. I am aware of the effect that getting into credit difficulties can have. We all know of tragic cases from our own constituency experience, and I was particularly saddened to hear about the case of the constituent of the hon. Member for Putney (Justine Greening). The Bill's purpose is to ensure responsible lending and that people borrow wisely and when able to do so.

Charles Hendry: How would the Bill prevent cases such as the Putney case from happening again? We have suggested measures that would help, but I am not sure how the Bill as drafted would help in such a case.

Mr. Sutcliffe: The unfair credit test—which can help if things begin to go wrong at the beginning of, or during, the loan period—would be an appropriate way of dealing with such a case. There is also the financial inclusion fund, and efforts are also being made to improve people's financial awareness and education. I understand the spirit of and intention behind new clause 1, but it is not the right way forward at the moment. We want to continue our discussions with the industry; indeed the hon. Members for North Norfolk and for Wealden and I are meeting the banks to discuss a range of issues, of which I hope this will be one.

Norman Lamb: I still do not understand why the Minister thinks that new clause 1 is not the right way to deal with this issue at the moment. It addresses directly a problem that he agrees needs to be addressed. Why is it not the way to deal with it?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The problem is that the new clause would narrow the scope of the Bill and there are wider issues that we need to discuss with the Department for Constitutional Affairs and other bodies.

I understand where the new clause is coming from, but notwithstanding the problems associated with access to personal and other information, its wording is inadequate. Further work needs to be done—not only in this provision, but in other aspects of the financial services industry—to achieve the objectives that the hon. Member for North Norfolk wants to achieve.

Norman Lamb: I am grateful to the Minister for indicating his agreement to the objective of dealing with the problem of historic agreements—I referred earlier to 40 million agreements—where there is no sharing of data. It is a start and it is good that the Minister has agreed to that, but it is not enough simply to say that we need more discussions with the industry.

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman will know—we have debated it in Committee and elsewhere—that this is the first Bill to deal with the matter for 30 years. We introduced a White Paper and it was discussed with the industry and with consumer groups who welcomed the broad thrust of what the Bill is intended to achieve. I want to sustain that consensus. It is not a matter of simply wanting to talk more with the industry, as regulations will flow from the concept of the Bill and discussions will be necessary again before they are introduced. It is rather disingenuous to suggest that all we want to do is talk; we do not, we want to act.

Norman Lamb: I certainly commend the Minister for being responsible for getting the Bill to this stage, particularly for getting it back on course again when it was effectively lost before the general election. I give great credit to the Minister for achieving that, but the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) made the point that the Bill provides a golden opportunity to resolve these problems. The Minister has just made the point that it is a long time since our last opportunity, and if we miss this chance, we know what to expect. Discussions drag on and on between Departments, with the industry and so forth. If we are not careful, we will have missed the chance to act.

Charles Hendry: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that what also makes the new clause special is that it is supported both by the industry and by consumer organisations? Some amending provisions have been supported by one side or the other, but on this occasion both sides are very keen to have the legislation in place because they believe that it will help them either to do a better job as lenders or to give greater protection to consumers.

Norman Lamb: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. I made the point in my opening speech that data sharing is in the best interests of the industry and the consumer. Self-evidently, that is why both sides have supported it. It seems right to press the new clause to a vote because it enshrines an important principle and people out there will wonder why on earth we are not taking the opportunity to proceed.

I should like to deal briefly with several points. Labour Members have asked whether it is proportionate to legislate in this way to deal with part of the overall problem of data sharing. Yes, I think that it is proportionate. First, we all know of the horrors that occur when things go wrong. The extent of the mischief that can be done is so serious that we need to be serious about finding ways of resolving the problem. We fully recognise that the new clause does not solve the problem in its entirety, but it is part of the solution. Crucially, proposed new subsection (3)(b) gives the consumer 28 days to respond to the notice that the information and data is going to be shared.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I understand the sincerity behind the hon. Gentleman pressing for a vote. However, both he and the hon. Member for Wealden have said that they enjoy the support of the industry and consumer groups. Have those hon. Members spoken to the industry about the wording of the new clause and, if so, does the industry accept it?

Norman Lamb: Absolutely. The British Bankers Association specifically contributed to the process. The wording is agreed absolutely. It seems to me that the opportunity that the new clause gives the consumer to opt out is the perfect way of dealing with concerns about proportionality and the breaching of the principles of the Data Protection Act.

1.15 pm

Mark Lazarowicz: Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House which consumer organisations have given their agreement to the specific wording in the new clause—not the principle of taking action, but the specific wording?

Norman Lamb: I have spoken with Which?, but I cannot, in all honesty, rattle off a list of consumer organisations that endorsed the particular wording. I have carefully considered it and, for what it is worth, I am a lawyer—[Interruption.] I understand that that causes a problem for the Minister. I believe that the provision is proportionate and that it is right to put it to the vote.

Mark Lazarowicz: The hon. Gentleman is speaking to the House with the carefully constructed words of a lawyer. He answered my earlier intervention, but it now seems that consumer organisations have not endorsed the specific wording. That is the whole point, because it is the specific wording that is causing problems today.

Norman Lamb: I accept that there has been no endorsement of the specific wording, but I am aware of no consumer organisation that objects to it—[Interruption.] The point that I am trying to make is that the new clause is proportionate. First, the consumer is given 28 days to opt out. Secondly, Labour Members complain that some new principle is being created that undermines the whole concept of data protection, but they need to understand that with respect to all the new agreements entered into—the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) referred to them—there is already a wide sharing of undefined data. The Government are not proposing to do anything about what is already a fact of life: a considerable amount of data is being shared in current agreements entered into since the Data Protection Act 1998 and the wording in those agreements provides for that data sharing.

If Labour Members believe that the new clause will undermine the principle of the confidentiality of information, they should be doing something to deal with what is already happening. That is the reality under existing agreements. Through a historic quirk, we are dealing with agreements entered into before the current legislation that triggered standard clauses to deal with the matter. The new clause is designed to address that historic problem.

Finally, it is no good us all wringing our hands and saying, "Data sharing is a good thing; we should all be doing what we can to ensure that it happens", without doing anything effective to make it happen. Unless there is provision such as the new clause or one that achieves the same objective, there will be no sharing of historic data: it is as simple as that.

Mike Penning: We have a golden opportunity here today—though I pay tribute to the Minister, who has dragged the legislation forward, kicking and screaming in some cases—to put in place the protections that the public deserve. That is why the new clause is so important.

Norman Lamb: I completely agree and, in a spirit of co-operation, I say that the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. If we miss the opportunity that the Bill provides us with now, it could be years before we have a similar opportunity to resolve the problem again. The Minister is not committed to any time scale for sorting the problem out. Talking to the Department for Constitutional Affairs could drag on interminably and will not resolve the problem. That is why it is important for all of us to put pressure on the Government. We do so by pressing the new clause to a vote to get the problem resolved. Without legislative action, it will not be resolved.

New Clause 2

Access to Information

'(1) Any notice served to a hirer or debtor under the provision of the 1974 Act shall be available in—

(a) formats suitable for persons who are blind or partially sighted, or

(b) languages other than English or Welsh.

(2) It shall be the responsibility of the hirer or debtor to request a notice in a format as set out in subsection (1).'.—[Charles Hendry.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

1.30 pm

Charles Hendry: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I am grateful to the Minister for the information that he provided me with in a letter yesterday in response to the many questions that I asked in Committee that he was unable to answer at the time. One of my specific questions was how any notice, such as statements of arrears or other statements, that lenders will be required to provide to borrowers under various clauses will be made available to visually impaired and blind people or those for whom English is not their first language. When I raised that issue in Committee, I sensed that it was something that the Minister and his officials had not thought much about. We should take the opportunity to provide greater clarity on what is expected of lenders in the way that they provide information to or communicate with their customers. That is an important issue that the Bill has left aside.

If we are trying to improve consumer protection by providing borrowers with further and more frequent information about their accounts, it is only right that all consumers have suitable access to it, regardless of any disability or barrier, such as language, that they may have. Thus we should ensure that such notices are available in formats such as Braille and alternative languages where necessary. The Minister said in his letter yesterday that the Office of Fair Trading would need to be mindful that it is meeting disability and language requirements, but that does not go far enough. Instead, we should make such things a necessity, which is what the new clause will do. That is surely only right to protect consumers against discrimination.

Such a step is also important given that the Bill enshrines the presumption of unfairness, rather than a presumption that an agreement is fair unless proven to be unfair. Lenders need greater clarity about what steps they should take if they are to prove, perhaps some years down the line, that they have acted fairly. The new clause would make it clear that lenders are expected to provide information in a way that is accessible to people who are blind or partially sighted and to provide it in alternative languages for people for whom English is not their first language. Crucially, though, in respect of the subsequent proof of fairness, the onus would be on the borrower to request the information in given format, not on the lender to know what special needs and requirements someone may have.

The new clause is important because the sorts of document required under the Bill are central to its workability. If people do not understand what they are signing up to in a credit agreement, if they do not understand the importance of the arrears notice or if they cannot read the OFT guidance issued to them, they will not be able to enjoy the full protection that the Bill is designed to offer them.

Even if the Minister accepts the new clause, I am conscious of the fact that other matters will be left out. For example, people with learning difficulties may not understand what they are being told in a written document about their rights as borrowers. The Independent recently published a letter by the Reverend Paul Nicolson, the chairman of the Zacchaeus 2000 Trust, who said:

> "There are seven million adults in the UK with a literacy age of 11 years, who will not be able to read the leaflets—let alone fill in the forms. The increasing incidence in mental illness has made the need to curb door-to-door lenders even more urgent. There is a lack of volunteer support and legal aid."

I am afraid that I have been unable to draft an amendment that would address that issue. Perhaps we will have to rely on the expert and invaluable advice of the citizens advice bureaux to assist people, but that should not stop us taking action where we can and I urge the Minister to accept the new clause.

Norman Lamb: I rise briefly to say that I support the importance of the new clause. Unless consumers are able to understand such provisions, there is not financial inclusion but ignorance of the requirements imposed on them. It must be right that someone who perhaps cannot speak English or who is blind has the capacity to understand the information in another way. It also seems right that the consumer in those circumstances should serve notice on the lender to the effect that the information is required in another format. So I certainly support the new clause.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Sadly, we have learned over the past few days what a large proportion of people in the United Kingdom do not speak English or at least do not have English as their first language. All hon. Members on both sides of the House feel that we have a duty of care to all our citizens. For those who perhaps speak Gujarati, Hindi or other languages and bearing in mind the difficulty that some many people face when getting into debt, it is incumbent on the Government ensure that their duty of care is expressed in ensuring that information in languages other than just English and Welsh is made available to those who cannot easily understand English.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I agree with the thrust of the new clause, but is it not more widely drawn than is suggested? Would it not be open to people who can speak English as their first language to request a notice in another format and a language other than English? It could be open to abuse by those who wish to request information in another language unnecessarily, when they do not need to do so for the purposes of understanding the notice.

Michael Fabricant: My hon. Friend raises an interesting point. Such abuse is always a possibility. As in all cases, reasonability must be the test. However, it is incumbent on the Government to protect the consumer, and this Government and previous Administrations have a good record in that respect. I hope that the Minister, whom I know to be a flexible man, will accept the new clause; but if he does not, I hope that he will certainly assure us from the Dispatch Box that guidance will be given to lenders. Such information must be made available.

Of course, there is another issue. Many of us who have English as first language find it difficult to understand precisely what some of these provisions are all about, even when they are in large type. It is also incumbent on people to ensure that the information is given in clear, plain, understandable English, not in legalese, which is not understandable to the general borrowing population.

James Brokenshire: I want to echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant). The new clause highlights a wider issue: the clarity of the notices that will be issued under the Bill. As the Minister knows, we are talking about issues such as default notices and getting people to understand their level of debt and borrowing. It is important that we provide protection to ensure that people are given as much opportunity as possible to understand the notices that are given to them.

The new clause touches on accessibility and availability. We know of the implications of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which ensures that we have facilities for all people to gain access to understandable information. That is what the new clause seeks to provide. I hope that the Minister will listen to the comments that have been made in the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield raised this issue in Committee and has spoken about Braille and ensuring that those who are partially sighted fully understand their credit and commercial situations. That is important because if someone is in default, charges and other penalties may arise as a consequence. We have duty of care, as my hon. Friend said, to ensure that people are fully aware of their predicaments, so that if they are getting into increasing debt, they can seek advice, help and assistance to allow them to address their credit situation.

Mr. Sutcliffe: As Members have said, the Bill is a balance between the interests of consumers and the responsibility of lenders to comply with the new requirements and the need to inform consumers.

The new clause would impose obligations on businesses that are already catered for elsewhere, and would impose a significant burden on business. I am surprised that Conservative Members are trying to increase those burdens, as they constantly remind the Government of the many burdens that they think exist already. As the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) said, I have written to him on the issue, and I have copied the letter to the members of the Standing Committee and placed a copy in the Library for other Members.

As I pointed out in Committee, it is important to consider the Bill in its context: the other legislation dealing with the provision of business services to disabled persons. So, in relation to providing information to blind or partially sighted persons, the result that the new clause seeks to achieve is already dealt with in the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which applies generally to business. The Act imposes obligations on businesses to take such steps as are reasonable to make their services available to disabled people. The Disability Rights Commission has published a code of practice on access to goods, facilities and services, which provides advice to businesses as to the manner in which they can comply with those obligations.

Similarly, there is no provision in relation to other languages in the Bill, the Consumer Credit Act 1974 or any similar legislation. Lenders should look to any legislation or codes of practice that may have some bearing on the question. It goes beyond the issue of the provision of notices that can be understood by consumers to more fundamental questions concerning the capability of particular debtors to contract with the creditor. If a person cannot understand documents written in English and the lender knows that, or knowingly disregards it, it may be relevant to the fairness of the relationship when considered in the context of all other relevant factors. Similarly, the regular targeting of consumers who have difficulty in understanding agreements and notices is a matter that could be taken into account by the Office of Fair Trading in assessing fitness under the licensing regime.

As I have said, the concerns of the hon. Gentleman in relation to blind and partially sighted people are addressed generally in the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. As for the question of languages, although I know where he is coming from—I keep repeating that—the Bill provides those consumers with sufficient protection. On a practical level, the new clause would impose a significant, and potentially open-ended, burden on business, which I know that he would not want to do.

I hope that after that explanation the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the motion.

Charles Hendry: I very much endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) said about the need for plain English, which is an issue that runs through so many debates. We have only to study the Bills with which we are presented to see incredibly complicated phraseology. Those of us who do not have the legal expertise of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) find that sometimes we have to read statutory instruments several times to understand them. The same applies to credit agreements. When people are taking out such an agreement they want to know exactly what they are committed to, what their responsibilities are and what happens if they default. I completely endorse my hon. Friends' comments on the need for agreements to be written in plain English.

I endorse too what my hon. Friend said about the nature of the documents. They are extraordinarily important to people and there was much discussion in Committee about how they should be delivered—how we could prove that they had been received by the right person and how they should be addressed. The Minister said that he hoped it could be done in a user-friendly way, but our concern was that it if was too user-friendly people might not understand the severity of the message. The documents should probably be stamped with the words "This is an important document that requires your immediate attention", otherwise companies would not be seen to have fulfilled their legal obligations. There is no doubt that such documents are extremely important, so clarity is essential.

The Minister is fundamentally wrong to say that the provision would impose a big burden on business. The industry is looking for clarity and wants to know what is expected of it. He said that if a lender knows that there is a language problem and knowingly disregards it they will be deemed to have acted unfairly. How on earth can they prove in retrospect that they knew or did not know? Due to the way in which the legislation will change, the burden in court will be on the company to prove that it did not act unfairly. Businesses need to know their responsibilities.

The new clause makes it clear that the onus is on the customer to say that they need information in a particular format and that the company should provide it. If the company did not respond properly, it would certainly have acted unfairly, but that would not be the case if it had not automatically offered the information in 25 languages at the outset. The whole problem turns on the nature of what is unfair—something to which we shall return later in our debate. Lenders need to know what is unfair and what is not.

Our small new clause would provide that if a person wants documents in Braille, large type or a language of their choice, they must be given them in that format; but it is up to them to tell the company. That is not a huge additional burden on business.

1.45 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: There are codes of practice under the Disability Discrimination Act relating to blind and partially sighted people, so the new clause would be another burden. It is unnecessary because a code of practice already exists.

Charles Hendry: I accept the Minister's point about the Act, but there will be a change in the way that the legislation works. An agreement will be seen to be unfair unless proven to be fair. The new clause is a small change which would make the Bill much clearer—something that those lobbying on behalf of disability groups would welcome. There would be a specific requirement, but the onus to ask for it would be on the consumer.

I realise, however, that the Minister will not accept the new clause. Sometimes when he can see where I am coming from he seems to show no desire to help me to achieve my objective. I can see that we shall not make much more progress on the issue; perhaps it can be addressed further in another place. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 3

OFT'S GENERAL DUTIES

'After section 1 of the 1974 Act insert—

"1A OFT's General Duties

(1) In discharging its functions under this Act to regulate the conduct of licensees, the OFT must, so far as is reasonably possible, act in a way—

(a) which is compatible with the regulatory objectives set out in subsection (2) below; and

(b) which the OFT considers most appropriate for the purpose of meeting those objectives.

(2) The regulatory objectives are—

(a) lender confidence, to ensure the widest possible access to credit;

(b) the protection of consumers; and

(c) the national interest in having an efficient and innovative consumer credit section.

(3) In discharging its functions to issue guidance and regulate the conduct of licensees the OFT must have regard to—

(a) the principle that a burden or restriction which is imposed on a person, or on the carrying on of an activity, should be proportionate to the benefits, considered in general terms, which are expected to result from the imposition of that burden or restriction;

(b) the desirability of facilitating innovation in connection with regulated activities;

(c) the desirability of maintaining a competitive market in consumer credit in the United Kingdom; and

(d) the need to minimise the adverse effects on competition that may arise from anything done in the discharge of its functions.".'.—[Charles Hendry.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Charles Hendry: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss new clause 5—Annual Report—

'(1) The OFT shall publish a report each year after the passing of this Act reviewing its duties as provided for under the 1974 Act, as amended by this Act.

(2) Reports made by the OFT under subsection (1) shall also review the work of any enforcement authorities, including local Trading Standards Services, who have acted on behalf of OFT as provided for under section 50.

(3) The Secretary of State shall take any report made by the OFT under subsection (1) into consideration when issuing regulations in relation to the 1974 Act, as amended by this Act.'.

Charles Hendry: I return again to the important issue of the powers of the Office of Fair Trading, an issue that has been raised with some concern by Members on both sides of the House on Second Reading and in Committee. The issue highlights once again the lack of detail in the Bill, and I remain as disappointed today about that lack of detail as my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) was when the Bill was initially introduced in the last Parliament and he dealt with it for the Opposition. Six months on, the detail is still missing, and I venture to suggest that it will still be missing in six years' time, unless a court case has been brought to establish it. What a tragic waste of time and money that would be.

The Bill provides the OFT, and other enforcement authorities operating on its behalf, with wide and open powers to regulate the conduct of licensees. We know that its goal is to achieve better regulation—something we all want—but the exercise of those powers will go practically unfettered. The concepts of unacceptable conduct against which the OFT will be judging licensees' business practices are entirely loose and ill-defined, so their interpretation is left entirely to the OFT. As the measure also includes the power to impose the penalties for committing unfair practice, there is no question but that the OFT will be both judge and jury.

With such broad-ranging powers, I am concerned that the Bill contains no provisions specifying the objectives and purposes towards which the OFT must act. Indeed, there is at present no guarantee that the OFT will perform in the manner that Parliament has in mind. By introducing an "objects" clause, new clause 3 would redress that, and install a vital degree of maintenance of parliamentary control over an organisation to which we are entrusting so much authority.

Indeed, it is invariably the case that Parliament controls the exercise of the discretion enjoyed by a regulatory body. I have previously used the example of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, whose opening sections make clear the ground rules with which the Financial Services Authority has to comply. In Committee, I challenged the Minister to give a single suitable reason why the OFT should not be subject to a similar control under the Bill. Sadly, he failed to do so, but now that he has had a couple of weeks to reflect, I am happy to give him another opportunity.

James Brokenshire: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the approach taken for the Financial Services Authority, and the duties and responsibilities that are set out in the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. The way in which the OFT is intended to operate, and its new regulatory powers proposed in the Bill, is similar to the way in which the Financial Services Authority acts. There is an important parallel to be drawn between the Financial Services and Markets Act and what is proposed in the Bill.

Charles Hendry: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his endorsement. I know that this is his particular expertise, so to have that support is encouraging.

The interests of consumers will be best protected if the body that is seeking to protect them is clear about what it is trying to achieve. The dangerous alternative is that the OFT is left to make things up as it goes along. That is not good regulation and, indeed, could be immensely damaging for consumers. New clause 3 sets out a range of general duties and a series of regulatory objectives which are, lender confidence, to ensure the widest possible access to credit, the protection of consumers and the national interest in having an efficient innovative consumer credit section. It continues:

"In discharging its functions to issue guidance and regulate the conduct of licensees the OFT must have regard to—

(a) the principle that a burden or restriction which is imposed on a person, or on the carrying on of an activity, should be proportionate to the benefits, considered in general terms, which are expected to result from the imposition of that burden or restriction;

(b) the desirability of facilitating innovation . . .

(c) the desirability of maintaining a competitive market in consumer credit in the United Kingdom; and

(d) the need to minimise the adverse effects on competition that may arise from anything done in the discharge of its functions."

Michael Fabricant: Earlier on my hon. Friend and others of us on the Opposition Benches talked about the need to protect individuals in relation to language and the use of language so that people could understand what conditions they were letting themselves in for by borrowing. Does he think that the OFT might be more focused by virtue of new clause 3(2)(b), which talks about "the protection of consumers"? Would that direct the OFT in turn to direct lenders that language must be clear, plain and, where appropriate, in the language understood by the borrower?

Charles Hendry: I am even more grateful than usual to my hon. Friend for that timely intervention. Our concern is that the OFT may go all over the place. It may decide to draw its remit as it chooses. We believe that Parliament has a clear idea of what it wants the OFT to do, so the establishment of duties would be helpful to the OFT in knowing what is expected of it. If the Minister disagrees with any of the duties set out in the new clause, perhaps he could let us know. If he agrees with them, again it would be helpful to know. If he does not yet know whether he agrees, perhaps we should know that. Through the new clause we are trying to give lenders and borrowers much more clarity about the role of the OFT. By ensuring that the industry is clear on what is expected of it by the OFT, it will be enabled to do more to meet the interests of consumers. That is what the Bill is all about, but at present that clarity is missing.

The Minister has stressed that improving transparency is one of the fundamental aspects of the Bill. We fully support that aim, but feel that in certain aspects transparency is lacking and improvements could be made. That is the object of new clause 5. It is a further attempt to address our concerns about the OFT's unfettered powers. It will be operating at considerable length from Government and Parliament, there is a lack of any check against its actions and behaviour in relation to licensees, and it will be both judge and jury.

New clause 5 attempts to go some way towards bringing a degree of balance and control back towards Government and therefore Parliament. It places a requirement on the OFT to produce an annual report, reviewing its work and the work of the enforcement authorities acting on its behalf. It further requires the Secretary of State to take the reports into account before issuing any regulations in relation to the Bill.

The annual report will give Parliament a real opportunity every year to see how the OFT is performing in its extended role and will put an early warning system in place if it is not achieving what is hoped and expected of it. It is but one small measure that does not impose any substantial costs or time on the part of either the OFT or the Secretary of State. It would ensure that the work of the OFT is regularly reviewed and monitored, and that the public, consumers and the credit industry have access to information regarding its operation. It is fair and right, given the extensive powers that the OFT is being granted, and I hope that the Minister will accept it.

Norman Lamb: I am absolutely in agreement with the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) in terms of the objectives of the new clause, but I am not entirely with him in terms of its content. I know where he is coming from, but I have concerns with subsection (3).

There needs to be a legislative framework for the exercise of these onerous powers; unfettered discretion is dangerous. There is an absence in the Bill of any guidance for the OFT in terms of the exercise of its powers. The case for setting a framework for the discharge of those duties is entirely right. I shall be interested to hear the Minister's response to that case. These issues will inevitably end up being considered by the courts, whether or not there is a framework. It is unattractive, however, to leave everything to the courts—if the courts set the framework without Parliament having any influence over it.

Michael Fabricant: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is not only undesirable because Parliament should define to a greater degree precisely what is right and wrong in this instance, but there is the question of time? If we can get the Bill right now—no Bill is ever totally right—businesses will have a clear understanding of where they stand. The courts can take months, sometimes years, to resolve these issues.

Norman Lamb: That is a fair point. I have often known occasions where a case is pending, either in the High Court, the Appeal Court or the House of Lords, and it creates uncertainty. I suspect that these provisions will be tested in the courts, whether or not there is a framework, but the prospects of uncertainty are increased if there is no framework in place. There is a strong case for a framework.

Subsection (2) strikes the correct balance. It clearly identifies the central importance of the protection of the consumer, but it also addresses the need for lender confidence and for having an efficient and innovative consumer credit section. I am not entirely sure what "section" means; I think I understand it, but it is not precise.

Subsection (3) presents me with more of a problem. It is the "have regard to" provision. It is entirely appropriate for the clause to set out a number of factors that the OFT should have regard to in exercising its powers, but they seem to be weighted in favour of the industry. Subsection (3)(c) concerns the importance of maintaining a competitive market. One could say that that is important for the consumer, but paragraphs (a), (b) and (d) all relate to protecting the interests of the industry. In that sense it is unbalanced.

It is right for there to be a framework for the OFT to exercise its functions but the new clause does not balance well enough, in terms of the factors that the OFT must have regard to, the interests of the consumer and the interests of the industry.

2 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am glad that normal service has been resumed and that the usual relationship between Front Bench spokesmen has been restored. May I nail down the tactic that the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) has used quite charmingly throughout Committee? He argued that the Bill is too general and that there is not enough detail, conveniently forgetting the process that has produced it. A White Paper was published, and there was a full consultation on the issues that it raised. We spoke to all the stakeholders, including the industry and consumer groups. The Bill was introduced, and we tried to get it into good shape through the parliamentary process. He accuses me of lack of detail, but the aim of those procedures is to look at the detail of the Bill. Secondary legislation will flow from the measure and, again, there will be detailed consultations and discussions with industry and consumer groups on any statutory instruments. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. He cannot accuse the Government of a lack of detail while asking for a full consultation with everyone involved. We must strike a balance.

We had an interesting discussion in Committee about an amendment that closely resembled new clause 3. I explained how the Office of Fair Trading should act with regard to its consumer credit functions, as set out in sections 1 to 5 of the Consumer Credit Act 1974. That includes keeping under review both the Act and relevant social and commercial developments; the enforcement and operation of the Act; the production of information and advice; and annual reporting obligations on the operation of the Act. The provisions of the 1974 Act should be read in conjunction with some of the general provisions in the Enterprise Act 2002, particularly the provisions relating to corporate governance and the OFT board; the requirement for an annual plan and report; and the OFT's more general functions, which are set out in sections 1 to 8 of the Enterprise Act. The ground rules for the way in which OFT operates were laid down when Parliament debated and passed the Enterprise Act in 2002, and they recognised the nature of the role given to the OFT. It was not to be a narrow regulator operating within the terms of a strictly defined remit that could limit its approach to problems. There had to be one set of coherent objectives for the OFT, and the Enterprise Act provided it.

We should remember that the OFT is subject to the usual range of accountability measures such as scrutiny by the National Audit Office and appearances before House Committees. It presents an annual report to Parliament and, in addition, it is a signatory to the Cabinet Office enforcement concordat, which commits it to minimising the costs of compliance for business by ensuring that any action it requires is proportionate to the risks.

Michael Fabricant: Bills are published and there is a regulatory impact assessment, to which the Minister referred. However, who works out that assessment? Often assessments say that there will not be a burden on business or on the taxpayer, but when a Bill is implemented hundreds of millions of pounds are spent. Who worked out these particular figures?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman has been in the House long enough to know who works out the figures. The assessments are made by everyone who has an input into the Bill and its effects. The process is not perfect, but people do their best. As Bills proceed, we try our best to make sure that relevant points are taken on board.

I have explained to the House and the Committee our view of the OFT's duties. Sufficient procedures are in place, and the new clause is unnecessary, so I urge the hon. Member for Wealden to withdraw it.

I thank the hon. Member for Wealden for tabling new clause 5, but it will come as no surprise that we shall resist it. It seeks to impose on the OFT a duty to produce an annual report covering its duties under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 and the work done by Trading Standards Services on the OFT's behalf, as provided for under clause 50. It requires the Secretary of State to take any report produced by the OFT under the new clause into consideration when issuing regulations in relation to the Act. I shall break the proposal down into its components, starting with the annual report.

The OFT is already obliged to present an annual report to Parliament under the Fair Trading Act 1973 and the Enterprise Act. The most recent report was published last month, and it reports on the work done on consumer credit under the Consumer Credit Act and the Enterprise Act. When looking at the work of the OFT it is best to look at its consumer credit work in the context of all that it does, not just its duties under the Consumer Credit Act. Secondly, the new clause would require a report on the OFT's duties under the Consumer Credit Act. One of those duties is to keep the working and enforcement of the Act under review and from time to time to advise the Secretary of State about that. That review and advice covers social and commercial developments in the United Kingdom and elsewhere relating to the provision of credit.

The new clause proposes that the OFT should review the work of enforcement authorities that have acted on its behalf under clause 50. I think that the key issue is the fact that when other enforcement authorities act under clause 50 they do so as if they were the OFT. They are under the direction of the OFT, so a report that treats those OFT powers as if they were carried out by a separate body is not appropriate, given that that is already covered in the OFT's report.

Finally, the new clause would require the Secretary of State to take into consideration any report made by the OFT when issuing regulations in relation to the amended Consumer Credit Act. In fact, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State goes further than that, and consults many stakeholders, including the OFT, before deciding what action to take. The new clause is unnecessary, and I urge the hon. Member for Wealden to withdraw it.

Charles Hendry: I am grateful for the half measure of support from the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb), which is an improvement on what might otherwise have been the case. I am also grateful for his support in principle for the aim of the new clauses.

We can certainly discuss the balance of the new clauses, but we tabled them because we are concerned about the lack of detail in the Bill. I shall deal with the Minister's comments about that in a moment. My hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) was quite right, as he is on so many matters, that there is a sense of complacency. This is the first time that we have looked at the Consumer Credit Act for 30 years, and we cannot leave it that long to look at the issues again. My hon. Friend may still be here then, as may the Minister, although he will obviously have been in opposition for 26 years. We have been given a tremendous opportunity, and I am disappointed that the Minister did not choose to take it up.

The Minister said that it would come as no surprise that he would reject the new clauses. The only surprise I expect today is his accepting one of my amendments. I hope that a resuscitation unit is available, as it would be quite out of character for him to do so. I am grateful for his detailed and clear response, but my approach is fundamentally different from his. The Minister said that we were trying to have it both ways by asking for detail and a consultation. Consultation, however, will help us to decide what people want in the Bill. One of the things that has been made abundantly clear is the desire for greater detail. If the Minister responded fully to the consultation, he would provide greater clarity in these and other provisions in the Bill.

Essentially, the OFT has a blank piece of paper. Someone will be rubbing their hands and thinking, "Right, I can do what I like." They believe that they do not have to take account of what Parliament has said because they have been given unfettered powers. If Parliament does not like it, that person will be the judge and jury. We have an opportunity to include in the Bill the OFT's role and general objectives. It is a great shame that the Minister does not regard that as desirable or important. I accept that some of our proposals are covered by other pieces of legislation but, nevertheless we should return to this issue. Perhaps the other place can look at it. Accepting that the Minister is standing his ground, however, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 9

NOTICE OF SUMS IN ARREARS UNDER FIXED-SUM CREDIT AGREEMENTS ETC.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 8, line 16—

'(9A) If an agreement mentioned in subsection (9) was made before the beginning of the relevant period, only amounts resulting from failures by the debtor or hirer to make payments he is required to have made during that period shall be taken into account in determining any shortfall for the purposes of subsection (1)(c).

(9B) In subsection (9A) "relevant period" means the period of 20 weeks ending with the day on which the debtor or hirer is required to have made the most recent payment under the agreement.'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 4, in page 8, line 20, at end add—

'(11) This section shall not apply if there is no prejudice to the interests of the debtor or hirer.'.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Well, we need to get the resuscitation team ready, because I have listened to what hon. Members have said and Government amendment No. 7 is the result. This amendment recognises the concerns of the hon. Members for Wealden (Charles Hendry) and for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) in relation to the issuing of notices of sums in arrears where the agreement has a repayment interval of one week or less.

The amendment alters the circumstances in which the creditor must provide a notice. Previously, for a notice to be issued, the debtor must have been in arrears to an amount equivalent to four missed repayments. The amendment refines that requirement, so that the obligation to give an arrears notice only arises when the debtor is in arrears to the equivalent of four missed repayments within a period of not more than 20 weeks, ending on the date on which the last missed repayment was payable under the agreement. In those circumstances, the lender is required to provide a notice within 14 days of the date on which the last missed repayment was payable.

I do not believe that the amendment will reduce consumer protection. Many consumers in this sector are vulnerable. But this change recognises the flexibility with repayments that applies in respect of many of those agreements. However, where the debtor has problems, and misses four repayments within the specified period of no more than 20 weeks, or five months, they will receive a notice along with information from the OFT to assist them in dealing with any problems they may have.

While I do not condone or accept that consumers should be in arrears, or that lenders should encourage or permit them to think that that is acceptable, the amendment recognises that the way that lenders administer many agreements with weekly repayments is flexible and caters for the odd missed repayment over time. So to that extent, I accept that the provision of notices under the existing clause could be more than is required in such circumstances. I hope that the hon. Gentlemen will be pleased with the amendment.

Charles Hendry: I am grateful to the Minister, especially for meeting the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) and me last week to talk about the issue of arrears notices. I am pleased that we have been able to agree on Government amendment No. 7 to help to resolve the problems that would have arisen from the Bill's original wording, to which the hon. Gentleman and I drew attention in Committee. That shows how far we can go when the Minister genuinely understands where we are coming from.

The amendment addresses a significant difficulty. In the Bill's original format, there is no distinction between cases in which four payments have been missed in a short period of time, where the borrower is likely to be in arrears, and possibly in some distinct trouble, and cases in which four payments have been missed sporadically, over a much longer period of time. In the latter case, missed payments are likely to have been repaid and amicable arrangements may have been made with the lender. If the Bill does not draw that distinction, lenders will be forced to issue arrears notices to borrowers who, in the latter case, may not be in arrears at all.

The problem is an aggregate one that relates most closely to home credit loans repaid on a weekly basis, where missed payments are not uncommon for most customers during their loan agreement. Indeed, on average, most home credit borrowers miss four payments during the period of a loan. A customer on a one-year agreement might miss one payment at Christmas, because of the increased costs at that time of year; a second in the spring because of a child's birthday; a third in the summer simply because they are on holiday the week the collector visited; and a fourth in the autumn for an entirely different reason. On all occasions, they may have notified the credit company and agreed amicably to repay the missed payments at a subsequent point. However, as drafted, the Bill would require the lender to issue an arrears notice on the missing of that fourth payment, despite the fact that the customer was not in arrears.

2.15 pm

As the Minister said in Committee, the customer would not technically be in arrears. In such circumstances, an arrears notice would cause great stress and concern. It would lead to family tension, as the borrower would be forced to explain why they had been issued with an arrears notice, however user friendly the format of that notice might be, when they would contend they are not in arrears because no additional debts or charges had been incurred.

The requirement would also create a bureaucratic nightmare, as potentially every one of the 3 million home credit borrowers would need to be issued with an arrears notice. That also presents a major administrative burden. Assuming that the cost of writing, posting and administration is just £1 a letter, that represents an extra £3 million in administrative costs, which would inevitably be passed on to borrowers in the form of higher charges, and that is the opposite of what the Bill seeks to achieve.

By reducing the time-frame in which the four payments must be missed before an arrears notice is required to be issued, from the entire length of the agreement to 20 weeks, we can overcome many of those difficulties. I am particularly pleased that the Minister has responded to our request that the period should be 20 weeks rather than the 26 weeks that he initially proposed. I am grateful for his flexibility. A 20-week period will be far more indicative of a customer in trouble, and will help to reduce the unnecessary distress and bureaucracy caused by issuing incorrect notices. Perhaps raising the number of payments missed from four to six would have helped that further, but I nevertheless welcome the Minister's compromise.

I tabled amendment No. 4 to the Bill before I was aware of the exact wording of the Government's amendment, but it remains relevant. I hope that the Minister will not think me churlish after his generosity if I seek to push him one step further. The aim of amendment No. 4 is to ensure that arrears notices will need to be served to customers only if their interests are prejudiced, and that means that they have incurred a charge or penalty on their account. The hon. Member for North Norfolk made that point especially strongly in Committee and it is fundamental to what we seek to achieve.

It looks possible that section 9A of the Government's amendment, which states that "only amounts resulting from failures by the debtor or hirer to make payments he is required to have made during that period shall be taken into account in determining any shortfall", addresses that same issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) mentioned the need for plain English, and I cannot quite understand the exact meaning of the provision. I would be grateful if the Minister clarified the implication of the amendment in that respect.

I think that the Minister understands why this issue is so important. We totally agree that arrears notices should be issued where a person is genuinely in growing arrears, but we do not think it right that it should be issued if they may technically be in arrears, but that has no other implication for the borrower. To give an example, if I lend the Minister £100—I know that that is highly implausible—to put on the horses this afternoon, he might offer to pay it back in 10 weekly instalments of £10. Of course, as a generous person I would not charge him any interest. If he tells me that he wants to treat Mrs. Sutcliffe to a special night out—we know that he can get a good deal up in Yorkshire—and to miss a couple of payments and so pays it back over 12 weeks instead, he would technically be in arrears, but neither of us would believe that to be the case in reality. It would be a reassignment, with no further debt or charge involved. The same is true in most home credit agreements, so the further change—

Norman Lamb: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be able to clarify an aspect of particular concern. As amendment No. 4 is drafted, the whole section would have no effect if there was no prejudice to the borrower, but the question is what we mean by prejudice. I agree with him on doorstep lending, when payments are missed, but no extra interest is charged and no default charges are imposed. But what about a situation in which the borrower simply stops paying and misses 10 or 12 payments in a row? The hon. Gentleman and I would probably agree that in that situation, there could be a concern that the borrower was getting into difficulties. Does he believe that there would be prejudice, or does he believe that if no extra interest is charged, there should be no default notice? I am concerned that the entire section will not apply if the situation is not defined as one of prejudice.

Charles Hendry: I understand where the hon. Gentleman is coming from. We will be glad to complete proceedings on the Bill, so that we can stop saying that.

If the interests of the borrower are not prejudiced—if he faces no further charges, penalties, levies and so on—there should be no need to issue a formal arrears notice. Being in arrears means that some penalty is involved, but if there is none, is it necessary to go through the process of declaring the borrower to be in arrears? They will simply pay back the loan over a longer period, and pay back the amount they expected to pay, not a penny extra. Is it necessary to tell somebody formally that they are in arrears when they may feel that they are genuinely not, having had an amicable discussion with the home credit provider and reached agreement on a different way of repaying the loan?

Norman Lamb: In the situation that I described, where payments simply stop and none have been made for 10 or 12 weeks or more, would it not be right for some sort of notice to be issued to warn the person of the consequences of not resuming the payments?

Charles Hendry: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying. If the borrower had simply stopped paying, they would technically be in default, rather than arrears. Arrears would mean that the lender had agreed to reschedule payment over a longer period. If the borrower stopped paying unilaterally, without consulting the lender, the lender would want to issue a notice quickly, to make sure their own interests were protected. Where the borrower has reached an agreement with the lender about how they will reschedule the loan and pay it back over a slightly longer period, and where the lender's interests are not prejudiced, a clear case can be made as to why the borrower does not need to be issued with an arrears notice.

The change is entirely in keeping with the spirit of the Bill and will benefit borrowers, who must be our top concern. I hope that if it is not implicit in the Government's amendment, the Minister will agree to that change now. I know that he has had the opportunity to receive further guidance on the matter, so I hope that he can provide the clarity that I seek.

Norman Lamb: There is no point in repeating what has already been said, so I shall be brief. I put on record my appreciation of the Minister's readiness to meet us, hear our arguments and respond by way of a compromise to reduce the period to 20 weeks. That is a sensible compromise which recognises how doorstep lending works.

My big concern, to which the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) has alluded, is that in many agreements there is no prejudice as a result of occasional payments being missed. The two parties agree to postpone the payments, they are paid at a later date, and no extra interest or penalty charge is incurred. In situations where there is no prejudice, it seems over-bureaucratic and potentially quite scary for the borrower to require the lender to serve an arrears notice. The Government amendment is a compromise, but it addresses our concerns in a reasonable way.

On amendment No. 4, I am with the hon. Member for Wealden on the principle of it. I have concerns about the workings of the clause as drafted. It removes the whole of the effect of the section where there is no prejudice. I still have a sense that where payments stop for a considerable period, it may well be appropriate for the lender to have an obligation to serve an arrears notice. My concern was to ensure that the arrears notice was not triggered so quickly in the case of doorstep lending. The principle is right, but I have concerns about how it would operate, given the wording of the amendment.

Mr. Sutcliffe: We must be careful about the principle involved. The first sign of people having debt problems is that they miss payments. That is why we tabled amendment No. 7. It is a dangerous to allow people to miss payments. I feel strongly about that and I hope the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendment. It is dangerous and risky.

There is some confusion about whether amendment No. 4 relates to clause 9. It relates to clause 10, which deals with running-account credit. There is no difference between default and arrears. They are both breaches of the agreement. I hope the hon. Member for Wealden will reflect on what I and the hon. Member for North Norfolk have said. The amendment may relieve the bureaucratic burden on business but it is dangerous. I hope the hon. Member for Wealden will not press it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 19

UNFAIR RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN CREDITORS AND DEBTORS

Charles Hendry: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 14, line 11, at end insert—

'(2A) In making a determination under this section, a court shall have regard to guidance published periodically by the OFT.

(2B) Guidance produced by the OFT under subsection (2A) shall be approved by the Secretary of State before publication.'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 3, in page 54, line 33, at end insert—

'(2A) The Secretary of State shall not make an order under subsection (2) bringing into force sections 19 to 21 of this Act until advice and information has been published by the OFT in accordance with section 140D of the 1974 Act.'.

No. 6, in page 64, line 35, at end insert—

'(6) This paragraph shall only apply to credit agreements which will continue for two years or more beyond the end of the transitional period set out in subsection (4).'.

Charles Hendry: Clause 19 is undoubtedly one of the central components of the Bill. As I have said, it determines the thrust of what we are all trying to achieve—a better, fairer and more responsive system for consumers. Opposition and Government Members have discussed the new unfair relationships test during the Bill's progress through the House, and we all favour that provision, because it replaces the out-of-date "extortionate test", which has failed to offer consumers adequate protection in a market that has changed beyond all recognition in the past 30 years.

The current imbalance, which does not serve consumers' interests, must be addressed, and the new unfairness test is central to achieving that objective. Extensive debate took place in Committee about the nature of the test, and we continue to have serious reservations about the concept of "guilty until proven innocent", which is alien to British law.

We received representations from both sides of the issue in Committee. Lloyds TSB stated:

"The Bill introduces a new unfair credit relationship test, which means consumers can challenge unfair practices and terms in court. However, the meaning of 'unfair relationship' is vague and the scope of the provision is generally too wide for both consumers and creditors . . . The Bill contains no guidance for consumers as to what constitutes 'fair' or 'unfair' to enable them to identify when they have a valid claim. Similarly, there is no guidance for creditors on how they should conduct themselves to ensure that their actions are not 'unfair'. Unlike comparable legislation in respect of unfair contract terms or financial regulation, there is not even a non-exhaustive list of relevant factors."

From the other side of the debate, a charity, Credit Action, stated:

"The presumption that all relations are 'unfair' unless proved otherwise is in itself unfair, excessive and contrary to normal British law."

We also received representations from the Finance and Leasing Association:

"We reiterate our support for the principles behind the Consumer Credit Bill. However, the combination of the lack of information regarding the unfairness test and the retrospective nature of the test hugely increases uncertainty within industry and could impact critically on the UK's £235 billion per year securitisation market. This market has to date been a very important source of capital for many lenders. Industry is concerned that the Government have not taken account of the potential for the market to be disrupted by retrospective application of the unfairness test. Market risks may ultimately have to be revised, thereby having an adverse impact on the credit ratings of securitisation transactions. This could increase securitisation costs and ultimately have a negative impact on competition and cost in the consumer credit market."

Both borrowers and lenders the support the idea that the situation should be clarified, but we will watch the shift to the unfairness test with the greatest care. That concept already exists in employment law—an employer is assumed to have acted in a discriminatory manner unless he can prove that he has not—but we are wary of spreading it elsewhere.

The focus of amendment No. 5 is that the unfairness test cannot achieve its desired effect unless the present lack of definition about what would be considered "fair" or "unfair" is cleared up. The Bill offers no guidance to consumers or the credit industry on the practices that will fall within or outside the boundaries of that test. Indeed, we do not know where those boundaries lie, which is why both the consumer organisations and the credit companies have asked for greater clarity.

The lack of clarity presents problems on both sides. Consumers, without a thorough understanding of their chances of success through the courts, will be deterred from pursuing cases that, if unsuccessful, could only add to their financial difficulties, stress and problems. On Second Reading and in Committee, we heard about how concerned people are about taking such matters to court. They are often people of very limited financial means and, even if they are supported by outside organisations or on legal aid, they are terrified about taking on a multi-billion-pound corporation in the courts.

2.30 pm

The credit industry, without a thorough understanding of what lending practices will be considered inappropriate, will remain unaware of the changes that it might need to make to ensure that its consumers are protected. As a consequence, lenders will be forced to become more cautious in their lending, achieving exactly the result that the Government least want. Those at the margins will be driven to the least scrupulous lenders, to the loan sharks or to the lenders charging the higher rates of interest.

The approach to tackling unfairness in lending must be targeted and consistent. Lenders need certainty from the outset that their contracts are secure and customers with genuine cases need to be clear about where they stand. My amendment aims to reach that level of clarity. It would allow the Office of Fair Trading, under its extended remit as provided for under the Bill, to issue guidance on those circumstances and activities that would be deemed unfair, subject to approval by the Secretary of State. By issuing such guidance, the level playing field that we all want restored will be that much more achievable. The Minister may argue that such guidance is not necessary or that it will somehow act as a constraint, but that argument simply does not hold true, because there are already legislative precedents that show how feasible and effective such guidance can be. The Unfair Contract Terms Act 1997 and the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contract Regulations 1999 demonstrate that it is possible to give sufficient guidance to consumers and creditors by means of a non-exhaustive list of the factors that are relevant to an assessment of fairness.

I draw the House's attention to annexe 1 of the directive on unfair commercial practices, which contains an extensive list of commercial circumstances or practices that are considered unfair in all circumstances. It says that misleading commercial practices include:

"Claiming to be a signatory to a code of conduct when the trader is not . . . Claiming that a code of conduct has an endorsement from a public or other body which it does not have . . . Falsely stating that a product will only be available for a very limited time, or that it will only be available on particular terms for a very limited time, in order to elicit an immediate decision and deprive consumers of sufficient opportunity or time to make an informed choice . . . Establishing, operating or promoting a pyramid promotional scheme where a customer gives consideration for the opportunity to receive compensation that is derived primarily from the introduction of other consumers into the scheme rather than from the sale or consumption of products . . . Passing on materially inaccurate information on market conditions or on the possibility of finding the product with the intention of inducing the consumer to acquire the product at conditions less favourable than normal market conditions" and

"Conducting personal visits to the consumer's home ignoring the consumer's request to leave or not to return except in circumstances and to the extent justified, under national law, to enforce a contractual obligation."

All hon. Members would endorse those as activities that would be unfair in all circumstances. There is therefore no good reason why a clear standard could not also have been applied to the Bill.

I also draw hon. Members' attention to the OFT guidance that was issued to all Standing Committee members by the Minister prior to the proceedings, in which the OFT was able to indicate examples illustrative of scenarios where it would consider imposition to be a requirement on licensees. If the OFT is capable of offering these examples, that clearly demonstrates that it is also capable of issuing guidance and examples relating to unfairness. That is a perfectly logical and sensible follow-on, and it is what the amendment calls for.

Unclear and ill-defined legal frameworks do not represent good law making and, in this case, do not represent positive steps towards offering better protection for consumers. We should realise from the precedents that the opportunity is there for us to give the Bill more authority and certainty. I firmly believe that we should seize that opportunity.

Amendment No. 3 aims to ensure greater certainty about what is meant by unfair relationships. Further to amendment No. 5, it requires the Office of Fair Trading to publish guidance on the scope of the unfairness test before the provisions on unfair relationships come into force. It would be unfair and inappropriate if the test were introduced before the advice and information was published.

The new provisions will clearly have a major impact on the way in which credit companies operate but they are not clear about the extent to which those companies may need to change their practices to conform with the Bill's requirements until they have the information. As we know from the Consumer Credit Act 1974, such changes can take a considerable time to implement. It is therefore right and proper that companies receive as much notice as possible. Any mistakes caused by unnecessary hurrying will impact negatively on the consumer.

Let me deal with amendment No. 6 on retrospection. Hon. Members know that the new unfairness test will apply retrospectively to any credit agreement that continues beyond the transitional period, which is set at one year from the date of the commencement of clause 20. Although I do not believe that applying law retrospectively is normally appropriate—indeed, it often represents bad law making—it is necessary in the circumstances that we are considering.

Many credit agreements run for a considerable length of time. Without a retrospective dimension to the Bill, too many people will be left uncovered by the protection that it offers. Given the extent to which the credit industry has changed in the 30 years since the 1974 Act, that would be unacceptable.

Nevertheless, I am worried that the Bill will create substantial unnecessary bureaucracy in relation to retrospection because of the number of shorter-term agreements that could be caught in its grasp. For example, an existing credit arrangement that is due to finish a few months beyond the transitional period will be subject to the provisions of the measure because of those few months. The cost, administration and time expended by lenders on adapting their processes to meet the changes will be significant. As we all know, those charges will be passed on to consumers in higher interest rates or additional charges. The amendment therefore excludes those agreements that will expire in two years after the transitional period. I am not wedded to the two-year period and would be willing to consider a shorter time if that would make it easier for the Under-Secretary to accept the principle of the amendment and if he undertook to table a Government amendment in another place. However, the principle is sound. The new rules and regulations would come into force, as currently planned, for agreements that last longer than two years after the one-year transitional period at the end of that transitional period. We should try to keep bureaucracy to a minimum for agreements with only a short time to run. It will ease the transition process for lenders and consequently help to alleviate the risks of consumers bearing extra costs.

The amendments therefore emphasise a desire for greater clarity in the Bill. The Under-Secretary has resisted accepting such proposals throughout our proceedings and I suspect that he will do so again, but I hope that, on reflection, having heard the argument once more, he will be prepared to budge.

Norman Lamb: We support the change in the test. The current test in the 1974 Act has been shown not to be fit for today's consumer market and it must therefore change. An unfairness test generally appears to meet the requirements. It provides some flexibility and it seems appropriate for today's substantial market. However, the lack of clarity and guidance creates genuine concerns.

The hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) referred to the burden of proof, which effectively means that one is guilty until proven innocent. That imposes an onerous burden. There is no guidance about what would subsequently be deemed unfair by a court and that is an unattractive scenario for the lending industry. It is also unattractive for consumers who are left simply not knowing their rights. The lack of clarity is dangerous in law making for the interests of both the consumer and those whom the measure seeks to control.

It has been said many times by many people, including me, that a court will inevitability consider this test at some point, and lay down guidelines. Is the Minister saying that he wants a court to provide that greater clarity for the industry and the consumer? I do not think that that would be satisfactory. First, it could take months or even years before we learn what the court decides the right guidelines should be for interpreting the unfairness test. Secondly, is it right that a court, rather than Parliament or a body accountable to Parliament, should determine those guidelines? That is an unattractive proposition.

The hon. Member for Wealden referred to other legislation in which attempts had been made to provide guidelines as to what is meant by unfairness, in the particular context of the legislation. He cited the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 and certain employment legislation. There are myriad guidelines for understanding what is meant by unfair dismissal. The ACAS code of practice is a case in point. It is provided by ACAS to help employers and, crucially, employees to understand the duties involved. In the context of this legislation, however, there is nothing. That is a serious concern, both for lenders and consumers.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am trying to resist the temptation to get involved in a discussion about unfairness. The hon. Gentleman must consider this issue in the context of the Bill and of the other measures that appear alongside the unfairness test. The whole purpose of the Bill is to provide for transparency and responsible lending. I shall resist going into detail about the unfairness test, because I know that I am not going to convince the hon. Gentleman or the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) of its appropriateness, but I ask him to consider the matter in the context of the Bill.

Norman Lamb: I absolutely understand the context and I am completely with the Minister in his aim of achieving transparency and responsible lending. I was talking about that earlier in relation to data sharing and it is absolutely the correct objective. That is why I generally support the test of unfairness. It will have a real effect in changing the culture in parts of the industry, and I hope that it will also address the concerns of the people who argue for a cap on interest rates. Under the test, we shall be able to consider all the circumstances, including the wording of the agreement and the behaviour of the parties involved. That is a good thing, but the Minister cannot deny the fact that there are no guidelines on how the provision is to be interpreted. A court will inevitably end up defining that, because Parliament has failed to do so.

Mr. Sutcliffe: The concept of unfairness exists in relation to other financial matters. To suggest that this is completely general flies in the face of the fact that such provisions exist elsewhere. Why is the hon. Gentleman trying to tie down what the court may consider? It is 30 years since the existing provisions were introduced, and there could be new ways of doing things that we have not been able to consider, yet he seems to be suggesting that we tie down the ability of the court to consider all these issues. He makes a fair point on interest rate caps and the unfairness test will deal with that issue.

Norman Lamb: The Minister is right to say that, at any one time, we might not have considered developments and practices that emerge at a later date. However, if guidance were to be as the amendment suggests, that would provide the flexibility that he is looking for. It would mean that the guidance could address new developments and practices that had not been thought of when the Bill was introduced. I do not think that he has made an argument for resisting the amendment. In addition, his challenge to me was: why should we seek to tie down the provision? I am not doing that. It does not have to be prescriptive and say that unfairness is, "This and this alone." As the hon. Member for Wealden outlined, however, a test in guidelines could say that particular practices will always be deemed unfair. That does not prejudice the generality of the provision, which allows the Office of Fair Trading and the courts to consider a wider range of practices and ways of behaving, and to rule ultimately that those other practices are also unfair.

"published periodically by the OFT",

2.45 pm

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that is precisely the point? At the moment, the consumer has absolutely no guidelines. Surely, under such a Bill, it is incumbent on some official body to give the consumer some guidelines as to what "unfair" means.

Norman Lamb: I agree. It is important both for the lending industry and consumers to have a greater understanding of what is intended by Parliament. We are sitting as Parliament setting new rules yet none of us can say precisely how this provision will be interpreted. It is right to provide flexibility for the future, but the amendment does that, as it enables the Office of Fair Trading to meet new developments, practices and procedures that might cause concern. It does not cast the provision in stone but provides the flexibility that the Minister seems to want.

The issue seems to come down to a choice between setting the guidelines through a body that is ultimately accountable to Parliament or allowing the court to do it for us. It will be one or the other—we all know that. The Minister seems to prefer the court doing it at some indeterminate date. I prefer a body that is ultimately accountable to Parliament to set the ball rolling and to have the flexibility to amend the guidelines.

On retrospection, the hon. Member for Wealden raises a legitimate point: two years is too long. It would be too much of a bureaucratic burden suddenly to impose all the new obligations in relation to contracts that are about to expire, but the provision of two years goes too far. I hope that the Minister might respond by accepting that the Bill should provide for a shorter period to exclude agreements that are due to conclude very soon.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): I had not intended to speak on this clause, but I was prompted by the comments of the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb). A fundamental principle is at stake as to who makes law. If the Minister will forgive me, there is a circularity in his argument that we do not want to bind the hands of judges. Actually, judges want precisely such clarity from legislators—they do not want vague legislation because that will inevitably lead to a lack of clarity, and if the hon. Member for North Norfolk will forgive me, only lawyers can gain from that in the long run. We need Parliament to be clear.

As we know, the first thing that a judge will do in such cases is to say, "What was Parliament's intention?" They will look at the Committee Hansard and at the comments of the Minister in particular. The problem is that the Minister refuses to be drawn on the issue of unfairness. The judge will therefore be left in the peculiar situation of having to interpret unfairness when the Minister and the Government have refused to give any guidance. Precisely that court-based approach has led us into this cul-de-sac, under the Consumer Credit Act 1974, with extortionate lending. We ended up with a very narrow interpretation, which was not the fault of the judiciary but of that Bill, too, because the Government did not set out clearly what was Parliament's intention.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I realise that I am not following my own advice. I am getting involved and trying to make everyone understand where we are coming from.

The hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) mentioned the unfair contract regulations and the unfair commercial practices directive. There are already guidelines on what can be considered, which deal with specific issues in the regulations. The unfair credit test involves the substance of agreements and relationships. That is the point that Members are missing. It is the substance that we want the courts to be able to consider.

Adam Price: I am not a lawyer, but I think that there is a problem here. It is possible that judges could draw on precedent in the form of definitions of unfairness deriving from common law, case law and so forth, which might not coincide with the Government's underlying objective. Unless the Government are specific in this context—for there is case law on unfairness in other contexts—the definition eventually handed down by the courts may not be the one that the Government want. The amendments allow flexibility, so that the general definition can reflect changes in the consumer credit market over time. Ultimately, however, given the direct impact that this may have on our constituents, Parliament should decide on the definition rather than a judge handing down some landmark judgment in a couple of years.

Mr. Sutcliffe: As we have discussed unfair relationships at some length today, in Committee and on Second Reading, I will not allow myself to be drawn back into the debate—

Mr. Vaizey: The hon. Gentleman is already doing that.

Mr. Sutcliffe: It may indeed occur.

Amendment No. 5 tries to do two things. First, it seeks to require the court to have regard to any OFT guidance on the unfair relationships provisions when making decisions under clause 19. Secondly, it seeks to require the Secretary of State to approve any OFT guidance on unfair relationships before it is published. As the unfair relationships provisions make clear, the court may have regard to any relevant matter.

The amendment seems to assume that the test is somehow dependent on the OFT's guidance. It is not. The OFT's guidance is simply that: guidance. It will set out the circumstances in which the OFT will act under its powers in part 8 of the Enterprise Act 2002, and it will not seek to interpret or define unfairness. It is not one of the OFT's functions as a regulator to interpret the law for the courts. The courts are not bound by the OFT's guidance and need not have regard to it if it is not relevant to the specific case. Obviously, if the guidance is relevant, which we could expect it to be quite often, the court may have regard to it. The court's application of the new test need not and should not be linked to the OFT's guidance as the amendment suggests. Indeed, as it can have regard to the guidance, the amendment is unnecessary.

The hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) also wants to make the OFT's guidance on the unfair relationships provisions subject to the Secretary of State's approval. That appears to be based on the requirement in the Bill relating to the OFT's powers to impose civil penalties. In that instance, the OFT is prevented from imposing a civil penalty until it has published a statement of policy that has been approved by the Secretary of State. Given the seriousness of that power, which goes beyond the usual regulatory functions, the Government felt it necessary for the statement of policy to be approved by the Secretary of State.

In the Enterprise Act, Parliament reconstituted the OFT as an independent regulator. Parliament decided that the way in which the OFT used its powers to enforce the legislation for which it is responsible should be free of ministerial control. The amendment would fetter that freedom. It would mean that the way in which the OFT used its enforcement powers in respect of unfair relationships would be subject to ministerial control. We do not accept that that should happen and I earnestly ask the hon. Gentleman to consider withdrawing the amendment.

Amendment No. 3 also appears to suggest that the unfair relationships provisions depend on the OFT's guidance for their meaning and effect. They do not. The OFT's guidance is simply that—guidance. It is guidance on the circumstances in which it will take action, under its powers in part 8 of the Enterprise Act 2002, against creditors who enter into unfair relationships. The 2002 Act provides that the OFT may take action against a breach of specific statutory requirements, including through the unfair relationships provisions, where harm is done to the collective interests of United Kingdom consumers. The OFT's guidance will not seek to interpret or to define an unfair relationship, although it could refer to conduct that it considers may give rise to, or contribute to, unfair relationships.

Mr. Vaizey: The Minister said in Committee that the unfair credit terms regulations do apply. Will he confirm that he meant the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999? If they do apply, the OFT could surely make that clear in its guidance.

Mr. Sutcliffe: People have to comply with the regulations, and the OFT could indeed make that clear. I hope that that satisfies the hon. Gentleman and clarifies the position regarding the unfairness test, although I suspect that it does not, given his view of that test.

The test operates independently of the OFT's guidance and, as I said, the courts are not bound by the guidance and do not have to have regard to it. Obviously, if the guidance is relevant—we can expect that it often will be—the court may have regard to it. A court's application of the new test need not—indeed, should not—be linked to the OFT's guidance in the way suggested in the amendment. I therefore ask that the amendment be withdrawn.

Adam Price: Notwithstanding the fact that the Minister does not want be drawn down this particular road, will he confirm that, as he seemed to suggest in a recent radio interview, a failure to take account of the ability to pay would constitute unfairness in this context?

Mr. Sutcliffe: Here we go again. The last time that we discussed this issue, I doubtless referred the hon. Gentleman to the Pepper v. Hart judgment, pointing out that Ministers do not set specific parameters because that could restrict us in what we are trying to achieve. On the example that he gives, I believe what he says to be right, although perhaps my saying so will cause further problems. None the less, if that is what I said on the radio, it must be right.

Amendment No. 6, which I have had some problem understanding, seems to provide that the unfair relationships provisions should not apply to agreements made before those provisions are brought into force, but which end within a period of two years from the end of the transitional period. It seems to provide an additional transitional period to the transitional period already provided for in the Bill, thereby misconceiving the way in which the transitional provisions work. For the sake of clarity, I will explain those provisions again.

The unfair relationships provisions will apply to all new agreements entered into after the day on which those provisions commence. There is no transitional period for these agreements; indeed, there is no need for one. The unfair relationships provisions will apply only to existing agreements made before the day on which these provisions commence, and which are ongoing after the completion of a transitional period. The provisions will not apply to any such agreements that end before the completion of the transitional period.

The transitional period will be a minimum of 12 months, and the Secretary of State may extend it by order. Different transitional periods may apply to different classes of agreement, so there need not be one transitional period. There may be several, each applying to different classes of agreements, and they may be for different lengths of time. The Department will consult the industry to determine whether particular types of agreements should be treated differently, and it will consider the circumstances in which the period should be extended. Indeed, it has had some preliminary discussions with industry groups.

The amendment would add a further transitional period to the transitional period provided for in the Bill. The transitional period is intended to provide creditors with time to adjust. We have set the minimum period at 12 months, but as I said, it can be extended by different periods for different types of loans. The provisions are flexible, and we have built in the ability to change the requirements if necessary. I therefore hope that the hon. Member for Wealden accepts that the amendment is unnecessary, and that he will withdraw it.

Charles Hendry: I am disappointed with the Minister, as we hoped that he would be prepared to think again about this issue. The clarity that we are seeking through this amendment is something that everybody wants, including all the parties, his own colleagues and all those who spoke on Second Reading. Members even wanted such an amendment in Committee; they simply failed to vote for it.

There is a huge demand for greater clarity and I believe that the Minister will, in time, look back and regret the missed opportunity. The Bill will be less effective and the interests of consumers will be prejudiced. The people whom the Minister is most seeking to protect will suffer the most, because lenders will become more cautious. Perhaps, in many years' time, when the Minister is wrapped in ermine and writing his autobiography entitled, "I Can See Where You Are Coming From", he will realise that he missed a golden opportunity. He had the chance to make a difference, but did not take it. We must now expect huge delay before the legislation will work effectively.

3 pm

The Minister said that the twin purposes of the Bill were transparency and responsible lending. However, unless the detail that we are asking for is there, neither of those purposes will be brought effectively into practice. The Minister is condemning us to leaving all the sorting out to the courts. That means that we will have to wait years. It will take many years for cases to be brought to court, go through all the appeals processes and the rest of it. It will also cost a phenomenal amount of money. As was said earlier, the only people to benefit are the lawyers. It could not have been the hon. Member for North Norfolk who said it, because he is a lawyer. [Interruption.] Yes, perhaps he can see a new career opening up for him outside this place. The costs will be huge.

We heard earlier about the fear factor—the sheer concerns that people will have when they face the option of taking on a massive multi-billion pound corporation in the courts. People will decide that they simply cannot go through with it. Even if they have full backing from the consumer associations, they will say that they just cannot face going through it all and will back down. The issue will drag on for longer and longer. Once a judgment is eventually reached, there will be debate about its implications. Either it will mean that the lenders could have been less cautious in the intervening years—they will subsequently know with greater clarity what they can do—or alternatively, millions of agreements will have to be rewritten and compensation paid because the system was not clear enough in the first place.

All we are asking for is more clarity in defining fairness. It does not have to be absolutely detailed; it could be as we cited in the European directive, setting out some measures that could be agreed on all sides to be clearly unfair in all circumstances. That would have been a step forward in itself and I think that it is profoundly sad that the Minister is not prepared to move further on that. As I said, everyone is calling for this change: the industry wants it, consumer groups want it, Members on both sides of the House want it. It is very sad indeed that the Minister will not concede any ground.

I hope that another Minister will look at the problem again in the other place and I hope that that Minister can find another way forward. The Minister is determined not to give ground, so I am prepared to withdraw the amendment. I was glad to hear about the flexibility that already exists in respect of the transitional period. That provides some of the reassurance that we are seeking. I am sorry to end Report on a discordant note, but I have to say that the Minister has an opportunity to show that he has really listened to the demands that came out of the consultation. It is a matter of great sadness to all of us that he is not prepared to do so.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 48

ENTRY TO PREMISES UNDER WARRANT

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 41, line 19, leave out 'includes a reference to' and insert 'means'.

We move the amendment on the suggestion of the Law Society of Scotland. Its purpose is to ensure that, in Scotland, only a sheriff and not a justice of the peace will be entitled to grant the search warrants provided for in clause 48. I discussed the issues before tabling the amendment and discovered that the Law Society of Scotland takes the view that the powers to grant the warrants under the clause should extend in Scotland only to sheriffs.

A justice of the peace in Scotland, unlike in England and Wales, may not be legally qualified and so may be unfamiliar with the criteria for granting the warrants under clause 48. Limiting the power to sheriffs would also bring the Bill into line with recent legislation passed in this House. For example, sections 289 and 290 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 relate to the approval of a judicial officer for searches under section 289. In Scotland, that power is limited to sheriffs whereas, under section 290(3)(a), in England and Wales the judicial officer is a justice of the peace.

Another example is the Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003, section 17 of which provides that warrants may be granted by a justice of the peace in respect of England, Wales and Northern Ireland. In contrast, section 18 provides that, in Scotland, warrants may be granted only by a sheriff.

Again, section 156 of the Extradition Act 2003 provides that search and seizure warrants may be granted by a justice of the peace in England and Wales, but section 156(1) makes it clear that a sheriff grants them in Scotland. Finally, section 38 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants Etc.) Act 2004 provides that, in Scotland, only a sheriff will be involved in granting warrants.

The Law Society of Scotland suggests that clause 48 of the Bill is similar to the four recent Acts to which I have referred, and that the appropriate authority in Scotland for the granting of warrants is the sheriff. Amendment No. 2, therefore, would maintain consistency in the law on search and seizure warrants in Scotland, and ensure that the warrants under clause 48 are granted only by officials who are legally qualified.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I thank the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) for the amendment, but I shall be consistent to the end and say that we intend to resist it.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the amendment is intended to make the Act consistent with other legislation, such as the Extradition Act 2003, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 and the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants Etc.) Act 2004. The Bill is concerned with the regulation of the affairs of businesses and consumer protection, and the provision under discussion covers entry into premises to obtain information in relation to fitness to hold a consumer credit licence. It is, therefore, not in the same league as the other legislation to which I and the hon. Gentleman have referred.

The Bill is consistent with the 1974 Act, which at section 162(3) provides that in Scotland justices of the peace and sheriffs may issue warrants to enter premises. The clause is also consistent with section 176 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, section 297B of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, section 111 of the Medicines Act 1968, and section 1 of the Breeding of Dogs Act 1990.

I can understand the concern expressed by the hon. Gentleman about warrants in cases where there is a considerable risk of criminal activity, imprisonment or danger to affected persons. However, the Bill does not fall into that category, and for that reason we have made it consistent with the 1974 Act and similar legislation such as the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000.

Furthermore, from a practical perspective, the amendment would place an additional burden on the sheriffs and mean that, in addition to their already considerable responsibilities, the OFT or trading standards officers would always need to obtain warrants from them. The Bill provides the regulator with the flexibility to obtain a warrant from a judicial officer without undue inconvenience.

I hope that that explanation will be sufficient for the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Reid: The Minister listed various Acts from several years ago, under which a justice of the peace as well as a sheriff is able to grant search and seizure warrants. I shall take careful note of what he said, and look at the provisions in those Acts. I shall also discuss the matter further with the Law Society of Scotland. We may return to the matter in another place, but I shall consider the Minister's response before taking it any further.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

3.10 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The House has considered the Bill at some length and on several occasions, and I am pleased with the consensus that we share on many of the issues. With the

[Mr. Sutcliffe]

Bill, we are creating a modern framework for the regulation of consumer credit in the United Kingdom. We want a market that is fair and that rewards competitiveness, innovation, choice and enterprise, but we also want to stamp out the irresponsible and unfair lending practices that do so much to harm many consumers. I believe that the Bill fulfils those aims.

The Bill is the centrepiece of the most ambitious reform of consumer credit regulation since the early 1970s. The reform process involves not just legislative change, but a cross-Government strategy to tackle the problems of over-indebtedness in our society. Dealing with debt is more than just a consumer credit issue. Among other things, we are looking at why people get into debt problems and how to deal with the causes of those problems. We are funding more face-to-face debt advice for consumers, with £45 million over the next two years from the financial inclusion fund, and we are considering the best ways to tackle the pernicious problem of illegal money lending.

This long-awaited Bill has much support from consumer and industry groups and from hon. Members on both sides of the House. I thank hon. Members for contributing to our debates on the Bill. The involvement of all hon. Members who have explained their experiences has been invaluable in developing the Bill. I am grateful, in particular, to my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and the hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway), who chaired the Committee so effectively, and to the hon. Members for Wealden (Charles Hendry) and for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) and all the other hon. Members who served on the Standing Committee. Hon. Members' support for the Bill is reflected in its swift progress in this Session.

From our constituency postbags, we know of the many problems that people suffer because of debt. The debate on Second Reading gave us the chance to hear about many of those problems and the issues that affect business in developing an effective credit market. The Committee sittings offered us a chance to discuss with hon. Members concerns about specific aspects of the Bill.

In what I hope will be the final debate on the Bill in the House, I should like to concentrate on a number of issues that have been of interest to hon. Members. In Committee, the hon. Member for Wealden asked many pertinent questions about issues of great detail. As he said, I have written to him to answer those questions, and hon. Members can find copies of those answers in the Library. Although I understand where the hon. Gentleman's concerns are coming from, it is important to remember that the Bill will provide a framework for regulation. It will allow Parliament to impose general requirements that can be fleshed out in secondary legislation. So we will consult on that detail and can adapt it to changing circumstances.

Hon. Members will recall that I recently took great care to explain the unfair relationship provisions to the Committee. Those provisions must be considered in the context of the laws that deal with specific unfair practices and terms, as well as the way in which the courts will apply the law, and I will not get involved in that issue again today. We have considered extensive arguments from across the sector, and I believe that those provisions constitute the most effective means for consumers to obtain the redress through the courts, if they choose to take that route when resolving their dispute. The approach taken in the Bill is a solution that provides comprehensive and flexible protection for consumers, while allowing the industry to make credit available to all, not most, consumers and to continue to innovate.

Some hon. Members are concerned about the powers of the Office of Fair Trading. We must ask ourselves whether the body that enforces the Consumer Credit Act 1974 should have the power to investigate potential wrong-doing and whether consumers should be able to operate confidently in the market, safe in the knowledge that they are dealing with responsible lenders. The answer to both questions is yes. The Bill will provide a regime that ensures that there is fairness for consumers, that businesses are competitive and that the regulator has the powers that it needs to ensure that is so.

The OFT does not have an unfettered power to act. As a public body, it is has a responsibility to act reasonably and proportionately. In relation to its powers under the 1974 Act, it is subject to certain constraints and to an independent appeals tribunal. The powers that the Bill will give to the OFT are an essential foundation for a modern and effective consumer credit market. They are not a luxury. So if we enable the regulators to penalise misconduct, we must also enable consumers to resolve disputes for themselves. That involve introducing a system that is cheap, fair and easy to use. The alternative dispute resolution scheme in the Bill is all those things. It is informal. There is no need for hearings; a dispute can be dealt with in writing and issues can be cleared up over the phone. It can adapt to changes in the market quickly. Not only will it empower consumers to act with confidence in the market, it will also ensure stable competition across the credit sector.

In Committee, I noted some suggestions that clause 24 would impose a requirement to be licensed on retailers who do no more than hold on to a card at the point of sale when requested to do so by the card issuer. It is certainly not the Government's intention to include that in the definition of debt administration. At that time, I said that if, on reflection, the clause was wrong in that respect we would table an amendment to clarify the position. Having considered the issue carefully, I have concluded that the definition of "debt administration" does not include holding on to a card at the point of sale when requested to do so, thus no amendment is necessary.

Members will be aware of the speed with which the Bill went through Committee, which is an indication of the broad degree of consensus that surrounds it. As it stands, the Bill fulfils everything we set out to do. However, the Government have always listened, and will continue to do so. We have listened to the concerns of Members about the timing of notices of sums in arrears for short-term credit, which we discussed earlier, and have now made an adjustment. In the context of the Bill, I have committed to look further at other issues.

I have restated the Government's commitment to look further at the issue of credit card cheques under secondary legislation, and the Department is working on that. Similarly, I have arranged, with my Front-Bench counterparts, to meet the credit card industry on 18 July, before the recess, to discuss how industry is addressing, through self-regulation, concerns about unsolicited increases in credit card limits.

The Bill enjoys wide support both in the House and among consumer and industry groups. Some aspects of the Bill give rise to concerns, and I have no doubt that they will be explored again in this debate and as the Bill goes through the other place. However, after more than four years' work, I believe that the Bill represents the foundation of a fair and competitive 21st-century consumer credit market. It enhances consumer rights and redress, while giving business confidence that it is competing in fair markets that are fit for the modern world. It encourages effective competition, driven by demanding and discerning consumers.

The Bill is important and I commend it to the House.

3.17 pm

Charles Hendry: I have been delighted to have the chance to lead for the Opposition on such an important Bill, which will help to bring consumer protection in the UK up to speed with the considerable changes that have taken place in the credit industry in the 30 years since the introduction of the Consumer Credit Act 1974.

The extent to which things have changed in terms of the size of the industry, the range of products on offer and the level of indebtedness among consumers shows how outdated that legislation has become and how imperative it is that new measures are introduced to respond to the situation. From the outset, we have made it clear that the Conservatives give the Bill broad support in achieving that goal and we are fully committed to action to root out loan sharks and bad practice, especially as it is the most vulnerable who are usually the hardest hit.

We have raised concerns and probed the Minister on a number of issues and problems along the way. That was part of the process of ensuring that we get things right this time and that the Bill can cope with the demands that will be placed on it by future changes in the credit industry. Had the Minister been prepared to say "yes" a few more times, the Bill would have been even better, but we shall leave that to our friends in another place.

I pay tribute to Members on both sides of the House for their expertise and for their determination to look after the interests of people preyed on by those who seek to exploit their financial circumstances and their lack of understanding of sharp lending practices. An understanding of the issues and the passion to drive them forward is a good combination and we have been lucky that Members have demonstrated that.

Many Members referred to tragic cases where individuals were caught up in a vicious cycle of worsening debt, often caused by unscrupulous lenders and unfair practices. That was an important part of our considerations and it is those lenders and practices that the Bill seeks to stamp out. At the same time, it is important that the Bill does not stifle the ability to operate of credit businesses that behave responsibly and whose services are often of great benefit to individuals and families, especially those on low incomes. We recognise that the overwhelming majority of credit providers act responsibly and the legislation, although it will inevitably affect them, is not targeted at them.

As the Minister said at the outset, debt of itself is not bad; it is irresponsible lending that causes the problem. By far one of the most important aspects of the Bill has been the new unfair relationship test, which replaces the old, impractical, extortionate credit test. We support the new test as a means of clamping down on loan sharks and unfair practices but, as the Minister is well aware, we are concerned about the lack of detail. As he knows, we have argued powerfully for that greater detail and we are disappointed that he has not given ground on it. Many of us believe that the Bill will be of less benefit to consumers as a result. It should be Parliament that gives the detail, not the courts, with all the time and huge costs that that will involve. It means that lawyers will benefit rather than borrowers.

Many still do not think that the Bill goes far enough. Even the Daily Mirror quoted just this week the chief executive of the Nationwide building society, who said:

> "It is a great shame the opportunity was missed at the Committee stage to improve the Bill. While we support the broad thrust of the Bill, we still don't believe it goes far enough. We strongly urge MPs to grasp this last opportunity to make a real difference to consumers. Some practices, like credit card providers applying payments to the cheapest debt first, remain unfair and can only be to the detriment of the consumer. Any debt counsellor worth their salt would tell you to pay off your most expensive debt first."

There have been areas where we have tried to make those changes and I am disappointed that we did not succeed in persuading the Government to agree to them.

We also welcome the new systems of redress provided through the Financial Ombudsman Service. The Bill also provides expanded powers for the OFT as a means of improving regulation. Again, we agree that better regulation of licensees is a crucial step forward, but we remain concerned that the OFT's powers will go unchecked and that it will be judge and jury. We would like to see more control retained by Government and Parliament over its actions.

Another crucial dimension of the Bill is the increased level of information provided to consumers concerning their credit agreements. That, too, is an important step forward towards tipping the balance of power back towards consumers. They need to be granted an equal standing and to have access to appropriate information to make informed choices over their credit decisions. It is also a vital means of helping consumers avoid getting into trouble with their agreements. I am pleased that the Minister has been working with us to ensure success in this respect.

I join the Minister in paying tribute to our two Chairmen, the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and my hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway), for the way in which they kept us in order during debates. I pay tribute to hon. Members on both sides of the House who have spoken with such passion and commitment on what is an important area for many of our constituents. In particular I pay tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning), for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) and for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire), who as new Members have shown tremendous commitment, understanding and expertise. I do not restrict my comments to Conservative Members. This has been an extremely valuable process on all sides, with many years of expertise brought to bear.

[Charles Hendry]

We have had a wide-ranging debate. We have focused in particular on issues, such as loan sharks, but we have also discussed a helicopter clause, so that when the Prime Minister's friends need to buy a new helicopter or yacht at short notice, they can be given greater assistance in doing so. We have made progress on those issues. Naturally, I pay tribute to the Minister who has been courteous and charming throughout. He is the natural heir to General de Gaulle and Mrs. Thatcher in being able to say no so forcefully and so often, but I wonder whether perhaps he should move in his next life to the Department for Transport because his sense of direction is remarkable. He always knows where we are coming from and understands where we are heading in every contribution. As I said earlier, it is just a shame he would not help us get there.

I thank the officials at the DTI and in the House. Departmental officials must have dreaded yet another list of Hendry questions. No doubt forests were torn down, gallons of ink were expended and writers' cramp inflicted simply to give the Minister the answer as quickly as possible. They have been extraordinarily helpful, too, in providing written replies subsequently. I was particularly struck by the one about my challenge to the Minister to find some fees which had gone down under this Government. They produced an extensive list of Companies House charges. However, I win on points. The Directors Register by e-mail has indeed gone down from £3 to £2.50 but things like the full snapshot of the Directors Register has increased from £60,000 to £120,000. The list shows that the general drive is upward, even if there are some examples of fees that have come down. In any case, the officials have provided a great service, both in Committee and subsequently.

The Minister has made a tremendous effort to bring the Bill back to the House so quickly, and we all pay tribute to him for doing so. He should be praised for that, and for consistently dealing with our amendments with great courtesy and good humour. I am pleased with the level of consensus that we have struck throughout the Bill's progress and, although we have not always been able to agree on the detail, we all want to see the same end product—more protection for consumers, better systems of redress, more access to information and better regulation.

I regret that the Government rejected our proposals on matters such as credit card checks and controlling unsolicited increases in credit limits. I sense that most hon. Members supported us and we will look back and regret that we were not more effective. I am also disappointed that some issues were ruled out by the Chair— although of course we respect that judgment—such as the amendment on the standardisation of interest rate calculations, which is a matter of tremendous importance.

I remain concerned by the complacency about the growing level of debt that we face in this country. The Minister was able to point to the rising value of property and the huge bedrock of capital that supports that debt, but we are seeing a worrying growth in credit card arrears, bad debts, mortgage repossessions and bankruptcies. We need be aware that the problem could be getting worse.

We have, however, gone a substantial way to reaching the aims that we set out to achieve and we all look forward to monitoring the Bill's progress. To end on a conciliatory note, I congratulate the Minister once again on his personal commitment to ensuring that the Bill becomes law.

3.26 pm

Norman Lamb: I join the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) in thanking the Minister for the approach that he has taken throughout. He has been willing to discuss and debate, and to be constructive. We are slightly frustrated that he has not been able to go along with some of our constructive amendments to improve the Bill, but the whole debate on the Bill has been conducted in a civilised way. To that extent, I pay tribute to everybody who has contributed to that debate. It is a blessed relief sometimes to be able to discuss issues constructively, without seeking to score points at every possible opportunity. The Minister played a big part in that and I thank him for it.

I also wish to pay tribute to the officials who assisted the Committee and the Minister throughout the process. It was painful having to go through it all again just a few months after the last time, but I thank them for their hard work. I also join the hon. Member for Wealden in thanking the Chairmen of the Committee, the hon. Members for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway).

The Bill follows an explosion in the availability of credit since the original legislation was passed through Parliament—it took some time to come into force—back in 1974. It is worth saying again that the availability of credit is a good thing. We all need credit, and it is often those on the lowest incomes who have the greatest need for it, It would be wholly wrong to adopt a sort of paternalistic approach and deny people access to credit when they need it. The whole issue comes down to the case for responsible lending, which should be combined with responsibility on the part of the individual borrower. However, so many people are vulnerable, for one reason or another—be it mental health, age or just the pressures of life—so the industry bears a great obligation to act responsibly. The Bill, however, sets a modern framework within which the industry can operate.

The Bill is welcome, but it is long overdue. I pay tribute to the Treasury Committee, on which I served, for pushing the Department of Trade and Industry to introduce a Bill in Parliament. Such as measure was debated for a long time. The Minister said that there had been four years of hard work, but at one stage it seemed as if that would become five or six years. The Treasury Committee played an important part in pushing the Department in the right direction.

Mr. Sutcliffe indicated assent.

Norman Lamb: I am pleased that the Minister agrees.

I very much hope that the Treasury Committee will continue to monitor the industry, because although there has been genuine progress and the Bill modernises the legislative framework, there is still a long way to go before the industry always behaves responsibly and consumers avoid getting into serious difficulty. There are some areas where progress still needs to be made. First, there are still unacceptable practices. I hope that the unfairness test will address some of our concerns, but pernicious charges are often imposed, as I have experienced myself. Payment may be due to go into an account but, for some reason, it does not. Consequently, the cheques that one writes are not covered. One might have to pay a charge of £30 a cheque, so if one has written five cheques one faces costs of £150. The equivalent interest rate would be a substantial one, and many people get into serious difficulty as a result of those exorbitant charges. That is the subject of an investigation, and I hope that the outcome will be a more competitive market. Remarkably, all the companies manage to charge roughly the same amount for going over the credit limit or for failing to pay on time.

Credit card cheques were mentioned by the Minister, and are a serious concern, as they tempt people to use their credit card inappropriately. I remember when Matt Barrett, the chairman of Barclays, had his wonderful Ratner moment in the Treasury Committee, but he was quite right to say that he would not advise his son to use his credit card as a means of borrowing over time. He would advise him to use it as a means of payment. However, sending people credit card cheques so that they use their credit cards to borrow on a long-term basis is wholly inappropriate. Most people do not realise that interest applies immediately—it is therefore different from the interest on credit card purchases—so they are not aware of the problems that they will experience as a result of those charges. The Minister has undertaken to take a further look at that. I hope that he does so and produces an effective solution to tackle the problem. We may be able to discuss that at our joint meeting with the banks which, again, I welcome. The banking code is a voluntary means to address many of those concerns and avoids the problem of over-prescriptive regulation. I therefore urge the industry to respond positively.

The hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning) raised the transfer of credit balances, which is another serious concern. People who have transferred a debt of £5,000 with nil interest for a year go out and make some purchases with their card. They think that they are paying off the purchases but, in fact, they are paying off the transfer debt at nil interest, and are paying interest on their purchases. Again, that is the sort of problem that is most appropriately dealt with through the banking code or by voluntary agreement, but the industry must respond. If it fails to respond, I hope that the Treasury Committee and the Department will be on its back demanding a positive response.

The second issue of principle that still has not been addressed and which the Bill fails to address is that for a genuinely competitive market, one needs informed consumers. On the cost of borrowing, we do not have informed consumers. Although we have sorted out the APR problem, we have not sorted out the problem of the calculation of interest rates. It is a pity that the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Wealden was not selected for debate today. I understand how these things must be done, but that is a crucial issue. When there are 10 different means of calculating interest, no consumer will be able to compare one card with another. There will not be transparency until that problem is resolved. I hope that the Minister finds a way of addressing the problem and that we can discuss it directly with the industry.

The third issue is data sharing, the subject of a new clause tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) and me today. Because it was not selected, the issue again remains unresolved. As has been said by others, the Bill is the golden opportunity to address these problems. While the Bill continues to progress through the other place, it is a time to put pressure on the industry to get its act together. However, as the industry says, it needs a legislative change in order for it to be able to share data under the historic agreements introduced before the implementation of the Data Protection Act 1998. It is a crucial issue, which the Government need to address.

The fourth issue is financial education. The changes will have little impact unless we increase the level of financial education generally in society. There has been an explosion in the availability of credit and credit products. We have not had a commensurate revolution in financial education. Schools and the Department for Education and Skills need to engage in that. The Minister can use his authority to engage with others to bring about real change.

The fifth issue is the availability of advice and assistance. In parts of the country there is access to a remarkably good service, often provided by citizens advice bureaux and other advice agencies, but there are gaps in the network that need to be filled. Our party has argued that the industry ought to contribute to a common fund. At present there are all sorts of different arrangements whereby, perhaps for competitive advantage, companies enter agreements with advice agencies to offer support and advice when needed. Unless that is done comprehensively, gaps will remain.

I had a case in my constituency, involving the Holt citizens advice bureau and two other bureaux in other hon. Members' constituencies. They have had their three-year lottery grant. Like so many similar organisations, they have provided an enormous amount of advice during that period. Some 40 per cent. of the advice that is given relates to debt. That is in a market town which many people would regard as reasonably prosperous, but there is hidden deprivation and lack of financial security in every part of the country.

What happens when that three years comes to an end, as it did earlier this year? An application for renewal was refused, so the funding came to an end. There is a cliff face. I am constantly frustrated by the availability of grants from central Government and from other agencies which have a defined life period, often helping to provide an essential service, and when it comes to an end the whole scheme collapses. That is not good public policy. Advice is no longer available in that part of north Norfolk and, although I have written to the Association for Payment Clearing Services and the British Bankers Association and asked them to help, the industry as a whole should ensure that a full network of advice is in place across the country, which would be a major advance. Again, I urge the Minister to engage with the industry on that front.

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the new consumer direct helpline, and his constituents can ring 08454 040506 to obtain advice. He is right that the network needs to be developed, but I know that he welcomes the £45 million contribution from the Government to financial inclusion funds dealing with education and financial support.

Norman Lamb: I welcome that contribution, but my point is that the industry should play its part and that we must urge them to make it happen.

We have not addressed the issue of an interest rate cap today, but it was passionately debated on Second Reading and in Committee—Rev. Paul Nicolson is a particularly effective advocate for the cause. I have not been persuaded of the case, and my position is based on research commissioned by the DTI, which has been heavily criticised for the lack of evidence. The Minister should ensure that more authoritative and deeper research is carried out to compare jurisdictions with interest rate caps with other jurisdictions.

None of us feels comfortable about the interest rates charged by some doorstep lenders and others, but the providers of mainstream credit often get people into difficulty because of the combination of charges and the lack of data sharing. The interest rates issue specifically relates to the most impoverished in our society, because the poorest members of society are paying the highest rates of interest. The Department should monitor the matter closely and commission further research so that we achieve a greater understanding and try to reach a consensus about the evidence before drawing further conclusions.

The Minister is mistaken about the unfairness test. There is serious concern about a lack of guidance for both the lender and the borrower on what "unfairness" means in that particular context. The matter comes down to the whether Parliament or an agency that is accountable to Parliament should decide, or whether a court should decide. The Minister has chosen the option of the court deciding, so we will be left with an uncertain wait, which may last for years, for an unaccountable court to provide the guidelines on how to interpret unfairness. That arrangement is unsatisfactory, and, in a sense, Parliament has abdicated its responsibility to provide clear legislation that lets everyone know where they stand.

I have raised a number of concerns and issues that are not dealt with satisfactorily in the Bill, for understandable reasons. However, those issues remain unresolved, and the Minister and his Department, together with others such as the Select Committee, must ensure that we make further progress to make the industry act responsibly for the benefit of consumers.

3.44 pm

James Brokenshire: I welcome the Bill, which introduces a reform that is long overdue and reflects changes in practice. The credit market has changed enormously since the Consumer Credit Act 1974 was introduced. It is pleasing that the Government have dealt with the matter so soon in this Parliament. It is important to provide greater protections to those who are seeking credit, and that is a key element of what the Bill tries to do in seeking to protect the most vulnerable members of our communities.

I thank the Minister for the way in which he has handled interventions and awkward questions from me and from various other Members, and for his patience with us as new Members, which has been much appreciated.

It will probably come as no surprise to the Minister that I am left a little disappointed by the end result of our deliberations. As he knows, I am a lawyer by training, which means that I am picky and like Bills to be drafted in a particular way. Like other lawyers, I look for certainty in terms of the way in which legislation is interpreted. I fear that certain parts of the Bill still have elements of vagueness, particularly in relation to the unfairness test. We have discussed that on Second Reading, in Committee and today on Report, so I do not intend to go over old ground—the Minister is clearly familiar with the arguments.

The Minister proffered the olive branch of the Office of Fair Trading guidance, but that has certain limitations, as the OFT itself recognises in the guidance note that it has already produced. That says that it is ultimately for the courts to decide what happens in a case of unfairness and whether something is to be regarded as unfair practice, although it may give some pointers. I hope that that will help in providing the level of certainty that Members on both sides of the House are seeking.

On one level I can understand why one can advance the argument of keeping a general approach on the unfairness test: it is in order to say to lenders, "We've done it this way deliberately to keep you on your toes and on the right side of the line, and you've got to think about it very carefully." My only fear is that that could operate in the opposite way. As regards access to justice, the lack of certainty makes it difficult to bring a legal case or to force a lender who has not been abiding by the rules to reach an early settlement. There is an overlap with the OFT and the financial penalties for inappropriate practice, as well as the powers under part 8 of the Enterprise Act 2002. Again, that has certain limitations, as there has to be a sustained practice that can be regarded as unfair across the whole industry.

It is possible to look at the right to impose sanctions in a slightly different way. The OFT says in its notes on imposing financial penalties:

> "Where . . . a licence holder voluntarily provides compensation to consumers, this can be taken into account by the OFT when considering the appropriate amount of penalty to be imposed. This would exclude situations where the consumer involved had already approached the courts or the Financial Ombudsman Service, because in this context that would not be a voluntary action by the licensee."

I acknowledge that that signifies an intent to try to force lenders to examine their actions carefully. If somebody approached the courts and the ombudsman's service, and the lender recognised that he had not acted appropriately, I would hope that the OFT has some flexibility to take that into consideration. I hope that matters are not so rigid that, simply because somebody started the process of going to the ombudsman or going through the courts, the OFT could not take such recognition into account, as the language in the guidance note suggests. We all agree that we want to avoid going to the courts if possible. Any mechanism for encouraging that must be a good thing.

Many have spoken about denying credit and the fact that those on low incomes find it the most difficult to obtain credit. There has been a great expansion in the UK credit market and more people than ever have the capacity and opportunity to borrow. However, access to credit remains severely constrained and limited for those on insecure or low incomes.

The study that the Joseph Rowntree Foundation published in February is instructive. It states:

"People on low incomes have a higher risk of default than those who are better off because their circumstances are more likely to change. They also tend to want more weekly cash repayments.

Low-income credit users also want to borrow relatively small amounts . . . The costs of lending are largely fixed, so they tend to be high in relation to the amounts borrowed."

The final point is the most telling:

"Left to its own devices, the commercial market will continue to move away from lending to the poorest people. Many of the proposals to tackle high-cost lending are likely to accelerate this trend and leave poor people with even less choice and higher costs."

We are not trying to prevent people from having access to credit but to promote responsible lending.

I hope that the Government will continue to monitor the measure's effect. If they pick up trends of the availability of credit to those on low incomes and people who have uncertainties in their lives being taken away, I hope that they will ensure that the industry will not use the changes to say, "This is far too complicated. We'll pull out of that market." I am sure that the Under-Secretary shares those views. The credit industry must be regulated properly to ensure that it provides fair credit, but that must not result in financial facilities being denied to those on low incomes.

The last thing any of us wants is to give succour or encouragement to those who abuse people's circumstances—rogue lenders who try to prey on and take advantage of those who are vulnerable and perhaps less able to make credit decisions themselves, and use unsavoury, aggressive and sometimes violent tactics to ensure that money is repaid.

I welcome the Bill. It is a step in the right direction but I hope that the Government will continue to listen, as the Minister has done throughout the process, and continue to monitor the measure's impact to ensure that it has the desired effect.

3.53 pm

Adam Price: I pay tribute to the Under-Secretary, who, unless there is another election in the next few months, is the first Minister for 30 years to get a consumer credit measure on the statute book. Clearly, it fulfils an important need. Having said that, there will be missed opportunities in any Bill—the Minister probably expected me to say that; he could probably write my speech and I could write his response—and this one is no exception.

I refer in particular to the interest rate cap that the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) mentioned. The Bill provides for a significant enhancement of indirect consumer protection as a result of an easier recourse to the law, either through the courts or through an alternative disputes procedure. A more explicit definition in the Bill of the unfairness test would have provided more direct and immediate protection, but we do not have that at the moment. I would go further and argue that we need completely to stamp out exploitative lending in the sub-prime market through the operation of an interest rate ceiling. Such ceilings exist in most countries, including the majority of European countries, and in many states in the USA, Australia and Canada. The South African sister Department to the DTI has included in draft legislation an enabling clause similar to the one that I proposed in the previous Bill before the election, and in the past few weeks, the Polish lower House has supported legislation to introduce an interest rate cap. Surely all those countries cannot be wrong.

Credit is to be supported, but there is a difference between credit and what used to be called usury. Credit is an arrangement that benefits both the lender and the borrower. The lender receives the interest payments, but the borrower also benefits because the arrangement enables them to smooth out fluctuations in their income. Usury offers no long-term benefit to the borrower, however, and the lender knows that at the time of the transaction. Surely such arrangements should be eliminated, and an interest rate ceiling would appear, from the research that the Minister and I have seen, to be a successful way of achieving that.

The Minister said on Second Reading that he was prepared to look again at the independent research on interest rate capping. I know that he has received a briefing on the issue from Debt on our Doorstep. It is an extensive literature review that goes back over 40 years of experience in interest rate ceilings. It goes into much more detail than the Policis research, which, as the hon. Member for North Norfolk said, is highly flawed. Policis does not appear to have interviewed many of the leading academic commentators worldwide. It claims to have done a full literature review, but there was no extensive bibliography in the report. I know that Debt on our Doorstep has asked to see it. That research seems flawed to me.

I echo the comments made by the hon. Member for North Norfolk. Could we have a timetable for the review that the Minister has promised? Will the Government commission further independent research, because of the doubts that are widely shared about the robustness of the Policis research? After all, there is a template that the Department could use. It is the Treasury's recent consultation document on the credit union interest rate cap. The Government have imposed an interest rate cap on the credit unions. By law, they cannot charge more than 1 per cent. a month. If it makes sense to place an interest rate cap on credit unions, which by their very nature are beneficent in their attitude towards their borrowers, why is it not worth looking again at putting a interest rate cap on lenders that are slightly less beneficent in their approach? Will the Minister therefore consider that?

[Adam Price]

In relation to the comments of the hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire), as I have never said that an interest rate cap is a one-size-fits-all solution, will the Minister say what the Government plan to do in terms of their financial inclusion agenda, beyond the financial inclusion fund? Are there any proposals, for instance, to examine the kind of statutory requirements that the Governments of France and Germany place on mainstream lending institutions in relation to providing banking, including overdraft facilities, under which a certain proportion of their customer base must be low-income households? In commissioning further research, will the Government examine not just interest rate caps but spreading financial inclusion through mainstream providers?

4 pm

Mr. Vaizey: Like everyone else in the Chamber, I want to say how much I welcome the new Bill and wish it well on its way to the other place. As a new Member, I have thoroughly enjoyed the experience of participating on Second Reading, Report and Third Reading but most of all in Committee. It was a tribute to the proceedings of Parliament that we were able to go through the Bill in such detail, clause by clause, with such courtesy across the Committee Room. I thank the Minister for the way in which he and his officials have handled the Bill, and I also thank the Liberal Democrats. Most of all, however, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) who was an extremely effective Opposition spokesman, putting forward detailed and necessary amendments and arguing his case extremely forcefully.

I want to return to only three issues, some of which I raised on Second Reading. As the Minister is now well aware, I am obsessed, rather like a dog with a bone, with the unfair relationship test. It strikes me as extraordinary that the Department has not in any way sought to include guidance on what an unfair relationship means. Were such guidance provided, perhaps in the Bill or by regulation, that would be an enormous benefit.

To begin with, guidance would help the industry before the Bill even came into effect. The industry would know how to redesign if necessary any products that were on the market, and how to adapt easily and quickly to the forthcoming regime. Above all, however, guidance would help the consumer, who stands alone when he or she makes the bargain, and who has no resources to turn to expert advice if the bargain goes wrong. It would help the consumer if he or she were able to turn easily to guidance on what might or might not be unfair, rather than, as I had to do, ferret around in "Chitty on Contracts", using my dusty and ancient legal experience, to work out that there might or might not be a connection with the terms in consumer credit regulations. Guidance would also help the industry—it would put off ambulance chasers and unscrupulous individuals seeking to try it on because they were unhappy with the bargain that they had made—and the ombudsman.

There are many other measures in the Bill, however, that one can welcome, not least the creation of an ombudsman in this area, which is long overdue, as well as the role for the Office of Fair Trading, although I take on board the critique put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden about the excessive powers.

I have also listened with interest to the wider debate, which we did not necessarily have in Committee, particularly the debate on an interest rate cap. I have to say that I am increasingly attracted to that idea. Arguably a Conservative Member's instinct should be to oppose any regulation, especially regulation that "interferes with the free market", but I think that too often members of our party shy away from active regulation and intervention that can help the individual, the consumer and the vulnerable person, because we make obeisance at the altar of the free market.

When we look at the financial services industry, we see an industry that is selling a product. Any other industry that sells products to consumers is regulated, and indeed the financial services industry is closely regulated. But no one would argue that we should get rid of motorway speed limits because they cut off access to high-speed, thrilling drives for Ferrari drivers, and I find it odd that we should wish not to cap interest rates because that would cut off access to vulnerable consumers for unscrupulous lenders. As for the argument that we are somehow doing vulnerable consumers a disservice by cutting them off from excessive rates of interest, I find that bizarre. It is precisely because those consumers are vulnerable in a host of ways, not just because of their particular circumstances at the time but perhaps because of their educational background, that they are targeted.

As the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) pointed out, the Government are not shy of imposing consumer-style regulation on financial products, not just credit agreements but the stakeholder pension when it was introduced. As I said on Second Reading, that also applies to CAT—charges access terms—standards.

Norman Lamb: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman agrees with me, but I think that the picture is unclear. Research commissioned by the Department of Trade and Industry suggested that there would be consequences that none of us would want, and that people could be pushed into the clutches of loan sharks. I have no idea what the truth is. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Department should commission more authoritative research, so that we could at least try to agree about the evidence?

Mr. Vaizey: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, and with the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr, that the Government should review the position. There is evidence that an interest rate cap has worked on the continent and in America, and I believe that we should consider it here. I urge my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden to include it in the Conservative party manifesto for the next general election, because I think that the policy will prove to be extremely attractive on the doorstep.

The intervention from the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) brings me to my third and final point. I agree with his emphasis on personal financial education. As the Minister will recall, I raised the subject on Second Reading. I raise it now with your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as it is not specifically within the frame of the Bill.

I find it extremely odd that, in the 21st century, it is possible to go to school and receive only the merest smattering of education. Pupils may learn algebra, which they will never use again, or a foreign language, which they will rarely use again. I would go so far as to say that 99 per cent. of what I learned at school I never use. It would be a great idea to include personal financial education, not merely as a fringe activity but as a core part of our education system. School children should be able to take GCSEs and A-levels in the subject, to educate themselves in the wily ways of financial services.

Let me end by saying how grateful I am for the opportunity to participate, as a new Member, in debates on the Bill. I wish it well as it makes its stately progress across Central Lobby to the other place.

4.9 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: I will not speak for long—[Laughter.] A certain hon. Gentleman is obviously pleased to hear it. Many interesting issues have been raised, and I stand here feeling some satisfaction, in that the Bill has reached Third Reading and will now proceed to the other place. As a result, in the near future there will be protection for a wide range of consumers who seek credit. We have focused on people on low incomes, but we have also agreed that credit is a useful tool when handled properly.

I realise that the question of an interest rate cap is central to this debate. Our research on this issue has been criticised, but I should point out that the research undertaken by Policis focused on those on low and very low incomes primarily because they are the most vulnerable groups. Much of the existing data have not been separated to show the position of those on low incomes. However, as I have said all along, I am genuinely prepared to examine the information that comes in. In answer to the point raised by the hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire), we will review the legislation within two to three years and examine the various issues arising.

Norman Lamb: Will the Minister do more than look at the information that comes in, as he describes it, and commission more authoritative research?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I shall not give an answer to that today. I want first to be able to examine the Bill's impact and the way in which the unfair relationship test, about which there has been some disagreement, works.

We will not be complacent, however, and we must remember that this Bill must be seen not in isolation, but in the context of the various cross-departmental initiatives on financial inclusion. The hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) discussed developing credit unions, and the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) raised the issue of financial education, which will be provided. We must not only increase the money available in the financial inclusion fund, but engage in a cross-departmental effort to examine how best to provide financial education at an early stage in people's lives.

I pay tribute to the work of the various bodies involved in this process, such as consumer and industry groups and the newspapers. The hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) mentioned the role of the Daily Mirror in particular, but other newspapers have also launched campaigns to protect consumers, which I welcome. They will not let us get away with being complacent. As things develop, we must ensure that consumer protection is in place, but we should not be frightened of also ensuring that responsible lenders are able to grow their business.

We are going to have to deal with the problem of loan sharks very soon, and with that in mind we are running two pilot projects, in Birmingham and in Glasgow. The Birmingham project is working very well. The issues being dealt with are very depressing. These loan sharks lend huge sums, and there are other, associated evils. For example, loan sharks target single mothers living in high-rise flats because lenders do not allow their staff to visit such flats; as a result, such single mothers cannot obtain any other kind of credit. If they happen to miss a few payments, the loan sharks encourage them into prostitution or drugs. We are determined to tackle this problem, and we must ensure that those at the low end of the income scale are not preyed upon by loan sharks.

There are many other issues that we could talk about this afternoon, but I want to stress that the Bill is a co-ordinated attempt to achieve consensus. The political consensus that has developed is important. As the hon. Member for Wantage said, anyone who has followed our proceedings has seen Parliament at its best. We are trying to improve constituents' lives by providing protection for consumers, while at the same time being fair to business.

I am pleased that the Bill has managed to get through. If it passes through the other place, it will be the first of this Session to receive Royal Assent, which is a tribute to all involved. I also pay tribute to the officials in the DTI who supported me and to House officials who have ensured that the Bill has had a safe passage.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With permission, I shall put together motions 3 to 9 and 15 to 18.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

Northern Ireland

That the draft Local Elections (Northern Ireland) (Amendment) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 16th June, be approved.

Criminal Law (Northern Ireland)

That the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 (Code of Practice) (Northern Ireland) Order 2005, dated 20th June 2005, which was laid before this House on 23rd June, be approved.

Transport

That the draft Railways (Convention on International Carriage by Rail) Regulations 2005, which were laid before this House on 13th June, be approved.

International Immunities and Privileges

That the draft International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea (Immunities and Privileges) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 30th June, be approved.

TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT

That the draft National Minimum Wage Regulations 1999 (Amendment) Regulations 2005, which were laid before this House on 20th June, be approved.

PENSIONS

That the draft Financial Assistance Scheme Regulations 2005, which were laid before this House on 22nd June, be approved.

That the draft Financial Assistance Scheme (Internal Review) Regulations 2005, which were laid before this House on 22nd June, be approved.—[Mr. Watson.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

SOCIAL SECURITY

That the draft Age-Related Payments Regulations 2005, which were laid before this House on 23rd June, be approved.—[Mr. Watson.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING

That the draft Industrial Training Levy (Engineering Construction Board) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 18th May, be approved.—[Mr. Watson.]

Question agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Monday 18th July, the Speaker shall put forthwith the Questions on any Motion relating to committal of the Crossrail Bill and on any instruction to the Committee on the Bill.

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 20th July, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 16 (Proceedings under an Act or on European Union documents), the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of the Motion in the name of Mr Secretary Prescott relating to the Council Tax not later than three hours after their commencement; proceedings may continue, though opposed, after the moment of interruption; and Standing Order No. 41A (Deferred divisions) shall not apply.

SITTINGS IN WESTMINSTER HALL

Ordered,

That, on Thursday 21st July, there shall be no sitting in Westminster Hall.

MODERNISATION OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ordered,

That Mr Crispin Blunt be discharged from the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons and Chris Grayling be added.—[Mr. Watson.]

Travellers (Billericay)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson]

4.16 pm

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to raise this important issue in the House and I also want to thank the Minister for responding. He will be aware that the Crays Hill Travellers' site is the largest in the country. Should council plans go ahead, there will be a very large-scale eviction over the coming months of about 50 families who have developed green belt land without authorisation and therefore live, in a sense, on the illegal part of the site.

It is a very unfortunate and sad state of affairs. The eviction will cause much heartache for both the settled and Traveller communities. No doubt, when the time comes, the newspapers will be full of pictures of crying children and distressed adults as the bailiffs move in to do their job. There is little doubt that the law as it presently stands is to blame for this situation and I would like to make the Minister aware of why I believe that to be the case. I also want to ask him some specific questions in the hope that we can move the issue forwards and clarify certain matters.

The law as it stands is presently inadequate. It can deal with the issue of trespass, but it cannot deal with those who buy green belt or greenfield land and then speedily and illegally develop it. There is no shortage of examples in my constituency of where that has taken place. A relatively recent example occurred two or three years ago near Saddler's Farm roundabout where, over the course of a bank holiday weekend, Travellers built a 6-ft earth mound around the perimeter of a field that they owned. They laid hardcore the next day and the day after that moved the caravans in. The council reacted with stop and enforcement notices, but by the time that they had been served, the development was complete. Consequently, a lengthy planning and appeals process was entered into, which is still ongoing, and meanwhile the illegal development remains. The problem is a result of the law's ineffectiveness, because it allows small illegal sites to become much bigger ones, so the issue becomes much harder and costlier to deal with. That is precisely what happened at the Crays Hill site.

The Minister will be aware that, after a long and protracted planning process that involved several enforcement notices, appeals, and public inquiries, Basildon council finally got to the point where they sought authorisation to evict those Travellers who had illegally developed the green belt. However, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister effectively overruled the council in 2003 and gave the Travellers a two-year extension to move on. Instead, the number of caravans on the illegal site increased significantly during that period.

Needless to say, the problem has become much harder to deal with, because the number of families involved has increased and the Travellers have had longer to settle down and establish a way of life. Basildon council now has no choice but to evict those Travellers who have broken the rules, as not doing so would send out the very clear signal that the green belt was up for grabs.

I want to make it absolutely clear that no one wants to discriminate against a minority. I have tried to make the same point whenever this matter has been discussed over the past few years, but it is only fair to insist that all those who live in a community abide by its laws and regulations. Otherwise, the law-abiding majority are the ones who suffer discrimination. That is important, because there is a minority in the Traveller community—and I stress that it is a minority—who in the past have resorted to unwise words on this matter.

We in Basildon district have no problems with law-abiding Travellers. The latest figures show that we have more than 100 authorised sites and pitches for the Traveller and Gypsy communities, whereas some neighbouring districts have none at all. We have a long and proud history—of literally hundreds of years—of living in harmony with those communities. Indeed, Basildon district has the largest number of authorised caravans in Essex: in 1990, we had 37, and now we have about 180. That is an increase of nearly 500 per cent., and compares with an increase in the same period of roughly 100 per cent. in Essex, and 55 per cent. in England as whole.

No one can accuse us of discriminating against Travellers or of being intolerant or racist. All that we ask is that everyone obeys the same set of rules, especially if they wish to live in the community. Clearly, that has not happened at the illegal Crays Hill sites.

I want to make it clear, too, that local politics has played no part in the discussion. That important point is worth stressing, and I am not using this debate to play politics with the issue. I first became MP for Billericay four years ago, when Labour controlled Basildon council. I refused to blame the council then, as I believed that the law needed reform. I know that my approach is appreciated by Labour councillors to this day.

I am pleased to note that the Opposition Whips are no longer in the Chamber, as I have also made it clear that I believe that the Conservative Government of 1994 were wrong to remove the statutory duty on local authorities to provide authorised sites. That was a bad mistake, and I shall return to it in a moment.

What needs to be done? I have no doubt that the law is to blame, as it is outdated and ineffective. We urgently need to adopt a twin-track approach, as outlined in my private Member's Bill, the Greenbelt Protection Bill of 2003. My aim was to change the law, on the one hand by obliging councils to provide authorised sites where there was sufficient demand and for which an honest rent and council taxes could be charged, and on the other by giving them much stronger powers speedily to evict those Travellers who insisted on breaking the law. Also, my Bill would have allowed councils to put right any damage caused and to recover the cost from those who had caused it. Moreover, my Bill provided that those powers would have been available to councils only when the required sites had been provided. I felt that that was the fair way to go about dealing with the problem.

I could give further details of the proposals in my Bill, but I refer the Minister to the explanatory notes, of which his Department has a copy. The change in the law that I proposed would have been fair to those Travellers who respect the law and it would have allowed those who do not to be dealt with speedily. That would have prevented the development of the large-scale illegal sites, such as Crays Hill, that are often so much more difficult to deal with.

The Government's response to my proposals was disappointing, to say the least. A long consultation was held, which involved many site visits, public hearings and meetings with residents, Travellers, councillors, police and Basildon council's planning department. In addition, I sought—and had no trouble securing—very good cross-party support in the Chamber, but the Government blocked my Bill without explanation.

After continually raising the issue in Parliament and meeting Ministers from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and, indeed, the Prime Minister, there are tentative signs that the Government are now at least considering adopting a twin-track approach, but progress is far too slow. I should therefore like to ask the Minister a number of questions, to which I hope he will respond directly.

First, the Minister is fully aware that I raised the issue of eviction costs with the Prime Minister, by way of letter, and with the Deputy Prime Minister during Prime Minister's questions last week. The two-year extension given in 2003 to the Travellers at Crays Hill before they must move on has resulted instead in the number of caravans increasing significantly. The precise figures are difficult to come by, but there is no doubt that there has been a significant increase. The cost of eviction has increased accordingly and, according to Basildon council, now stands at about £2 million, which represents approximately 15 per cent. of a year's council tax revenue.

Will the Minister now commit the Government to assist Basildon council financially with those increased eviction costs, which are a direct result of the Deputy Prime Minister's decision to give a two-year extension, or will he at least promise to look into the issue? If the answer is no, Ministers are, in effect, unfairly penalising local council tax payers for a mistake made by the Government.

The response from the Deputy Prime Minister last week was totally inadequate. He suggested that the money could be better spent on providing land for the Travellers, but such a view displays an ignorance of the situation locally, while nationally, it would spell disaster for our green belt because it would allow Travellers to drive a coach and horses through our planning laws, for there would be no disincentive to buy and illegally develop large chunks of the green belt, as councils would be encouraged by the Government not to meet evictions costs, but to spend the money instead on providing sites.

Secondly, will the Minister update me on what progress is being made on the much-needed reform of our planning laws? Many people think that the progress so far has taken far too long, particularly bearing it in mind that the Government have been aware of the issue for a number of years now. The Minister will be aware that two consultation exercises have been instigated—one to look at the provision of authorised sites, the other to consider whether to give stronger powers to councils—and I have contributed to both.

With regard to authorised sites, in December 2004, the ODPM issued a consultation paper, "Planning for Gypsy and Traveller Sites". The consultation period ended on 18 March. When can local authorities expect to receive the revised guidance that will replace circular 1/94? Does the Minister accept that the provision of sites for Traveller families is a national issue and that it should not be left to a small number of local authorities to provide the majority of the sites? Will the new guidance therefore include measures to require all local authorities, where demand is sufficient, to make adequate provision for Traveller sites?

I am concerned to learn that there is talk that the Government have dropped the idea of direction and are instead considering leaving the solution to regional spatial strategies. That simply will not work, for there is nothing to force councils to comply with those strategies, except for the Travellers themselves resorting to the appeals process. The Minister will be aware that paragraph 20 of the draft circular on planning for Traveller sites advised that the regional spatial strategy should include provision for Gypsy sites. Yet the draft east of England plan, published very recently, says nothing about Gypsy sites. The draft spatial strategy is meant to guide development in the east of England for at least the next 20 years, yet no mention is made of Gypsy sites whatsoever. I hope that the Minister will appreciate that such confusion needs to be sorted out by the Government.

The Government have consulted on whether to give stronger power to councils. They proposed a 28-day temporary stop notice in response to the pressure to give much stronger powers to councils. Indeed, such notices became law on 7 March this year. The main difference from the existing law is that local authorities will have power to serve a temporary stop notice without first serving an enforcement notice. That sounds good, but when we consider the detail and the exemptions the power is actually quite ineffective. Basildon council has several concerns. Within the 28-day period, for example, the local authority has to serve an enforcement notice and a normal stop notice, which gives right of appeal against those notices. However, such an appeal also has the effect of putting into abeyance not only the enforcement and normal stop notices but also the 28-day temporary notice itself. That is a real concern for my local planning department.

Meanwhile, in the interim 28-day period, the local authority can indeed prosecute the contravener in the magistrates court for continuing to occupy land in breach of the temporary stop notice. However, the magistrates court is in many respects an inappropriate means for securing an effective deterrent to the breach, because it can usually impose only a fine. In many cases, it is difficult to get someone to court in 28 days if they do not want to be there. All sorts of delaying tactics can be used, such as an application for legal aid or simply not turning up.

More important, the new law does not allow local authorities to serve a temporary stop notice against someone who is occupying a caravan where that caravan is their main home, unless it is parked where it is causing a highway danger or there are other exceptional circumstances. It is highly likely that most Travellers will claim that the caravan in question is their main residence and, in fairness, there is a good chance that it will be, so the exemption renders the temporary stop notice next to useless. The fact that the caravan was on green belt land would not entitle a local authority to serve temporary stop notices if that caravan was a main residence.

The conclusion is that the law will not help local authorities to take effective, swift action against Traveller families who move on to green belt sites without planning permission. It will certainly not help Basildon council with the situation at Crays Hill. Meanwhile, it must not be forgotten that, even if a stop notice is invoked, it postpones the problem only for four weeks—thereafter the present ineffective laws kick in.

May I ask the Minister to address some other issues? Will he clarify some of the terminology on needs-based assessment under the Housing Act 2004? He will be aware that the Act stipulates that the needs of Gypsy communities should form part of a local authority's homelessness needs assessment—rightly so. However, little or no methodology has been given as guidance and councils are wondering how to undertake that task. It has been suggested that the number of unauthorised caravans is one way of measuring the needs of local travellers; in other words, if there is a large number, there must be a need. However, in Basildon district, there are about 220 unauthorised caravans—representing a 700 per cent. increase since 1990—while some neighbouring districts have very few or none at all, so if that methodology was used, it would suggest that only in Basildon district was there a further requirement for Traveller sites, which is clearly nonsense. Will the Minister clarify the methodology councils are to use to meet their obligations under the Act?

Will the Minister update me on the Government's progress, if any, on my proposals for a twin-track approach? During this short debate I have tried to highlight the extent of the problem at the Crays Hill Traveller site, and to show where I believe that Government policy is causing confusion, is ineffective and at least partially to blame. I have suggested the improvements that should be made, as highlighted in my attempt to change the law in 2003. As I have said previously, the Government initially blocked my Bill, but after pressing them in Parliament and after meetings with Ministers and the Prime Minister, who seemed to suggest that my proposals should be examined further, it seems that the Government are at least heading down the road towards the twin-track approach that is required. However, for the reasons previously stated, the Government's proposals to date will not provide the solutions required. Will the Government take a fresh look at my proposals which, as the Minister knows, have good cross-party support and, when he has time, will he get back to me?

In conclusion, I hope that the Minister will appreciate that I am not interested in playing politics on the issue. What is required is good law, and the current law is inadequate. Proof of this is that we still have a sad situation in Crays Hill, where a large number of Traveller families will be forcibly evicted, which will cause much pain and anguish. The situation can be avoided in future if the Government grip the problem, but so far from what we know of their proposals, both with regard to the provision of authorised sites and giving councils stronger powers, they are clearly inadequate. Left as they are, they will not solve the problem.

A twin-track approach is required. With regard to the provision of authorised sites, clear direction must be given to local authorities, while councils must be given much stronger powers speedily to evict Travellers who insist on breaking the law and to put right any damage. Otherwise, the unnecessary and sad conflict that we have seen in the past between settled and Traveller communities, and that we will see again at Crays Hill in the coming months, will continue and intensify in future in other parts. Given that the Government have been aware of the issue for a good number of years, they have a moral obligation to act, and to act quickly, before too much more pain is caused. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): I congratulate the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) on securing the debate. I am pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela E. Smith) in her place and I acknowledge her interest in the matter. I should like to place on record my appreciation for the way in which the hon. Gentleman has introduced the debate and for his contribution in trying to find a solution to this problem recently.

We recognise the difficult problems that can arise when trying to find suitable accommodation for Gypsies and Travellers generally and, more specifically, the problems of the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I hope to cover all the hon. Gentleman's questions in the course of my speech.

We take these issues seriously. We have been working hard and will continue to work hard to find solutions and alleviate the distress that local people are experiencing. The hon. Gentleman is aware that my noble Friend, Baroness Andrews, met representatives of Basildon district council and Essex county council on Tuesday to discuss the situation at the Crays Hill site. I understand that Basildon council is meeting later tonight to consider whether or not the Travellers should be evicted from this unauthorised development. We sympathise with the difficulties that this may present for both the settled community and the Travellers. The council will need to weigh in the balance the consequences of such action for the council, the settled community and Travellers. I do not underestimate the seriousness of the matter.

The matter has to be for the council. Ministers have no locus in any decisions in relation to the enforcement notices and actions in compliance with them. That properly is a matter for the district council to determine. In the same vein, the Government cannot assist with any of the specific costs relating to ensuring compliance with the enforcement notices.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister give way?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I can anticipate the hon. Gentleman's question and I hope to cover it later. Should I not do so, I shall happily give way to him once I reach my conclusions.

The key to resolving problems from unauthorised development and encampments is to ensure that there is adequate authorised site provision. Every local authority needs to play a part in that. We want to assist Basildon and other Essex authorities to find a way forward to resolve the issue of accommodation for Gypsies and Travellers by working with other local authorities in the area. As a start, we have agreed with Basildon and Essex that it will be helpful for officials from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to be invited to next week's meeting of the Essex local government association, at which Gypsy and Traveller issues in the county are to be discussed.

Many local authorities have not responded sufficiently to local need in their areas in recent years. To be fair, some local authorities have done a great deal, but some have not. That is unfair on neighbouring local authorities and on local communities, which must put up with unauthorised development, often on inappropriate sites.

Under the Housing Act 2004 local authorities must carry out housing needs assessments for Gypsies and Travellers, as they do for the settled community. They are also required to draw up a Gypsy and Traveller accommodation strategy to ensure that need is met. We will be issuing final guidance on how to carry out housing needs assessments in due course, but meantime we will seek to facilitate sharing of good practice between local authorities and other players, and we will do all that we can to help local authorities find a way to share provision. In response to the hon. Gentleman's specific question about when that will happen, my best guess is the end of the summer. We have had 300 responses to the consultation exercise and, obviously, we want to give due consideration to them. I assure him that it will be sooner rather than later.

Local authorities should identify land that could be used for the provision of new public and private sites. That is why it is important to place an obligation on local authorities to identify land as part of their planning process. Under the new planning circular, as drafted, there is a requirement on local planning authorities to allocate sufficient land for sites. That is effectively a duty.

Local authorities will have to identify sites suitable for Gypsies and Travellers as part of their local development framework—the new planning process. There is an important opportunity provided through the regional planning process to look across the region. Because of the nomadic lifestyle followed by many Gypsies and Travellers, there has to be a strong strategic element to planning for their needs. Regional planning bodies are key to that. They will have to make an assessment of the regional need for Gypsy and Traveller sites, based on local housing assessments made by local authorities. That assessment of need will then be turned into pitch numbers allocated to each area of the region in the regional spatial strategy. Local authorities will have to reflect those targets in their local development frameworks. That will help to counter the concerns of some authorities that they are being left to shoulder the burden on their own. We recognise that many local authorities may find it difficult to tackle that issue. We would encourage neighbouring authorities to work together wherever possible, and I know that that is starting to happen in Essex.

There have been calls for the reintroduction of a duty on local authorities to provide sites. The current problem is clear—there is a significant lack of authorised sites. However, the solution is not to reintroduce a statutory duty on all local authorities. A duty has been tried before, but often did not produce appropriate provision, and meant that the public purse funded provision. Even with the introduction of 100 per cent. Exchequer funding in 1979, Gypsy site provision failed to keep pace with the growth in the number of caravans.

The arrangements that I have outlined for local authorities to carry out needs assessments and make provision for sites in their local plan, amount effectively to a duty.

Mr. Baron: I accept what the Minister has said, but is he concerned that the draft east of England regional spatial strategy does not contain any mention of the provision of Gypsy sites? Does not that suggest a failing that needs, somehow, to be put right?

Jim Fitzpatrick: The hon. Gentleman kindly gave me the opportunity to consider the point that he wished to emphasise. We will respond to the draft RSS in due course and if it does not contain details on how accommodation needs will be met, the Secretary of State could refuse to finalise and approve it. I assure the hon. Gentleman that such provision will be considered as part of the process.

In assessing need, local authorities should not be able to rely simply on the situation within their boundaries. Situations such as that in Basildon illustrate a need to look across regions and sub-regions to ensure an equitable distribution of provision. We shall explore the best way to achieve that as part of the guidance on needs assessments currently in preparation. I would also point out to the hon. Gentleman that despite the repeal of the Caravan Sites Act 1968, local authorities continue to have the power to create sites as they see fit.

Basildon council has called on the Government to help with the cost of enforcement. The enforcement of planning control is a statutory function of local authorities for which they need to budget and the costs of which are not generally recoverable. The Government have provided significant investment in local authorities since taking office, with a 33 per cent. real terms increase in Government grant in that time. Although I recognise that the costs in this case are significant, I regret that the principle must remain. However, we are prepared to help with the cost of new site provision, and are offering practical assistance by providing funding. In 2005–06, the Gypsy sites refurbishment grant is available for new sites as well as for the refurbishment of existing ones. The aim of the grant is to increase the number of authorised pitches available to Gypsies and Travellers, and thus reduce the need for unauthorised sites. In addition, mainstream funding via the regional housing pot of some £56 million will be made available for local authority and registered social landlord sites from 2006–07.

Mr. Baron: We can bandy figures about in the Chamber, but a council that is about to seek eviction can be told suddenly by the Government to stop and give the Travellers a two-year extension. During those two years, the number of caravans can increase significantly. Does the Minister not accept that outside the House many people believe that the Government should pay an appropriate proportion of the increased costs, because their decision to provide a two-year extension led to a significant increase in the number of caravans?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I am sorry, but we do not accept that. We introduced the two-year extension in an attempt to ameliorate the situation and solve problems. We wanted to provide time to make sure that we did not provoke a crisis for settled communities, Travellers, local authorities and enforcement agencies such as the police service. Problems with evictions could be resolved over the course of time. Obviously, that did not happen in Basildon where, over the two years, the site became bigger and there was no attempt to use local authority powers to restrict the number of people coming on to the site. There is therefore some local responsibility for the fact that the position is more difficult now than it was two years ago. As I have outlined, that is a local statutory responsibility: we do not have that responsibility, and we will not take it upon ourselves.

As I was saying, the Government grant available to local authorities this year is £8 million. It is being used to allow local authorities to build new residential sites for rent as well as to refurbish existing sites. Local authorities could do more to deal effectively with unauthorised development, and we plan to provide further help by producing an enforcement toolkit to provide guidance. The purpose of the guidance is to support local authorities and the police in taking whatever action is required to address the local problem that they face. Under powers in the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, as amended by the Planning and Compensation Act 1991, local planning authorities have wide-ranging enforcement powers to deal with unauthorised development, including enforcement notices and stop notices, which carry penalties of up to £20,000 for non-compliance, and injunctions in the High Court or county court that can be used to restrain any actual or expected breach of planning control.

Since 7 March this year, local planning authorities have been able to use a new enforcement power—the temporary stop notice—where they consider that a breach of planning control has taken place and it is expedient that the activity that amounts to the breach is stopped. Temporary stop notices were introduced by the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004, and they are a new general enforcement power. Temporary stop notices have already been used, and I am aware of at least one case in which they were used both to stop the development of a Gypsy and Traveller site and to prevent caravans from going on to the site. Under the regulations, temporary stop notices can be used to halt all development. They need to be reviewed and, over the longer term, there should be scope to link stronger enforcement with greater site provision. Those measures should go hand in hand both nationally and locally, like measures to tackle unauthorised encampments.

I share the hon. Gentleman's concerns that the planning control regime should not appear to encourage unauthorised development. It is clearly unsatisfactory for anyone to carry out development without first obtaining the required planning permission. However, to remove the prospect of retrospective planning permission would excessively penalise those who inadvertently undertook work without permission.

The Government's current approach is that development without planning consent or in breach of a consent which has been granted is not an offence, and that criminalisation would be an inappropriate and disproportionate response. The margins between lawful and unlawful development are not sufficiently clear-cut to form an acceptable basis for a new criminal offence.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister, if not now, after the debate, address the specific issues that I raised with regard to the temporary stop notice? There are major flaws with that, and I tried to outline the main ones. Will the hon. Gentleman reflect on my comments and let me have his response after the debate?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I am happy to give that assurance. I should have said earlier in my contribution that temporary stop notices will need to be reviewed over the longer term. We have given that commitment and I am happy to repeat it. We would be pleased to receive comments that the hon. Gentleman wishes to contribute to that from the experience of his constituents.

As I was saying about retrospective planning permission, we do not believe that magistrates courts are a suitable forum in which to argue the technicalities of planning legislation that a criminal prosecution would require.

In conclusion, the Government have sought to tackle these problems from three directions. We have obliged local authorities to do more to identify appropriate sites within their local plans where there is a demand. We are also providing funding for sites —£8 million this year and £56 million over the following two years. We have strengthened the powers of local authorities to take swifter enforcement action against illegal developments by introducing temporary stop notices, and we have provided local authorities with stronger powers to tackle antisocial behaviour. Gypsies are part of the community and they have the same rights as anyone else, but with rights come responsibilities, and we support tough action by councils and local police to tackle illegal behaviour, including, where appropriate, the use of antisocial behaviour orders.

On the hon. Gentleman's question about the housing needs assessment, we have issued draft guidance. His county, Essex, as well as Cambridgeshire and Bedfordshire, are already conducting housing needs assessments and the final guidance will be issued by the autumn, so the position will be clear for all local authorities.

We will be working with local authorities to ensure that they understand their powers and duties, to encourage site and service provision, to promote the effective use of enforcement powers and to tackle antisocial behaviour. I am confident that when local and central Government work together, and are supported by elected politicians at local and national level, we will start to see real changes on the ground which will benefit Gypsies and Travellers and the settled community alike.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

WORK AND PENSIONS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Incapacity Benefit

1. Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): If he will take action to identify recipients of incapacity benefit who will be permanently unable to work. [12300]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. David Blunkett): As part of the emerging conclusions of the review of welfare reform, I shall recognise in the autumn that there is a group of individuals who, permanently or temporarily, are so severely ill or disabled that it is impossible at that time for them to take up work, and that they deserve all the support that we can give them. The reform agenda will, however, ensure that we do not write anyone off, and that we write them in if they are prepared and able to take up the opportunities that we as a society have an obligation to provide for them.

Ian Lucas: There are indeed individuals who are not fit to work and never will be. At present, some of them become distressed by receiving application forms which are unnecessary and which, in an improved system, would not be delivered to them. I urge my right hon. Friend to continue with the course that he is following to assist those who are capable of work to move into work, but to ensure that those who are not capable do not have to fill in the forms that sometimes cause them so much difficulty.

Mr. Blunkett: I accept my hon. Friend's point entirely. There is a category of exemption and it is clear that those, for instance, who have terminal illness should be treated quite differently from those who, temporarily or on a longer-term basis, might be able to return to work with the right sort of help and encouragement. The system should reflect that difference, and our welfare reform paper in the autumn will seek to reinforce that.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the position of those who have long-term mental illness that is often episodic? The present benefits system does not cope with them because it does not recognise the times when people are available for work and the times when they clearly are not available for work and are suffering from the illness, which is almost certainly long-term and may be permanent.

Mr. Blunkett: The welfare system must reflect the fact that increasingly, people may be able to undertake work for a period and then find themselves on benefits for a time. They need to be able to return to benefits without any disadvantage and in the easiest possible way, not only for themselves but to assure employers that there will not be a major disadvantage to them. We are considering how we could work more effectively with employers to keep those people on the books while not disadvantaging the employer. The linking rules, which are improved substantially from next year, will make it possible for people to return to their benefit after a substantial period in work. There is much more to be done on this, and given that 40 per cent. of those on incapacity benefit have at least some form of mental health problem, it is an increasing challenge.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I am grateful for what the Minister has said and the sensitivity with which he said it. Each of us has constituents with such deep, lasting psychiatric problems that they are unemployable. They recognise that, as do those who administer the system. It is an embarrassment to employers when they are sent along. It cannot be rocket science that a common-sense rule should prevail. I hope the Minister will be able to imbue the system and regulations with that and hand it down the pyramid. Common sense would help everyone, but at present it is not and cannot be applied.

Mr. Blunkett: The personal capability assessment ought to be able to distinguish between those with severe mental health problems and those with temporary depression, who constitute quite a large proportion of the 38 per cent. who are on IB, for whom positive help, including work, would be a way out of that challenge. Including those who are entitled to IB through the personal capability assessment, we ought to be able to distinguish between people who will be supported long-term and those who will continue to get help, even though they are receiving incapacity benefit.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Last week the Government discovered that they had overlooked another 130,000 incapacity benefit claimants, bringing the total to 2.8 million, so reform is urgent. Will the Secretary of State confirm that on 12 May the Prime Minister promised on his behalf at his weekly press conference that "there will be a Green Paper on reform of incapacity benefit before the summer recess"?

As we have only three days to go, will the Secretary of State tell us on which day this week the Green Paper will be published, or is that yet another Prime Ministerial promise made within days of a general election, to be broken only a few weeks later?

Mr. Blunkett: First, the previous Government set in train the sampling system for incapacity benefit recipients. This is the first occasion on which I have been criticised at the Dispatch Box for openness, transparency and clarity in making the figures more realistic and more honest. Although the figures have been readjusted to conform with reality rather than sampling, the downwards trend and the 29,000 reduction in recipients remain the same.

Secondly, I will not publish the Green Paper today, tomorrow or on Wednesday. We have concluded that we must properly assess the situation in 10 weeks—[Interruption.] Well, I do not imagine for a moment that the Opposition, given their problems, are keen to address the issue now rather than at length in the autumn, when they might have a leader with whom we can deal.

Women's Pensions

2. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): If he will make a statement on his recent announcement of a consultation on making the pension system work better for women. [12302]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. David Blunkett): Last week, I announced that we will produce a background paper and hold a forum on the long-neglected group of individuals known as women before the publication by Adair Turner of the Pensions Commission report. Women have lost out enormously over the years, first, because of social and economic change and, secondly, because of the change in both family and work patterns.

Tony Lloyd: May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his positive tone on women and pensions? Working patterns are becoming more complicated in both the world of work and, indeed, the world of non-work, and both men and women are taking time off from the workplace to retrain, to undertake caring duties or for other reasons—for example, part-time working has trebled among men in the past 10 years. As the Equal Opportunities Commission has argued, if we get it right for women, we get it right for everyone.

Mr. Blunkett: That is a lovely phrase. Although it does not hold true for everything in life, it is attractive when used in relation to retirement income. Given that we had to intervene to overcome poverty in retirement, and that twice as many women have benefited from the pension credit as men, it is self-evident that the historic failure to recognise caring duties has disadvantaged women enormously. Only 17 per cent. of women currently retire with full entitlement compared with 80 per cent. of men, so the challenge is great.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Why do the Government not reduce the lower earnings level to about £60 a week, which would enable more than 500,000 women to enter the state retirement pension system? The national insurance system is not an insurance system—it is a covenant whereby today's taxpayers undertake to pay for today's pensioners on the understanding that a future generation will pay for our pensions. It is harsh that the system excludes so many women because they do not earn enough.

Mr. Blunkett: That is a good point, and it was the reason that my predecessor and the Chancellor agreed to lift the national insurance threshold to £94 a week and to reduce the eligible earnings limit to £82 a week, which entitled 500,000 women. We are making progress, but much remains to be done, and I am glad that at least one Opposition Member supports the trend of our policy.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): Many women lose out on pension equality not only because they take time out to care for children early in life, but because they take time out later in life to become carers. Will the Secretary of State take steps to address those issues on behalf of women?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes, I will. The support that the Labour Government introduced for those who are caring can be extended. One of the key issues that we will want to address in the autumn is how people can be provided with accreditation during the period for which they are involved in caring, which the current home protection does not do.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): On making the pension system work better for women, does the Secretary of State agree that this is not only about reforming the basic pension but about ensuring that there is good provision in areas such as occupational pensions? The ombudsman is considering the issue and the report is expected in a couple of months. If the ombudsman finds maladministration on the part of the Government, will compensation be paid?

Mr. Blunkett: I think it would be wise for me to wait until the ombudsman reports before making commitments to Parliament that might lead me down avenues that I would regret, especially since, as has been pointed out, we have only three days until the recess. I can say, however, that in the past few years enormous steps have been taken to redress some of the issues that might otherwise have been highlighted in the report—for instance, the position of part-time workers, the majority of whom happen to be women, who from five years ago had their entitlement adjusted. In fact, 6 million workers were put on equal terms in relation to occupational pension rights in a way that had not occurred before. For a whole tranche of the people whom we represent, there have been massive improvements in entitlement and in reality.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the speed with which he grasped the gravity of the situation facing women as regards pensions. He really is to be congratulated on doing that so well.

May I return to the lower earnings limit and contributions for the basic state pension? The lower earnings limit may well be too high—about 1.4 million women are priced out of getting contributions to their pensions—but another problem with it is that someone with two part-time jobs cannot aggregate the earnings. Even if they are earning well over the lower earnings limit and working for 40 hours a week, without the ability to aggregate they will still get no contribution to their pension. Will my right hon. Friend look at that as a matter of urgency, too?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes; my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions indicated in a recent debate that we are prepared to consider this complex area. However, the Chancellor has managed to reflect the principle in the tax credits system, whereby two people can credit their hours together in order to reach the eligible 30 hours for the upper limit. It is therefore not beyond the wit of woman or man to find a system that might address the inequality and inequity that my hon. Friend outlines.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): Is the Secretary of State aware that while we welcome his call for a national consensus on women's pensions and pensions generally, we have noted his charming admission that such a consensus does not yet exist within the Cabinet? Will he confirm that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the problem, and will he share with us what exactly they disagree about?

Mr. Blunkett: The right hon. Gentleman has a sense of humour, which is very welcome. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has, through the pension credit, lifted 2.7 million people out of poverty in retirement.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): To his credit.

Mr. Blunkett: As my hon. Friend says, it is to his credit that he has done so.

We are therefore at the starting point of accepting the challenge of the nation in ensuring that people are not in penury in retirement, and then moving forward to incentivise people and to ensure that they think and plan for the future. The Government will play their role alongside employers and individuals. This is not about divides between particular individuals or politicians; it is genuinely a challenge for the nation, and any party that seeks to duck it and to make party political capital out of it will be dealt with severely by the people whom we serve.

Mental Health

3. Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): What steps he is taking to get people with long-term mental health problems back into work; and if he will make a statement. [12303]

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): We want to support the many people with mental health conditions who want to keep their jobs or to return to work. For many, work helps them to maintain or regain their confidence and self-esteem and improves their mental health and well-being. Our new deal for disabled people and pathways to work are two schemes that demonstrate what works best for people with long-term mental health problems. We will build on that knowledge and success in the proposals that we expect to publish in the autumn.

Dr. Pugh: I thank the Minister for her response. Given that mental health problems account for as much benefit money as back problems, the public stigma attached to such problems and the lack of public understanding of them, does she agree with Mind that we need a more proactive approach both to helping people with mental health problems into work and to keeping them there?

Margaret Hodge: I agree entirely with that proposition. We do need a more proactive approach, which is why the Government have been introducing innovative new schemes such as pathways to work and the new deal for disabled people, and why the Green Paper that we shall put forward in the autumn will cover this very issue. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join the debate which we hope will stem from that Green Paper.

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): One source of support for those with mental health problems is the access to work programme, and yet it seems to be one of the best-kept secrets in government. Three out of four employers have not heard of it, let alone know what it does. Will my right hon. Friend give a commitment to the House this afternoon that the Government will engage in a serious publicity programme in relation to access to work and ensure that the effects of that are properly funded—that there is more money for access to work?

Margaret Hodge: I hope that my hon. Friend will support me in the necessary cuts that might follow were we to double or treble that budget, which I agree is well used. That budget has been doubled since we have been in government, and has been used effectively. With the new obligations on employers arising out of disability discrimination legislation, we are considering how it is right to expect employers, especially public sector employers, to make reasonable adjustments in the workplace for some people with disabilities who work, and how we can reuse some of the money and resources thereby released to get greater take-up. The scheme is undoubtedly popular, and I would love to be able to expand it to its fullest. I agree with him that we should build on what works best.

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): Is the Minister aware that her Government are making significant problems for people who are trying to get back into work? I recently visited a mental health charity in my constituency that offers people four hours' work a week in return for the minimum wage. When the minimum wage rises to £5.05, either their benefit or the work that they do at the charity will have to be cut. Will she consider that urgently and try to remedy the situation?

Margaret Hodge: We are constantly reviewing the limits that enable people to do some work while retaining their full benefits, to have regard to changes in work rates and inflation. It is important for many disabled people who have been locked into benefit dependency for a long time to enjoy the opportunity of a few hours in work as they move into proper paid jobs—[Interruption.] I have just said that we constantly keep the matter under review, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that as an undertaking.

Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that a good way of reintroducing people into work is through sessional and part-time work? If so, is she aware that the earnings disregard element within the jobseeker's allowance and income support has remained static for many years? Will she agree to consider that in the next Budget?

Margaret Hodge: We will always review all the earnings disregards to ensure that they are properly set so that we encourage those who have been out of the labour market for a long time to start re-entering it, and to ensure that people get paid the proper rate for the job that they do. We always keep that under review, and I assure my hon. Friend that we will continue to do so over the coming years.

Pension Protection Fund

4. Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the Pension Protection Fund's statement of investment principles. [12304]

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): The Pensions Act 2004 requires the board of the Pension Protection Fund to prepare and maintain a statement of its investment principles and policies. The statement was first published on 23 June, and is available on the PPF website.

Mr. Crabb: Does the Minister consider it consistent with concerns about moral hazard in pensions protection for the PPF to take equity stakes in companies?

Mr. Timms: In its first year of operation, no schemes will be transferred to the PPF. The first statement can therefore state confidently that 100 per cent. of its assets will be invested in bonds. It will, however, review the statement every 12 months. We can expect a revised statement once scheme assets and liabilities start to be transferred, as annexe 3 to the current statement makes clear.

I think that the hon. Gentleman has the Heath Lambert case in mind. I understand that the company sought clearance from the regulator for a restructuring that involved its pension fund taking a 10 per cent. equity stake in the new company. Especially in the light of the concerns about moral hazard that the hon. Gentleman rightly identified, before giving clearance the regulator must be sure that the company is heading for insolvency, so there would be a call on the PPF in any event. If the scheme were transferred to the PPF in the future, the PPF would hold that stake. I do not see anything inappropriate in that arrangement.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most important investments that the PPF makes on behalf of us all is in ensuring that those who would otherwise lose all their pensions, or a substantial amount of them, receive valuable support? I congratulate the Government on introducing that system, but problems are arising in relation to people who have taken early retirement. My hon. Friend will be well aware of the position at MG Rover, where some people could not even achieve the 90 per cent. of earnings, subject to the cap, that others below pensionable age will receive. Will he look into that? It could have perverse effects for the PPF.

Mr. Timms: I agree with what my hon. Friend says about the importance and value of the PPF's work in helping to rebuild confidence in pensions saving. I also pay tribute to the work that he has done—not least in a number of telephone calls to me—on behalf of his constituents working at Rover.

Under the arrangement made by Parliament, the PPF will provide 90 per cent. compensation for those who, immediately before the assessment date, are under the scheme's normal pension age. That applies to those who took early retirement, as well as those who are still in work. Otherwise, those who continued to work would be penalised. As my hon. Friend says, the amount is subject to a cap which is currently £25,000 a year.

It is necessary to establish the right balance between compensation, which we all want to be maximised, and the cost to other schemes through the levy. If we removed the 90 per cent. cap, there would be an additional cost of about £100 million a year to levy payers. I think we have set the right balance.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): Does the Minister agree that at a time when large pension funds have moved from equities to bonds, it is at least counter-intuitive of the PPF to invest in the shares of companies that face financial difficulties precisely because of their pension deficits? Does he expect deals such as the one that was done with Heath Lambert to be rare events? Will he confirm that the details of that deal will be placed in the public domain? If not, why not?

Mr. Timms: Such deals will certainly be rare events, but, as I said, the arrangement that was agreed means that the Heath Lambert pension fund will obtain an equity stake in the new company. If it subsequently goes to the PPF, other assets owned by the Heath Lambert fund will go with it, but I do not think that that will happen very often. The regulator is aware of the impact of a company collapse on employment and will always bear it in mind, along with its primary duty to protect pension scheme members.

Child Support Agency

6. Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): What his estimate is of the number of outstanding Child Support Agency claims. [12306]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): Of 680,000 new scheme applications, 260,000 are still to be cleared. A further 78,000 old scheme cases are still to be cleared, down from 130,000 a year ago. Some progress has been made, but those figures again illustrate the scale of the problems with the agency. We have therefore asked the chief executive to conduct a strategic review. His findings will be presented in the coming months, and we will report to the House in due course.

Paul Rowen: I am sure that the Minister will recall that, in January, the Select Committee on Work and Pensions expressed concern and said that the CSA was living on borrowed time. At that time, just under a quarter of a million cases were outstanding. On the figures that he has given us this afternoon, the figure is now up to 330,000. Does he agree that the CSA is living not just on borrowed time but on stolen time and that that delay is causing misery and despair for many working families?

Mr. Plaskitt: The delays are, of course, a problem. I think all hon. Members deal with these matters in their surgeries, which is why we are anxious to make progress in tackling the problems. The key is improving compliance rates because, if we can get those up, the agency can deal effectively with the backlog. I am happy to tell the hon. Gentleman that, based on the first results from 2005–06, compliance rates are reaching 82 per cent. in new cases and up to 75 per cent. under the old scheme. That is a remarkable improvement on where we were some time ago.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): May I bring to the Minister's attention the fact that, as a Member representing individuals affected by the CSA, one of the great difficulties that I have is in getting a coherent response when individuals want to know when their cases will be migrated from the old to the new system? Can he give us some assurance that there will be some coherent rationale for the migration and then ensure that the civil servants at least let us know what it is?

Mr. Plaskitt: There is quite a queue forming on the migration question. Indeed, I used to ask about it myself quite regularly. No migration has taken place yet because we have to ensure, first, that the case files on record are clean and, secondly, that the IT is absolutely robust. Work is in progress on both those issues. Then we will be in a position to do the migration. It will be done in a logical way, which should enable my hon. Friend and others to reassure their constituents. It is a little way off but we will report on it later in the year.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): Should the day of migration ever, thankfully, come, there will still be a problem in that, as I understand it, it may be several years before migrating cases will converge with those under the new scheme. Given the delays that there have been in the system, will the Minister look at whether it is possible to accelerate the convergence between the two payment schemes?

Mr. Plaskitt: It is worth pointing out that there are at the moment 480,000 new scheme cases on the new system and 680,000 old scheme cases on the old system. Some migration already takes place: where there is a linkage in cases, they transfer to the new technology. As I said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey), as soon as the files are clean and the IT is robust, we will be in a position to commence the migration.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I hope that I am not letting the cat out of the bag, but the Minister will know that one way of getting migrated from the old to the new system is to persuade an ex-partner to suspend her claim for a few weeks while continuing to pay her child support allowance and then to make a new claim. Is not there a mounting injustice that we need to put right urgently? Some of the letters that are going out to constituents trying to explain the rationale fall a long way short of what the Minister has just explained to us.

Mr. Plaskitt: That is why it is important to get these issues resolved. There has to be quite a lengthy lag between the two incidents. It is not straightforward to come out of an existing case and to come back into a new one. The price of doing that is quite a lengthy period without maintenance or benefit in some cases, so although some people have looked at that possibility it is quite a tricky thing to do.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): Since work and pensions questions last took place, the independent case examiner's annual report into the CSA has been published. She says, following on from some of the points made by the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), that referrals to her office have rocketed, that parents' experience of dealing with the CSA is demoralising, that it is almost impossible for people to obtain up-to-date information about their case, that they cannot have confidence in the phone system and that she has upheld the vast majority of complaints. Bearing all that in mind, can the Minister guarantee that there will be an improvement next year, or is it the case that Ministers cannot get a grip on the problems of the CSA?

Mr. Plaskitt: Let me make it clear that we welcome the independent case examiner's report. She has provided a very good analysis of the situation, but it is important to put her findings in perspective. Of some 1.4 million cases, just under 4,000 referrals were made, which is 0.2 per cent. of the agency's entire case load. Of those 4,000 referrals, the independent case examiner took up only 478, of which 84 per cent. were upheld.

Before the hon. Gentleman gets too excited about the CSA situation, he should mix his attitude with a little contrition. At the base of the CSA document, it says, "Made in Conservative Britain."

Pension Credit

7. Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): How many people are not receiving the pension credit to which they are entitled. [12307]

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): More than 2.7 million households in Great Britain are now receiving pension credit—nearly 1 million more than the number that received the minimum income guarantee that preceded it—including, incidentally, 4,780 in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. The latest estimate is that 3.85 million households are entitled to pension credit. That is rather fewer than was first estimated, but further data should be available by the end of the year.

Mr. Jackson: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, but will he confirm that, despite the Secretary of State's claim at oral questions on 20 June that there has been a "substantial drop" in the number of people not receiving the pension credit to which they are entitled, take-up has reduced considerably since the beginning of 2004?

Mr. Timms: Certainly not. Take-up has continued to rise, and, as I said, it is has now exceeded 2.7 million. As I also said, the estimate of the total number entitled has fallen somewhat from the original estimate, but actual take-up has continued to rise. In 1997, a lot of single pensioners had incomes of less than £70 a week through income support. Now, every one of them is entitled to at least £109 a week through the pension credit, which is the major factor behind the recent declaration by the Institute for Fiscal Studies that, for the first time, pensioners are no more likely to be poor than anyone else. Take-up is much higher today among those who stand to gain the most from the pension credit, and if the hon. Gentleman knows of people in his own constituency who should be receiving it but are not, I should be grateful if he would let me know.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Is the Minister's experience in his constituency the same as mine, which is that it is very difficult to find anybody who has been eligible for pension credit for any length of time? Might that suggest that the official data have wrongly estimated the numbers who can claim it, and that—far from there being a problem with non-take-up—the pension credit has been such a success that unless the Government undertake major long-term pension reform, it could be unsustainable in the long run?

Mr. Timms: My right hon. Friend makes a very important point about the significantly higher level of take-up, based on anecdotal evidence, than the data suggest. Overall, the data suggest a current take-up level of some 75 per cent. Take-up among those entitled to the guarantee credit—the people likely to benefit the most—is about 80 per cent., and among single women it is perhaps as high as 90 per cent. So, like my right hon. Friend, I think that the pension credit has gone a very long way toward addressing the scandal of pensioner poverty that existed in 1997.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): Does the Minister plan to undertake research into the effect of means-testing on pension credit take-up, particularly bearing in mind the commitment given by the current Chancellor when in opposition to abolishing means-testing for pensioners?

Mr. Timms: The pension credit has directed extra help at those who need it most, which is why we have seen a dramatic reduction in pensioner poverty since 1997. In addition, Pension Service staff spoke to the more than 200,000 customers who visited them in the quarter April to June 2005, in order to make sure that they received all the help to which they are entitled. That has generated 43,000 applications for the pension credit. We continue to work very hard on this issue, and as a result, we are seeing significant increases in take-up and new applications.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware, from earlier answers to questions, of how the pension credit has changed the quality of life of some of the poorest citizens in this country. What steps, if any, are in place to ensure that information about how to apply for the pension credit reaches the parts of the community that most need it—ethnic minority pensioners, for example, or women pensioners who, as we heard earlier, are often at the bottom of the chain when it comes to receiving pension entitlements—and where pensioner poverty is the likely result?

Mr. Timms: I completely agree with my hon. Friend. Many of us had the experience during the election campaign of meeting retired people whose lives had been transformed by the improvements brought about by the pension credit. We are working hard at finding new ways of getting information across. I agree that there is a particular challenge when it comes to pensioners in the ethnic minority communities, and we are developing some new ideas. Many visits are taking place: I have already mentioned that there were 200,000 in the last quarter as compared with 130,000 in the same quarter of the previous year. What I hope we will increasingly be able to do is to use data that the Department gains from other sources to identify those who stand to benefit from pension credit but are not yet receiving it. We can then help them to make a claim and perhaps even inform them that they are entitled to the credit although they do not realise it. There is much important work to be done on that.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): Despite what the Minister says about the take-up of pension credit, the figures show that in Northern Ireland only one in three pensioners are in receipt of it. Will the Minister look further into the issue of regional differences in the take-up of pension credit? What can be done to improve the take-up in areas where it is particularly low? The figures that I quoted are actually official figures released by the Government.

Mr. Timms: I did not quite catch the statistic that the hon. Gentleman gave. If he is saying that one in three pensioners in Northern Ireland are actually receiving pension credit, that is not very far out from the proportion that obtains across the country as a whole. If there are difficulties in Northern Ireland that the hon. Gentleman thinks require special attention I would of course be happy to discuss them with my ministerial colleagues.

Medical Appeal Tribunals

8. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What steps he is taking to review the operation and effectiveness of medical appeal tribunals. [12308]

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): Appeal tribunals and their decisions are totally independent of the Department. We do, however, have responsibility for their administrative support. From April 2006, that responsibility will be transferred to the Department for Constitutional Affairs. We currently have no plans to review operational procedures of the appeal tribunals.

Mr. Prentice: I must tell my Friend that that is a disappointing reply. Amazing as it may seem, doctors sometimes get things wrong and they sometimes underestimate the severity of the condition that they are diagnosing. My concern is that, in some cases, the medical appeal tribunals accept the original diagnosis at face value, which can lead to injustice. My question to my Friend is this. Notwithstanding the fact that appeal tribunals are independent bodies, surely training is needed so that members of the MATs can learn from their mistakes.

Margaret Hodge: I am still trying to find the question rather than the statement in that, but I took the first element of the statement as being that doctors occasionally get things wrong. Well, yes they do, but so do we all—[Interruption]—Opposition Members as well as Government Members, although some of us are better at admitting it than others. On the issue of training, all those who support the appeals process are trained and the chairman of the appeals tribunal has a statutory duty to ensure that all are trained. The medically qualified personnel are also trained and the chairman undertakes that training in consultation with the chief medical officer.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Will the hon. Lady look carefully into the issue of expert medical witnesses in all tribunals and courts of law in the light of the discredited evidence given by Sir Roy Meadows? Will the Government pause for reflection and issue stringent guidelines as to the context in which such expert medical evidence should be considered?

Margaret Hodge: I have a lot of respect for the hon. Lady, but she has strayed a bit from what is relevant for discussion at this afternoon's questions. The issue that she mentioned has absolutely nothing to do either with social security appeals tribunals or with any of the tribunals that are responsible for ensuring benefits. I am sure that the issue that she has raised, arising from publicity about a decision taken last week, will be dealt with appropriately by all Ministers and authorities who have direct responsibility for it. We do not.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that those particular doctors are all employed by private firms. Although I am sure that the Department for Constitutional Affairs is full of people with great medical expertise, I wonder if my right hon. Friend can give me some assurance that there will be a medical audit of the medical skills of the people employed by those private firms?

Margaret Hodge: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. All those who give their advice as medical practitioners need to demonstrate to whoever they work for that they are appropriately qualified as medical practitioners. That will be part of the infrastructure for any of the work associated with any of the benefits for which we have responsibility.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): We know that more than 50 per cent. of appeals overturn the original decision, so there is obviously a big issue about getting the decision right in the first place. That is of particular interest to my constituents with mental health problems, who lose their benefit. They know that they are unfit to work and will not sign the jobseeker's allowance form because that entails stating that they are ready for work and so losing their income support. In both the cases I have in mind, my constituents won on appeal, but they suffered a great deal of stress while they were waiting because they had no income on which to live.

Margaret Hodge: I appreciate the issue that my hon. Friend draws to the attention of the House and we are looking at it as we think through the reforms that will be part of the Green Paper to be published in the autumn. All the matters that go before tribunals, or are subject to assessment, are always a matter for professional judgment and it is difficult to get utterly consistent, universal results. That is something that we all have to live with, but what we must try to do is to minimise the impact that that can have on an individual's standard of living or their life chances.

Health and Safety (Theme Parks/Fun Fairs)

9. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): What representations he has received from the family of Megan Wilcox on health and safety arrangements at smaller theme parks and fun fairs; and if he will make a statement. [12309]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): First, I extend my sympathy to the family of Megan Wilcox for their tragic loss. I have received no representation from the family. I am aware, however, that my hon. Friend has himself been in recent contact with Lord Hunt of Kings Heath, the Minister responsible for health and safety.

Mr. Allen: I thank my hon. Friend and Lord Hunt for the personal interest that they have taken in this tragic case of a seven-year-old girl who tripped and fell in a fun park and died from her injuries. Is my hon. Friend as surprised as I was to discover that owners of fun parks, theme parks and fairgrounds have no legal obligation to have adequate first aid available for members of the public? Will she redouble the considerable effort that she has put into this case already and ensure that local authorities and the Health and Safety Executive talk to each other and possibly bring forward new law or guidance to ensure that the tragedy that affected my constituents' young daughter never happens to any young person again in such circumstances?

Mrs. McGuire: There is no statutory requirement to provide first aid facilities for the public, but it is encouraged in the guidance for fairgrounds and amusement parks agreed between the industry and the Health and Safety Executive. We want to ensure that good practice is followed so that the circumstances that my hon. Friend has described do not arise. I shall therefore ask the HSE to explore how good practice in first aid provision could be better promoted in the theme park and fairground sector, including the scope for it to be attached to public entertainment licences as a condition.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): The tragic case of Megan Wilcox will remind the House—if indeed many Members are not already well aware of the situation—of the consequences for an individual family in the distressing circumstances of accidental death. More practically, it will remind us all that the aggregate consequences of trips and falls and so on are every bit as important as those of catastrophic safety accidents. In the light of that, will the Minister join me in expressing disappointment that in the five years since Ministers bravely set health and safety targets, there has been no clear evidence of improvement across the piece, and that the Department's recent performance report on health and safety shows that all three parts of the target are currently subject to slippage?

Mrs. McGuire: I echo the hon. Gentleman's words in the first part of his comments. The targets established in 2001 were challenging and it is disappointing that there appears to have been some slippage, but we have to reinforce constantly the importance not just of corporate but of individual responsibility for health and safety. I can give the House the assurance that the Health and Safety Executive will constantly reinforce the message that health and safety issues are everybody's business.

Stakeholder Pensions

11. Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on stakeholder pensions.
[12311]

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): Almost 2.5 million stakeholder pensions have been sold in their first four years and are increasingly helping to ensure that everyone has the chance to save for a decent income in retirement.

Mrs. Dorries: According to the Prime Minister, it is absurd to suggest that stakeholder pensions have failed. However, according to the Pensions Commission the vast majority of small company stakeholder schemes are empty shells with no contributing members. Who do we believe, the independent non-partisan commission or the Prime Minister?

Mr. Timms: Stakeholder pensions have enabled many people to start saving for their retirement. They have also led to sharp reductions in the charges for personal pensions across the board, and as the Minister who had a hand in starting them up six years ago I take some pride in the achievements that we have seen since then. There are certainly some issues that need to be addressed; a large proportion of employer-designated schemes do not currently have members, but the role of employers is, in our view, key to promoting pensions saving. Designation will give us an employer-based infrastructure for pensions saving. The challenge is to increase the use of that infrastructure, and that is what we intend to do.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): Given that the Pensions Commission found little evidence of increased contributions owing to stakeholder pension schemes, does the Minister share the same definition of success as the current chairman of the Labour party who, when he was a Pensions Minister, said that the scheme was a tremendous success?

Mr. Timms: As I said to the House, there are almost 2.5 million stakeholder pensions, and contributions to them in the last year for which we have data topped £2 billion, so they are making an important contribution. The work of the Pensions Commission is to advise us how we can further increase pensions saving and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, like everyone on the Labour Benches, is very much looking forward to the commission's report later this year.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Whatever the merits or demerits of the stakeholder pension system, does the Minister agree that, for many of my constituents who were pensioners of British United Shoe Machinery, stakeholder pensions are of little assistance? The BUSM pension disappeared under mysterious circumstances. Will the Government apply their mind to looking into the matter and finding out where the money went and what can be done to assist the pensioners of that company in my constituency?

Mr. Timms: I am happy to look into the instance to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred. In recent years, there have been too many instances of that kind, which is why we introduced the Pension Protection Fund and the financial assistance scheme, but I shall be happy to look at the particular case that he raises.

Jobcentre Plus

12. Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): What representations he has received regarding the closure of Jobcentre Plus offices in north Wales and Porthmadog.
[12312]

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): Since July 2004, the Department has received representations from a number of interested parties. The development of Jobcentre Plus is not about closing offices but about transforming the service that we provide, thus making it more accessible, so that people obtain help in finding work at the same time as they apply for benefits. I am confident that Jobcentre Plus is well placed to deliver a high-quality service to people in north Wales.

Hywel Williams: I thank the Minister for that answer. The closure of the centre in Porthmadog will lead to the loss of some 50 jobs, and the closure of the Revenue office will also deal a further blow to the fragile and very local economy of north-west Wales. What discussions has she had with Economic Ministers in Cardiff regarding those economic effects of her policies?

Margaret Hodge: Every time we embark on a reconfiguration of services in a locality, we engage in extensive discussions to ensure that, if at all possible, alternative employment is found for some of the people who will be displaced by the reorganisation. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will make every effort that we can in those reorganisations to try to secure alternative employment for the people who will be affected by them.

Departmental IT Programme

13. Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): If he will make a statement on the development of the IT programme for the modernisation of his Department. [12313]

15. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): If he will make a statement on the development of the information technology programme for the modernisation of his Department. [12315]

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): The Department's programme is being designed to realise the enormous potential of IT to modernise and improve our services, building on successes such as the direct payment of benefits and the Jobcentre Plus online database of more than 400,000 current vacancies.

Anne Main: Is the Minister aware of the concerns expressed by some of his civil servants who will have to use the debt management IT service, who have said that the bits they have been allowed to see are not fit for purpose but that things are being rushed to meet certain dates, and that if the system goes live, we are going to be in a long-term mess?

Mr. Timms: I am aware of some concerns about the customer management system in Jobcentre Plus. Its implementation, which was due in June in some offices, was delayed until this month. There will be a further software release for that system during the summer, and we remain on track to complete its roll-out by the end of next year. However, I hope that the hon. Lady will accept the very striking examples of the successful use of IT in the welfare system. I have mentioned the online database of 400,000 jobs, which replaces the scruffy old postcards that Jobcentres used years ago. Smart terminals are now not only used in Jobcentres—I noticed one the other day at Stansted airport—and they will be appearing widely in the coming months. Direct payment has also been a success: 96 per cent. of benefit customers now receive their benefit by direct payments, instead of using the ration-book technology bequeathed to us by the previous Government. The hon. Lady should welcome that success as well.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): I am glad to hear from the Minister that version 999 is to be issued during the summer. He has a deserved reputation in IT. What is going wrong in his Department? Is it a case of garbage in, garbage out? Is the wrong systematic description of what is required being given to the software provider? Who will own up to saying what is going wrong with this, just as they have gone wrong with the tax credit system?

Mr. Timms: The Department has 35 major IT systems, including some of the largest in the world. Of course, it is a complex task to modernise and renew them. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind remark. He is someone who also understands very well the potential of IT to improve and modernise public services. I hope that he will welcome the progress that has been made—for example, with the direct payment of benefits, which involved putting a new terminal on every post office counter position in the country. The system was on budget and on time, and it is doing a great job.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My hon. Friend mentioned the Jobcentre Plus terminals, which are incredibly successful and carry an amazing amount of data about the jobs that are available not just in the locality, but throughout the country. What analysis has he undertaken to find out how the customers have taken to using that kind of system? Does that system point the way forward for the design of systems in the future?

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is another hon. Member who well understands the exciting potential that IT offers to modernising public services. The reaction to the job point system has been very positive, and it will become increasingly positive as the terminals appear in a wider variety of locations. Of course, in addition, the database of 400,000 vacancies is available online to any internet user anywhere. That is why it is the most popular of the Government's online applications.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Having spent three decades in public sector IT development before coming into this place, it seems to me that, far too often high-ranking civil servants and Ministers fall for the blandishments of the modern day snake oil salesmen who populate the private IT sector. When does the Minister expect that we will show some faith in the internal staff who know the systems and can develop new projects to a better standard and within time scales in the way in which the private sector has notably failed to do?

Mr. Timms: We do indeed need to take advantage of the skills and expertise of staff who work in our Department and agencies, but we should also be able to call on expertise from outside when it makes sense to do so. Getting that balance right by getting a good mix of suppliers from the private sector will be important in achieving the success that we are committed to bringing about.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a short business statement. Following tributes to the right hon. Sir Edward Heath, the House will adjourn. The business for the remainder of the week will now be as follows:

TUESDAY 19 JULY—Second Reading of the Crossrail Bill.

WEDNESDAY 20 JULY—Motion to approve the draft Council Tax Limitation (England) (Maximum Amounts) Order 2005, followed by remaining stages of the Regulation of Financial Services (Land Transactions) Bill, in turn followed by a motion on the summer recess Adjournment.

THURSDAY 21 JULY—Second Reading of the London Olympics Bill.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I thank the Leader of the House for that statement and for making changes to this week's business so that the House today can remember a distinguished Member of more than 50 years' standing and a distinguished former Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. Heath. [Laughter.]

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): No relation, but indeed a distinguished Member of the House.

May I ask the Leader of the House a brief question? He has obviously introduced new business for Wednesday this week. Given that a number of Back Benchers may want to speak on both the motion to approve the draft Council Tax Limitation (England) (Maximum Amounts) Order 2005 and the motion on the summer recess Adjournment, will he consider setting aside time for debate for both items of business?

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that that can be arranged through the usual channels.

Sir Edward Heath KG MBE

3.32 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): I beg to move, That this House do now adjourn.

Sir Edward Heath died yesterday after a long illness. I am sure that the whole House would like to join me in thanking the team of carers from Oxley Care who looked after him in the last few years. I know how grateful Ted was to them.

There have been many handsome and well-merited tributes to Ted Heath as a Prime Minister, as a Member of this House for more than 50 years and Father of it, and as a man of vision, principle and integrity. He was quintessentially his own man. He made up his own mind and having done so, he was unshakable. But Ted Heath would have recognised, and have been proud, that it was his momentous decision to take Britain into the Common Market that would dominate the hundreds of thousands of words written and spoken about him today. He might have been Prime Minister for less than four years, but few holders of this office have made such a lasting difference to this country, its direction and its place in the world.

Ted Heath's commitment to Europe, and his determination that Britain should be at its heart, was born of the horrors that he witnessed while fighting to liberate the continent from the evils of fascism. These wartime experiences, as they did for many of his generation, shaped him as a man and a politician. They made him determined to do all that he could to ensure that Europe was never again ripped apart by conflict.

Ted Heath could also certainly have claimed to have been the first modern Conservative leader. He came, as we know, from a relatively humble background in Broadstairs. He was a grammar school boy and through his own hard work and intelligence, he won a place at Oxford, where he became president of the union.

It was at Oxford that Ted Heath first showed he was prepared to be unpopular in defence of his political views, when he joined those in his party who opposed appeasement and supported the anti-Chamberlain cause in the famous Oxford by-election. He was also a supporter of the republican Government in Spain, a result of a visit during the Spanish civil war, where he witnessed first-hand the destruction caused by air attacks.

After distinguished military service in the Royal Artillery, he was elected Member of Parliament for Bexley in the 1950 general election. Reflecting his political passion for the next half century, his maiden speech was a plea for Britain not to stand aside from Europe, but to play its full role as an active partner. He was also a founder of the one nation Tory group, which he was to personify throughout his time in the Commons.

On coming to Parliament, Ted Heath's talents were quickly recognised, and within five years he was Chief Whip. He showed enormous skill in this post, helping to keep his party together during the difficult days of the Suez crisis, despite his own deep personal reservations. As Chief Whip, he also had a prominent role in the appointment of Harold Macmillan as Eden's successor. In return, Ted Heath was eventually promoted to the Cabinet, and soon after entrusted with the task of heading Britain's negotiations to join the Common Market. Between 1961 and 1963, he toured Europe's capitals ceaselessly, clocking up more than 100,000 miles trying to reach agreement. I understand that the main bone of contention was agricultural policy. Ted Heath very nearly achieved agreement, only to have President de Gaulle veto Britain's membership.

Interestingly, despite the intense and humiliating frustration of rejection by France, it never altered Ted Heath's view that Britain's future was in Europe. He saw correctly that de Gaulle's opposition was in fact a reason to proceed with membership, not to abandon it—that Britain had something unique and important to contribute to Europe. He also correctly recognised that the British alliance with the United States was stronger, not weaker, by dint of European membership.

Ted Heath's hard work and intelligence during the difficult negotiations greatly enhanced his stature within the Government and the country. Winston Churchill was among the many who wrote to him to congratulate him on his efforts. In Europe, he won the prestigious Charlemagne prize, which had a practical benefit, as he used the money to buy a Steinway grand piano, which was later to move into No. 10 with him.

Ted Heath's music and sailing were, of course, a big part of his life. I think it is safe to say, even with the many candidates now putting themselves forward on the Opposition Benches as potential successors, that he is likely to remain the only Tory leader to conduct at the Royal Albert hall and win the Sydney to Hobart yacht race during their time in the post.

Ted Heath's time as Opposition leader is perhaps best known for sacking Enoch Powell, a decision that required great political courage, and for appointing Margaret Thatcher to the shadow Cabinet. [Laughter.] His victory in the 1970 general election was against all the odds, but his premiership came at a difficult time for the country. He was beset by problems on the economy, on industrial relations and in Northern Ireland. He showed his integrity and leadership, however, when, despite the opposition of some in his party and outside it, he offered a safe haven to 60,000 Ugandan Asians threatened by Idi Amin, a decision from which our country greatly benefited.

Of course, the outstanding achievement of Ted Heath's time at No. 10 was in January 1973, when he took Britain into the European Economic Community. It was a political and a personal triumph for Ted Heath, but it was not enough, for a country hit by a three-day week, to save his Government. Three and a half years later, after entering No. 10, he called an early general election, but was narrowly defeated. Roy Jenkins often used to say that the tragedy was that Labour lost the election in 1970, which it should have won, and won the election in 1974, which it should have lost. Certainly, Ted would have agreed with the latter.

When Ted Heath lost again in October 1974, he found himself challenged by Margaret Thatcher for the Conservative leadership, and she won. For the next 26 years, he remained on the Back Benches, a familiar sight in this place. Throughout, he never flinched from arguing for the one-nation Toryism he believed in, or from putting passionately the case for Europe. Ted was very blunt in his manner, though once you got to know him he was very kind. I remember that I first met him at a parliamentary reception in the mid-1980s shortly after I became a Member of this House. He said, "Are you an MP?" "Yes", I said. "Which party?" "Labour", I said. "Well, you don't look like it or sound like it", he said. [Laughter.] "What's more", he said, "as an Opposition, you're bloody useless." He then proceeded with remarkable insight to tell me exactly what we should have been doing.

His trenchant criticism of his own party leadership must have been very irritating for them. Being myself, for obvious reasons, generally disposed towards party loyalty, I was never sure about it. As those of us who can recall him know, he was magnificent; he would fill the House. I can picture him now, standing below the Gangway, often speaking without a note, with humour, incisive argument and magisterial disdain for the opposing view—swatting away anyone ill-judged enough to make a hostile intervention. To quote again his old Balliol friend Roy Jenkins, he was a "great lighthouse which stands there, flashing out beams of light, indifferent to the waves which beat against him."

That is indeed how he was: an extraordinary man, a great statesman, a Prime Minister our country can be proud of. We shall miss him.

3.41 pm

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I join the Prime Minister in paying tribute on behalf of Conservative Members to the memory of Sir Edward Heath, and also in paying tribute to those at Oxley Care who looked after him so devotedly in the last few years.

Ted Heath was one of the political giants of the 20th century. As Chief Whip during Suez, as a Cabinet Minister under Harold Macmillan and Alec Douglas-Home, and above all as the Prime Minister whose single-minded determination took us into the European Economic Community, he made an historic contribution to our country. He was the last leader of the Conservative party to have served in the second world war. In common with the rest of his generation, his whole outlook on life was shaped by that titanic conflict. Even before it began, he was aware of the dangers that lay ahead. As a young man, he heard Hitler address a Nuremberg rally, and he actually met Goering, Goebbels and Himmler, whom he described as "The most evil man I've ever met".

In the famous 1938 Oxford by-election, Ted Heath opposed the Conservative candidate, Quintin Hogg, and campaigned instead for A. D. Lindsay, the master of Balliol, who stood on an anti-appeasement platform. After the war, he saw political integration in Europe as the best way to avoid a repeat of its horrors. That became the moving force of his political career, and as Prime Minister he succeeded where Macmillan had failed, by taking Britain into the Common Market. It was controversial when he did so—he needed the votes of Members of other parties to get the legislation through the House—and it has remained controversial ever since. But Ted never wavered in his attachment to the European dream. He was utterly and unswervingly consistent. His maiden speech in this House was in the debate on the Schuman plan; his final speech was dominated by the same issue.

[Mr. Michael Howard]

Ted was less successful in achieving his other political objectives. Before the 1970 election, he outlined an exciting programme to revitalise the nation's economy based on a smaller state, lower taxes, less regulation and trade union reform. That platform, designed at the Selsdon Park hotel, provoked Labour into caricaturing his position. They depicted him as "Selsdon man" or a dangerous reactionary. Ted went through what every Conservative leader always faces in Opposition—the accusation just a few months before the election that they are lurching to the right. However, he won the 1970 election against the tide of expectation. It was a tribute to his determination to try to pursue the course that he believed to be right. His task was made much harder when Ian Macleod, his first choice as Chancellor and another political giant of the age, died tragically just weeks after the election. The problems of rampant inflation and overweening trade union power that were to dog his four years in office made him change course, and adopt instead policies that were unequal to the challenge. Yet many of the changes that he originally tried and failed to put in place were made 10 years later by his successor, Margaret Thatcher. The BBC's political editor said last night that Margaret Thatcher was a grocer's daughter in more senses than one. The fact that neither of them would perhaps welcome that thought made it no less appropriate.

After leaving office, Ted remained true to his character and continued to court controversy, especially in the Conservative party, but he did so more often mischievously than wilfully. He never lost his wit, even if it was displayed in ways not always likely to be appreciated by his successors. When speaking at the Conservative party conference in 1981, at the height of the first Thatcher Government's unpopularity, he advised the conference representatives:

"Please don't applaud—It may irritate your neighbour."

Whatever disagreements he had or manufactured, he was a Conservative all his life. He remained a remarkable House of Commons man, serving as a Member continuously for 51 years. He became Father of the House, and it was fitting that one of his final acts as a Member of Parliament was to preside in October 2000 over the election of a new Speaker—something that he clearly enjoyed hugely, and which showed him in his element. He lamented the declining influence of Parliament in holding the Executive to account—a trend which he noted had taken place under Governments of both parties, and a development that many of us, indeed, regret.

Ted was remarkable for the width and breadth of his outside interests and skills. How many leading politicians could have won the Sydney to Hobart race? How many Prime Ministers could have captained the British team to win the Admiral's cup? How many could have conducted world-class orchestras? He came from a humble background, and followed the then familiar route from grammar school to Oxford, but he never forgot his origins. Every year, Ted used to return to his home town of Broadstairs to conduct the Christmas carol concert. Music for him was not just a source of personal solace. It embodied the deeper harmonies which we, as human beings, live by. Because Ted was a private man, who did not wear his emotions on his sleeve, people often did not see his personal side, but we gain an occasional glimpse from his autobiography. His father, he wrote,

"was an excellent craftsman, and his work was greatly admired by all who saw it. The earliest examples that I can remember were the money boxes—mine of mahogany, my brother's of oak—which he made in order that we might collect our small savings in them. Each was inscribed with our name, and I still have my beautiful mahogany box in my study".

Today, we remember a Prime Minister who was a most distinguished parliamentarian, who was fearless in his views and rock-like in his integrity, and who always sought to serve his country to the very best of his ability. In this House we join together to mourn his passing.

3.49 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Lochaber) (LD): Despite the sadness of the occasion, I think that Sir Edward would want the House, as both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition have said, to remember his sense of optimism as well as his warmth and wit, and very often his wisdom. I think that the Prime Minister was right to mention on a couple of occasions Roy Jenkins. Sir Edward and Roy were two politicians whom I knew from afar. In Roy's case, I came to know him extremely well, and in Sir Edward's, somewhat. They shared so much throughout their different political careers that paralleled each other. They knew each other well, not least on the issue of Europe.

Many of us of a further generation have been motivated by and cared passionately about Europe. We look to a politician such as Sir Edward Heath and what he achieved. We look also at the present circumstances within the democratic Europe of today, including the difficulties that it is facing precisely because of democratic choices made in recent referendums in other countries. We must contrast these difficulties—which we hope are being reconciled peacefully through discussion—with the difficulties that motivated a previous generation, the members of which saw the differences within Europe being resolved only by bloodshed and war. That motivation for them and for the founding fathers that they looked to will, I hope, be one that motivates also the generation of European leaders today.

In many respects, as I have said, the careers of Sir Edward and Roy Jenkins ran in parallel, not only through Europe. They remained confidantes and colleagues as well as being competitors right to the end, when they went head to head in a final run-off for the chancellorship of Oxford university. After that final democratic contest between the two of them, Roy used to tell the story of Sir Edward inviting him to his marvellous house in Salisbury, next to the cathedral and proudly showing Roy round—just the two of them were having dinner together as elder statesmen.

At one point they ended up in the master bedroom. Sir Edward pointed out the view of the cathedral spire from the window. Roy being Roy said, "Ted, I think that this must be one of the 10 best bedroom views in England." There was silence. Then Sir Edward replied, "And what would be the other nine?"

Sir Edward, in that Denis Healey sense, had a hinterland as a politician and as a statesman. In his case it was a hinterland that can literally be described as oceanic in every sense. On a personal level, when the Conservatives went into Opposition and I found myself elected leader of my party, for a number of years I sat during Prime Minister's questions where my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) now sits. Sir Edward sat where I am now standing. I have to share with the House something that for me summed him up. If there is a book to be published in future when perhaps none of us is in this place, it is the book of Sir Edward's running commentary in my right ear of the contributions in advance of my own during Prime Minister's questions, particularly his insightful running commentary of the contributions from the parliamentary Conservative party. One particular occasion comes to mind. The Prime Minister had just returned from a much-vaunted third-way summit involving Chancellor Schröder, President Clinton and Prime Minister Jospin. At the beginning of that week the French behaved in a completely unacceptable way. It was declared illegal in due course, and was very sensibly handled by the Prime Minister. It was a flouting of European law and a refusal to readmit British beef. The then leader of the Conservative party, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), was on to the issue like a shot at Prime Minister's questions. He had a cavalcade of questions and was making extremely good headway over this difficulty, understandably at the Government's expense. He finished with a great flourish, saying that it was so much for the Prime Minister's "much-vaunted third way", and that as far as his socialist friend Mr. Jospin was concerned, it was more a "case of two fingers."

The right hon. Gentleman sat down to great cheers and the waving of Order Papers from the more Euro-sceptical sections of the parliamentary Conservative party. At that point, sitting in the place now occupied by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife, the sphinx sitting next to me moved imperceptively. He flicked a disapproving look, leaned over and said, "Such a vulgar little man." The House will adjourn today—I do not think it will divide on that proposition.

With regard to Sir Edward, both on a very human level and on a statesman-like level, he was a gifted man, a good man and a very great man. One cannot say of many politicians of whatever persuasion that they changed the course of history, but he did, and for the better. We miss him very much.

3.55 pm

Sir Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) (Lab): I may be the only Member of the House who shook Ted Heath's hand after the election of 1970. I had flown over from New York to celebrate a great Labour victory and I was sitting in my hotel a few yards from the Albany, where Ted Heath lived. As the newspapers of the time said, Ted had sailed into 10 Downing street.

Seeing all the crowds outside the Albany and being only a few yards away, I went down and stood among the crowds. As I stood there, finally they parted, a car came up, Ted Heath's hand jutted out of the window and I shook his hand. I covered my bets by going down to Transport house immediately to commiserate with Harold Wilson, who was there giving his kind thanks to our staff who, of course, were very respectful to him and gave him the kind of cheers that Ted Heath had received outside the Albany. Years later, at the Inter-Parliamentary Union, when I saw Ted Heath and said, "I had my picture taken with you on the day of your election," he looked at me and said, "It didn't do much good, did it?"

Later still, as an international lawyer, I represented Hermes, the tie company that makes the best of ties. I could recognise a Hermes tie a hundred yards away. I saw Ted Heath in the Smoking Room wearing a Hermes tie. I said to him, "Sir Edward"—we had more respect for him then—"You're wearing a Hermes tie. I am their lawyer." He looked at me and said, "I often wondered why they were so expensive."

As the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition said, Sir Edward was a fundamental European, on the basis of his war years. He made his first speech in 1950 on the European Coal and Steel Community, he tried to get us into the European Union, as it is now known, in 1963, and he took us in in 1973. One of the questions put to him by President Pompidou at the time was whether, if the United Kingdom joined the European Union, it would accept the common agricultural policy. Ted Heath gave that commitment of our country from that day and it still runs today.

We have heard much of Ted Heath being a House of Commons man. He was a Back Bencher, a Whip, a Minister and Prime Minister. When he retired from the front line of politics, he stayed in the House for the rest of the 51 years. He saw us through two speakerships—your own, Mr. Speaker, and Lady Boothroyd's—and when the time was up, he used the famous phrase of your predecessor. Time was indeed up. He did not go to the Lords.

I end by quoting a little poetry:

"He nothing common did or mean
Upon that memorable scene".

That scene was the House of Commons, which he graced for 51 years.

3.58 pm

Derek Conway (Old Bexley and Sidcup) (Con): It is daunting to follow so many eloquent tributes to Sir Edward Heath, but not half as daunting as following him as the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup. Those who knew Ted well would have expected him to be generous and helpful to his successor, and indeed he was. He gave me sound advice and a great deal of encouragement. I wondered whether, having served in the House for 51 years, in his later years he had become a little tired of it all and had slowed down. The average length of service for an MP is between eight and 10 years, so 51 years would give any reasonable person time to slow down a bit.

As I padded around the streets of Sidcup and Bexley village, I discovered that Ted was still an assiduous Member of Parliament. Although the House rightly pays tribute to his time as Prime Minister and his renown as an international statesman, the people of Old Bexley and Sidcup will remember a famous Member of Parliament, but one who took an enormous amount of time, patience and trouble over their concerns. They were often surprised when Ted dealt with their concerns personally rather than using a special adviser or assistant.

[Derek Conway]

Not only did Ted do the normal jobs such as holding surgeries and visiting schools, but he was a great champion on local issues—for example, selective education still survives in the London borough of Bexley. Ted was, as the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition said, a tremendous champion for selective education, having benefited from grammar school himself, and he fought tooth and nail to establish Bexley grammar school, where he is still revered.

Tributes have been paid to Ted's involvement in the European issue. He was clearly an unashamed Europhile, so naturally he thought that the channel tunnel was wonderful. Sadly for the residents of Sidcup, the proposed rail link went smack through the middle of his constituency, which resulted in a conflict between his avowed Europhile beliefs and his constituents' interests. He stuck by his constituency and helped his constituents fight for a more sensible route that damaged fewer homes. I have discovered that people had an enormous wealth of respect and affection for their Member of Parliament.

I have known Ted since I was 18, when I was northern area Young Conservative chairman. Our leader was my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who was young and dashing—he had a sports car and a trendy beard. Ted encouraged the Conservative party youth movement, and he used to have the Young Conservative officers round for dinner at No. 10 or lunch at Chequers, which was impressive. He also used to encourage young musicians and he enjoyed his sport. He will be remembered with affection not only in this House, but outside it.

Michael Brown, who is now a distinguished columnist in The Independent, is one former Member who will remember Ted with affection. He served in this House from 1979 to 1997, and he used to sit behind Ted when Ted sat in the seat that is currently occupied by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). He used to contribute vociferously and frequently to debates, and his comments made Ted more and more irritable. On the day that Michael Brown was appointed a Government Whip, he was wandering down the Library Corridor, when Ted came out of the Smoking Room—as a former Chief Whip, Ted had an enormous affection for the Whips Office. Michael expected Ted to amble by and ignore him, which he usually did, but on this occasion Ted turned around and said, "I see that they have managed to shut you up at last." By tradition, Government Whips cannot speak in this Chamber.

The party leaders and others have rightly paid tribute to Ted Heath the statesman but, for the people of Old Bexley and Sidcup, he was not only an extraordinarily able man, but a conscientious MP and, more importantly, a very good man.

4.2 pm

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): My late constituent, Sir Edward Heath, was a very great Englishman. When, after just one year in this House, the Government Chief Whip asked me whether I would fulfil the unofficial role of Parliamentary Private Secretary to an ex-Prime Minister, which is traditional in our party, it led to several comments in the newspaper diaries. As has been said, it was an act of bravery, but I have never regretted taking up that challenge, because I learned that Sir Edward was not only a great Englishmen, but esteemed enormously throughout Europe and beyond as a man who was prepared to lay down his life for his beliefs. He fought against Nazism, he joined in the democratic battle, he challenged the establishment and he faced up to the realities of Britain and its economy in the 1970s. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition said, he was ahead of his time, but he achieved an enormous amount.

When Sir Edward asked me, his PPS, to find him a house, it seemed a little beyond the call of duty. Within a few weeks, however, I had found him a house in Salisbury close. When he came down to see that wonderful house, he looked around it without saying a word, and then we drove back to London. At about midnight, he phoned me and said, "I hope that they have not sold my house." He purchased the lease and then the freehold on "Arundells", and became a figure of great affection in Salisbury and south Wiltshire.

Anyone who doubts his capacity for being an ordinary human being should talk to anyone who ever worked for him in his private office—his constituency secretaries and his political staff, many of whom, including my hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir Michael Spicer), have gone on to do other things with great success and distinction. Sir Edward was held in very great affection by all those people. He inspired enormous loyalty. That is no surprise, given that he had been a distinguished musician used to holding an orchestra and a chorus together, as well as a distinguished soldier under fire.

During his distinguished political career, Sir Edward also managed to inspire loyalty among his dear constituents, as we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway). Having travelled with Ted in the capitals of Europe in the 1980s and met, with him, some of the leaders of those countries, I know that he never for one moment forgot the importance of his constituents and why he was where he was. One evening in the château de Rambouillet, when we had been over to meet the President of France and were enjoying his hospitality, there was a sudden flurry and the French Justice Minister turned up. He had asked to see Ted because he was engaged in a prolonged correspondence with him about a constituent who had been arrested and thrown into prison in Paris for some reason. Ted had immediately taken the case up so, when he saw the President, he told him that he was most disturbed about it, and immediately the Justice Minister was dispatched to sort it out. Ted never forgot the importance of his constituents.

In Salisbury, where he lived for the past 20 years, he made a name for himself as the man who goes and talks to people. One will find 20 and more pubs in south Wiltshire where people will say, "That's where Ted sits", or, "That's where Ted used to come and have his malt." The enormous affection in which people in Salisbury hold him extends right across the political spectrum and the age spectrum. We should not forget the generosity with which he raised millions of pounds for Salisbury cathedral over the years to maintain that magnificent edifice, at the same time as restoring his own wonderful house.

Sir Edward Heath has made an enormous impression on a very large number of people in many walks of life. Many tributes have been paid to him today, and I merely add my own. He was a wonderful man who was proud of his country. He loved his Queen, our constitution and our way of life, for which he was prepared to lay down his life. Right to the end, he was shouting the odds for democracy in our country.

Yes, he had his difficulties with his successor as leader, and harsh words were expressed on all sides, but I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend Lady Thatcher for her warm tribute to him, about which he would no doubt be shrugging his shoulders.

I do not doubt that, when we think back on the life of Ted Heath, he will be seen not only as a very great Englishman, a great democrat and a great European, but a very warm human being. Let us not forget how proud he was of his house, the paintings, every bit of china and every photograph on the piano. Let us not forget how proud he was of his garden, as the greatest armchair gardener Salisbury has ever known, or that he was enormously proud to serve one with broad beans out of his precious garden, where he knew every plant, tree and shrub.

Ted Heath was a great Prime Minister and a great member of the Conservative party. He was always loyal to our party and never voted against it in all his years, even though he may have sometimes had his disagreements with our leadership. We are very grateful for the life of Sir Edward Heath and, in Salisbury, we will remember him for a very long time as a great moonraker who was formerly a man of Kent but adopted with love in the county of Wiltshire.

4.9 pm

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): Ted Heath had a huge influence on my personal life of which I do not think that he was ever aware in his lifetime. I arrived on 18 January 1974, hardly speaking any English, during the three-day week, and I learned all my English and understanding of the British political system by asking awkward questions such as "Why do they call him, 'The Grocer'?", "What is a Tory?", and "How does the electoral system work?". It was because he brought this country into the European Union and signed the European Communities legislation that I was able to come here to live and work and enjoy the four freedoms. He left a huge legacy and is hugely respected on mainland Europe.

I make one brief observation. When our current Prime Minister was awarded the Charlemagne prize, I went over to Aix-la-Chapelle, and Edward Heath was there as one of the honoured guests who are there on every occasion and greatly revered. The people of Aachen, as I like to call it, were always extremely proud of the fact that they spotted him as one to watch when he was a young Back Bencher and not recognised in terms of promotion. As, in this case, the second British Prime Minister was receiving the Charlemagne prize, their only regret was that they did not spot his talent as early as they did the previous recipient's. The commitment to Europe is great, but I hope that, while the next generation might be different, it will be recognised that many in my generation, such as me, have benefited and become Europeans through their life experiences, and I pay tribute to Sir Edward Heath for that.

4.10 pm

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): I think that I owe more to Ted Heath than anyone else in the House because he did for me what he was unable to do for himself—he found me a wife. His quality as a friend—a friendship which began when he was my neighbour as a candidate in Greenwich and continued when I became Member of Parliament for Lewisham, West—was remarkable. It was hard for those who found him difficult because he did not know them, and who found him shy because he was, to know how warm he was, and how far he would go to help those who were young. His commitment to the young continued right to the end of his life. I happened to talk to someone this afternoon who remarked that as a 20-year-old he met Ted Heath at a function, they began to talk, and half an hour later they were still talking, and Ted was still fascinating and still wanted to learn from and hear as well as talk to a young person. He had that quality throughout his life. His friendship and the warmth of his character came through to those who knew him well.

For my generation, Ted represents something particular and special. He was never prepared to allow people to be bullied. He would not have the bullying that came from the natural hegemony of the Ulster Unionists. Nor would he have the bullying that came from those who thought that they could use the bomb and the bullet. He would not accept that we should have a society in which any section should be able to control the rest, as he felt that the trade unions, in their more militant guise, were seeking to do. He did not want there to be the kind of society in which people such as him could not progress to the top, and he never had a chip on his shoulder about it—he was enormously grateful that he lived in a society in which what he did was possible. That is a lesson, if I may say so, for many others—no chip on the shoulder but simply a recognition that this was that kind of society.

Ted was also clear that nobody should bully people because of the colour of their skin. The immediate and absolute action that he took about the speech by Enoch Powell was a pivotal moment, as was his acceptance, to which the Prime Minister rightly pointed, of those east African Asians who fled the tyranny of Idi Amin.

At all points in his life, Ted stood up for those who could not stand up for themselves. He saw that as a natural part of being a one-nation Conservative. Those of us who hold that view of society have an enormous amount to thank him for.

Of course history will think of Ted Heath, and so should we, as the man who understood that it was patriotic to see Britain at the centre of the European Union, as part and parcel of a movement that could ensure that the nations of Europe would find their future together—as nations, but together—rather than in the destruction of each other in the absence of a mechanism to solve the problems that inevitably existed between them. He was consistent in that view, and was saddened by people's failure to see that the real idealism was not what we in Britain could get out of the European Union, but what we could contribute to it. That is what he understood: that a Europe without Britain would lose so much. It was that way round. That is how he always saw our membership of the European Community, and subsequently of the European Union.

[Mr. John Gummer]

As for those who knew Ted personally, it will be for warmth, laughter and above all kindness that we will remember him. Of course he was a great House of Commons man. There were the side comments, and the remarkable ability to be tougher, sharper and more difficult than almost anyone I have ever known. All that will be remembered and retold again and again; but for those who knew him, the one word "kindness" will come through all the time. No one who knew him will forget that.

4.16 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) (Lab): In the 1960s, when I came to the House not knowing Edward Heath at all well, I found a man who was easier to respect than to like. I found it difficult to identify the warm, humorous man described to me continually by my long-term pair Terence Higgins—although later, thankfully, I came to see those qualities.

We talk today of the enormous stature that Edward Heath achieved, but we look back and realise that, remarkably, he achieved that in one of the shortest premierships since the war. That brief period was marked by a surprise victory, and ended with a surprise defeat; but in between, he made a decision of monumental importance to this country, which showed the tremendous character of the man and the fact that he was willing to take any risk with his own career to do what he thought was right for the country.

A measure of the man was that having lost the two 1974 elections and having then been deprived of a leadership that he felt was his, he did not flee up the Corridor. He did not go to the House of Lords for a comfortable, quiet existence. He chose to spend a further quarter of a century as a Back Bencher in the House of Commons. That is how much he loved this House. I think he took almost as much pride in becoming Father of the House towards the end of his career as he took in securing the leadership of his party.

In his final speech, Ted Heath urged us to protect the rights and also the standing of the House of Commons. He was to the end a House of Commons man, and I am sure that that is how he would have been happy to be remembered. I think we want to remember him for more than that, however. I think we want to remember a man of unshakeable integrity, which is the quality that the House admires most.

4.18 pm

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): The Father of the House, the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), spoke of the period during which Ted Heath was Prime Minister. I came to the House during that period, and I am the only current Member of Parliament to have done so. The two events were not unconnected. Ted Heath's Government was growing in unpopularity when I won a by-election, although that was not because of Europe. Indeed, I do not suppose that I would have won the by-election if that had been the reason, for we had supported him unflinchingly against fervent opposition from much of the Labour party during that time. Shortly afterwards came the February 1974 election. But like most of us who were not members of his party, I got to know him much better later in my parliamentary life than in those early stages when he was the more distant figure of Prime Minister.

I echo the comments of other Members about Ted's kindness and courtesy. It was not that Ted always spoke to one; in fact, he was a man without much small talk, by which I mean that he did not say anything if he did not have anything to say—a principle that many of us should perhaps adopt in more circumstances. However, when he did have something to say, he said it with enormous wit and often with kindness. I experienced that kindness on a number of occasions when he was encouraging and helpful to me. I am sure that that was the experience of some Members in other parties who had the privilege of spending time in the House with him.

Ted Heath was a Prime Minister with whom I had one fundamental agreement and a number of less significant but politically important disagreements. The agreement was Europe, the disagreements were on a wide range of issues that made him a Conservative and me a Liberal Democrat, but I still remember with relish one experience before I came into the House: the occasion when he was seen leaving London sporting a red rosette in the middle of a general election while leading the Conservative party. A number of journalists pressed him on why that was so until he eventually said—some Members, including the hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway), will remember—"It is because I am going to the north-east." It was not because of any hope of improving the still unimproved Conservative fortunes in the north-east. It was because, in those days, the Conservatives fought the north-east in red, the Liberals in blue and Labour in green.

4.20 pm

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): Reference has been made to the contribution that Sir Edward made in Northern Ireland. During his time as Prime Minister, we had some of the most difficult years of what have become known as the troubles, particularly the early 1970s. We had the largest loss of life in 1972, while he was Prime Minister. While we on this Bench would have had our differences with Sir Edward, most notably over the Sunningdale agreement and entry into the European Economic Community, we recognise his contribution.

It has already been referred to that Sir Edward was a Prime Minister who did not believe that terrorism should succeed and, in Northern Ireland, he provided the Army to counter the activity in the early 1970s of the newly formed Provisional IRA. He was a statesman and that was obvious from his approach not only in Northern Ireland but on other issues. In dealing with the situation in Northern Ireland, he brought his experience of the second world war and his knowledge of the Army to bear in very difficult and trying times for the people not only of Northern Ireland but of the United Kingdom. We salute his courage in terms of the decisions that he had to make at that time in countering terrorism and in dealing with the threat that existed there and which sadly continues even to this day.

I would like on a personal level to pay tribute to Sir Edward as a Member of Parliament. He was the Father of the House when I was first elected to the House of Commons and one could see that he was greatly devoted to this House. As other right hon. and hon. Members have mentioned, he remained here to make his contribution long after he lost his position as Prime Minister. As a new MP, I held him as someone for whom there was great respect and admiration for the contribution that he made to the House. We will all mourn his passing as a great parliamentarian and statesman who undoubtedly left his mark on the United Kingdom.

4.23 pm

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), I met Ted Heath early on in my political career. I was national chairman of the Federation of Conservative Students in 1968 when the students were rioting, and Sir Edward Boyle encouraged me to go to see the then Leader of the Opposition at Albany. I did so increasingly; I went once a month. One of the people who opened the door to his flat, who subsequently became Foreign Secretary, was Douglas Hurd, now Lord Hurd. He was very encouraging to me.

Ted Heath came to the national conference of the Federation of Conservative Students on a day that was not necessarily his best. He was in one of his more taciturn moods. Those colleagues who remember Ted in one of those moods know that it was quite hard work sometimes to keep the conversation going. Some 20 people were introduced to Ted, and he grumbled and grunted and I tried to animate the conversation. As he left—everyone had disappeared—he broke into a broad smile, shifted his shoulders in his typical way and said, "Hmm, not bad. I agreed with some of the views that you gave to these people. I must make use of you more often."

That was one of the more difficult periods, but I should point out that although Ted was unfailingly encouraging, he was also a hard taskmaster. I was lucky enough to sit on the policy committee between 1970 and 1974, which was chaired by Chris, now Lord, Patten. Ted showed great concern about the way in which policy had to shift in reaction to some very difficult events, such as the problems with the unions and with Rolls-Royce. He did not take those decisions easily. Those of us who argued their case within that committee—I, for my part, was a very lowly person—were nevertheless part of those discussions, which provided a real insight into, and showed concern for, the state of the nation. Moreover, as others have said, Ted had a deep understanding of the problems of unemployment. To some extent, unemployment is no longer a focus of political debate, but in the period 1970 to 1974, Ted, remembering the 1930s, took very seriously and was pained by the problems that he had to face.

I entered the House in 1987, and Ted always encouraged me. I have possibly been known as a pro-European, and I remember making what for me was a passionately pro-European speech, much to the irritation of one or two of my colleagues. As I passed Ted sitting in the Chamber, he nodded to me, so I sat down in the seat next to him. He said, "Hmm. Not really pro-European enough." But when I later became chairman of the European Movement, he was unfailingly supportive and was ready to make speeches and to go anywhere. He wanted to ensure that there were those of us who carried the torch for his insight—an insight into the importance of Britain's playing its part, with other European nations, in providing a structure to resolve crises that, in his earlier years, could be resolved only by terrible conflict.

Ted was a great man and he did have that hinterland. In a sense, it was an irony that he was taken more seriously ill after attending the Salzburg music festival. It was his interest in music that drove him forward. Those of us lucky enough to have visited his homes in London and Salisbury remember how central music was to his whole persona, to his wit and to his amazing stories about the people whom he had met, particularly in China, which became a very important part of his life.

The Prime Minister mentioned something that illustrates Ted's political courage. Ted was an early member of the "One Nation" group, of which my late father-in-law, Lord Alport, was also a founder. What is sometimes forgotten is that Enoch Powell was a member of that group in the 1950s; indeed, he was its secretary. Many years later, in the 1960s, when Ted dismissed Enoch Powell from the Tory party, it was an old friend whom he was dismissing, which made that decision even more remarkably courageous.

Ted was a man of principle. He had views, based on decency and one-nation politics, that many of us in the Tory party still hold. He was a great statesman, a great Member of this House and a great individual. I shall miss him a lot.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I just want to offer a very brief postscript to the excellent tributes from the Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Skye and Lochaber (Mr. Kennedy) and the leader of the Tory party. I want to pay testimony to the work that Sir Edward did for constituents during my time in this House, and not just in the normal way. He also worked to ensure that on issues affecting south-east London, colleagues from across the parties did what they were meant to do, and that they did it together in order to be more effective. He ensured that we worked together courteously, effectively and efficiently, and in doing so he sometimes provided great hospitality. I remember, for example, being given a very luxurious breakfast at his flat as we discussed a complex constituency case.

In 1974—the year the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) came to Britain—I, along with some 11 other Britons, went, through a bursary, to the College of Europe, in Bruges. We arrived there as British students to find that Britain was hugely enhanced by what Edward Heath had done as Prime Minister. The status of Britain had been changed in the eyes of our European peers. That generation of students saw Britain differently.

When we were doing post-graduate European studies and Edward Heath was defeated for the leadership, it came as a shock to our colleagues. They were shocked that a European statesman could have been moved out of his position as leader of the Tory party. I want to pay tribute, above all, to the enhanced reputation that he gave Britain in Europe in the 1970s. He was truly a European statesman then; he has remained a European statesman; and I am sure that he will always be remembered as a European statesman.

4.30 pm

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I would like to associate my party, Plaid Cymru, and the Scottish National party with the many tributes paid to Sir Edward Heath in this place and earlier today. It is a daunting task, given that he entered this place before I was born—and by some stretch. In fact, his career would be remarkable if only for its longevity: he spent 51 years in this place as a Member and Prime Minister. That is almost unique and is exceeded by few: I can think of my predecessor Member but two for Caernarfon, David Lloyd George—and it is right to mention those two in the same breath.

Sir Edward Heath's career was remarkable, of course, for many things other than its length. His hinterland beyond politics was his great interest in sailing and music, but his career will stand in history because of his achievement in taking the United Kingdom into the European Economic Community and his other achievements arising from his personal commitment, his determination and his political skill. We on this Bench salute him.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I certainly wish to associate myself with all the generous tributes given by right hon. and hon. Members today. Speaking as someone who had the great privilege of working for Sir Edward for three years as head of his private office, I would point out that there is one aspect that has not been mentioned today or in the tributes in the national media.

There is much I could say about his courage, which I saw, at first hand, between 1980 and 1982 when I worked for him. For example, there was his courage in warning South Africa of the dangers of apartheid and also his courageous role in conveying to the British Government the basis on which the Chinese were prepared to settle the future of Hong Kong. I was there. After his comments on apartheid, we were bundled out of South Africa and I was there in the Great Hall of the People with Deng Xiaoping, when he revealed his plans to Sir Edward. Margaret Thatcher chose not to believe that the Chinese could use Sir Edward as a vehicle for communication and negotiations were stalled for some years as a result.

I was also with him at the time of the publication of "North-South: A Programme for Survival", better known as the Brandt report. I accompanied Sir Edward—or "EH" as his staff were privileged to call him—on many of his UK tours to raise awareness of the importance of tackling world poverty. In his later years, that became a cause that was every bit as important to him as membership of the European Union. His dedication to it, long before it was as fashionable as it is today, is something that should be remembered and honoured. Making poverty history was his objective long before the phrase was coined. This loyal member of his staff will miss him greatly.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): As a yachtsman, I am embarrassed to say that my membership of the Tory party owes as much to Sir Edward's yachting ability as anything else. The fact that a Leader of the Opposition could take a yacht half the way around the world and win the Sydney-Hobart race—one of the great ocean classics—won my admiration and that of a generation. Sponsored by Sir Max Aitken, it remains one of the great sporting feats to this day and it irritated the hell out of Harold Wilson! It did not end there. As Prime Minister and on Morning Cloud, he won the greatest trophy of them all, the Admiral's cup, captaining the English team into the bargain. He continued with yachting success for many years, which showed his talents to the full. He did it because it refreshed his mind. He once said, "You cannot raise a yacht and worry about something else at the same time".

Ted knew that he was good. On one occasion in Cowes, my wife sat next to him at dinner—it was her turn—and asked him how he managed to be an accomplished musician, Prime Minister and a winning yachtsman all at the same time. He paused briefly and said: "Pure brilliance". The flags in Cowes will be at half mast today.

Mr. Speaker: Before I put the Question, I would like to pay my own tribute to Sir Edward. As Father of the House, he was always very kind and supportive to me and to Mary, my wife. In recent years, he was a very welcome visitor to Speaker's House and I greatly appreciated his advice. I well remember his masterful and informative speeches on Europe, when I was a Back Bencher. I was always aware that I was in the presence of a man who had volunteered to serve his country when it faced the dangers of fascism. He will be missed by this House.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-five minutes to Five o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Algeria

1. Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): what recent assessment he has made of levels of political violence in Algeria. [12878]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): Political violence in Algeria has decreased significantly since the 1990s, and few incidents have been reported in major cities, including Algiers, within the past two to three years. However, incidents continue to occur in mainly rural areas. The United Kingdom Government are continuing to monitor the situation. We advise British citizens to consult our travel advice before going overseas, regardless of the country that they are planning to visit.

Ian Lucas: In the past three years, a company in my constituency, Conren Ltd, has taken extensive steps to trade in Algeria, where it has successfully promoted the sale of its flooring products. In its opinion, violence has decreased in recent years. Does the Minister think that Algeria is now a safe place for British industry to do business?

Mr. Alexander: I am delighted to hear about that successful business in my hon. Friend's constituency. A number of British businesses are now trading successfully in Algeria. The larger businesses include BP, GlaxoSmithKline and Unilever, and UK Trade and Investment reports that other British businesses are increasingly taking an interest. I encourage the business in question to take forward its initiatives in Algeria. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Middle East, who is not present today, recently visited Algiers, and perhaps it would be helpful if he were to contact my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham to confirm the importance of such commercial links, which we are determined to strengthen.

EU Enlargement (Balkans)

2. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): if he will make a statement on prospects for EU enlargement in the Balkans. [12879]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): The Thessaloniki summit in 2003 offered western Balkan countries the prospect of eventual membership of the EU, if they fulfilled certain political and economic conditions, including co-operation with the International Criminal Tribunal in The Hague. The June 2005 European Council reaffirmed that position. The future of the western Balkans lies in the European Union, which is the best guarantee of a peaceful and democratic future for the region, by contrast with its history of ethnic bloodshed and conflict.

Mike Gapes: Will my right hon. Friend confirm to the Croatian Government that no progress will be made on Croatia's application to join the European Union until Croatia makes progress on indicted war criminals in former Yugoslavia?

Mr. Straw: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his election by the Foreign Affairs Committee as its Chair for this Parliament. I look forward to an interrogation by the Foreign Affairs Committee that is equally intense as those that I have experienced in the past.

We all want to see negotiations with Croatia that lead to full membership of the European Union, beginning as soon as possible. As the European Council has clearly stated, however, that process must take place on the basis of full co-operation with the International Criminal Tribunal in The Hague. So far, sadly, such co-operation has not been adequate.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): I have been impressed by the Serbian Government's attempts to comply with the requirements to enter the European Union, but I am disappointed that there is no timetable for entry. Will the Secretary of State indicate when Serbia might be allowed to join the European Union?

Mr. Straw: The same point applies to Serbia and Montenegro, and to all the territories that were formerly part of the Republic of Yugoslavia. We see their future inside the European Union, but that must be on the basis of full co-operation with the tribunal in The Hague and on other matters. Serbia and Montenegro is at an earlier stage than Croatia. It is looking forward to agreeing a stabilisation and assistance arrangement with the EU, but that, too, depends on full co-operation and, in particular, on the delivery of Mladic and Karadzic.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Does the situation not also depend on the final status of Kosovo? Will the Foreign Secretary take this opportunity to explain Her Majesty's Government's view on the final status of Kosovo, which must be addressed before we can discuss the entry of Serbia and Montenegro into the EU?

Mr. Straw: Special Representative Kai Eide is conducting his inquiry and will produce a report later this year; I think that it is due in September. On the basis of that review of whether Kosovo has sufficiently met the standards required of it by the international community, we will all be able to make judgments about Kosovo's final status.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Irrespective of the other obstacles that face countries such as Croatia and Serbia and Montenegro, I was in Montenegro on the day the French referendum result came through, and there was a feeling that it would be an enormous setback for all the Balkan countries in acceding to the European Union. Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that he will work with his European Union counterparts to ensure that that, at least, will not be an obstacle to their accession?

Mr. Straw: I never thought that I would hear such sentiments expressed in this House. I know the hon. Gentleman very well; he has the next-door constituency to mine and fills up the local newspaper, as well as the House, with endless attacks on the European Union and all its works, particularly the constitutional treaty. Now we hear that he is in favour not only of the European Union but of the constitutional treaty. There is always time for sinners to repent, and in his case he has a lot more time.

It is interesting that there is particularly intense support for the European Union—and, I may say, for the constitutional treaty—in the countries that are desperate to come into it, because they have seen what an engine it has been for peace, stability, prosperity and democracy across the whole of eastern and southern Europe.

On the hon. Gentleman's specific point, we cannot allow the failure so far of the constitutional treaty to be a block on enlargement, nor is it a precondition for enlargement.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): My right hon. Friend's words, particularly in respect of Serbia, are very important. It is absolutely clear that Serbia's long-term destination is within the European Union. Will he make it clear to the population of Serbia that the people who betray the Serbs and, indeed, the Montenegrins, are not western European politicians, who do not have it in for that country, but those in Serbia who will protect Karadzic and Mladic and want to keep Serbia isolated for their own narrow and corrupt purposes?

Mr. Straw: I will indeed. When I was in Srebrenica last Monday for the most moving of ceremonies to commemorate the slaughter of 8,000 Bosnian Muslims within sight of where we were, at the battery factory, one of the most courageous and impressive acts was the visit by the President of Serbia and Montenegro almost as an act of atonement on behalf of his people. Sentiment is changing in Serbia and Montenegro, and we should give all those who are standing up for democracy and human rights in that country every support.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): What progress is being made during Britain's presidency of the EU with regard to getting the name of the Republic of Macedonia recognised, as opposed to the current anomaly of calling it the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia?

Mr. Straw: In our bilateral relations, the name that we recognise is the Republic of Macedonia. The difficulty in international forums is that because of a longstanding historical dispute between Macedonia and Greece the name that is recognised is that of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. Discussions are taking place between Macedonia and Greece, and once those are resolved, the name issue will be resolved. This is a further indication of the tortured past that haunts the present in the Balkans.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab) rose—

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacShane: My right hon. Friend's friendly support and encouragement for the Balkan states' road to Europe, plus his firmness on their meeting the conditions, is well known, respected and admired there and in the rest of the European Union. In that regard, will he write to the French Government in respect of a report in yesterday's edition of The Guardian stating that in 2001 the French authorities gave a French—that is, a European Union—passport to the indicted war criminal, Ante Gotovina, who is, after Mladic and Karadzic, the most notorious war criminal in the region? When he gets a reply from the French Government, will he, as well as writing to me, be so kind as to put a copy in the Library?

Mr. Straw: May I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend for all the work that he has done and will continue to do in helping to encourage Balkan countries into the European Union, as well as much else? I did not see the piece in The Guardian yesterday. I apologise to the editor for not reading his newspaper from cover to cover yesterday—[Interruption.] I am reminded that I was in Brussels.

It is my understanding that the indicted war criminal General Gotovina served in the French Foreign Legion and is a French citizen as well as a citizen of Croatia. However, I shall take up the matter with my counterpart in France and ensure that my right hon. Friend and the House are fully informed. The French Government have fully supported the efforts that are being made more widely in the European Union to ensure that consistent standards apply to all applicant countries from the western Balkans.

Turkish Visit

3. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): If he will ask the hon. Member for Colchester to accompany him when he next makes an official visit to Kurdish communities in Turkey. [12880]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): Neither my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary nor I have specific plans to visit the Kurdish communities in Turkey in the near future.

Bob Russell: I look forward to such an invitation. I hope that it will be forthcoming, because the Foreign Secretary well knows that, in the previous Parliament, the issue was dear to my heart and the former Minister for Europe suggested that, if I visited the area, I would perhaps be better informed. In the spirit of the right hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane), will his successor maintain the invitation, which was given by default?

Mr. Alexander: Of course I shall consider any invitation that is extended to me. However, I respectfully point out that information is not always the same as wisdom.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): I am sure that the Minister knows that the person killed in the Turkish bombing came from my constituency. I am most grateful to the Foreign Office for all its support for Helen Bennett's family in the past few days. I want to express the sincerest sympathy and sadness that we all feel at a such tragic loss of life. It is especially devastating for one family to suffer a death and five injuries. I appreciate that we do not know who perpetrated the atrocity, but will the Minister undertake to keep hon. Members and the family informed when progress is made?

Mr. Alexander: On behalf of the Government [illegible] I am sure, the House, I extend my sympathy to the affected family in my hon. Friend's constituency. I pay tribute to the sterling efforts of our ambassador, Peter Westmacott, and his staff for their response to the terrible incident. As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said on Saturday, the explosion was a repugnant attack which targeted innocent tourists. We stand shoulder to shoulder with the people of Turkey in sympathy and in refusing to allow terrorists to destroy our values and liberty. On that basis, I am happy to give an undertaking that we will keep the House informed of the progress of what we hope will be an expeditious investigation.

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Will the Minister and his colleagues use the EU presidency to press Turkey to recognise the Government of Cyprus before opening accession negotiations with Turkey? In the light of the approaching anniversary of the invasion of Cyprus, will the Minister outline the Government's plans to drive forward new talks and negotiations between the two sides, with a view to establishing a lasting, functional and peaceful solution to reunite Cyprus?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is a new Member, but she must confine her supplementary question to the subject of the question before us. I cannot invite the Minister to answer her supplementary question. However, she should not worry—senior Members do the same thing.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): When my right hon. Friend visits Turkey with the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell)—a visit that I fully support, as I am sure, do the constituents of Colchester—he will obviously discuss enlargement of the Union with the Kurdish communities, as well as with the hon. Member for Colchester. He doubtless noted the article in yesterday's newspapers and the comments of Karl-Heinz Grasser, the Austrian Finance Minister, who asked for the negotiations to be shelved. Will my right hon. Friend confirm the Government's commitment to enlargement as regards Turkey? As part of those discussions, will he ensure that the wishes of the Kurdish communities—and, of course, those of the hon. Member for Colchester—are taken into account?

Mr. Alexander: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his question. Even during the past couple of days, which I have spent in Brussels, I have been pressing our case, notwithstanding the fact that agreement could not be reached on the future financial perspective at the European Council last month, and I am glad to announce that the Council reiterated the position of the previous Council in December, in regard to the intention to open accession talks with Turkey on 3 October, during the British presidency. Of course, significant progress has still to be made by the Turks in relation to the Copenhagen protocols, but many would agree that the Kurds and other minority groups in Turkey have a great deal to gain from the process of reform and democratisation that has being taken forward apace by the Turkish authorities to date. Of course this will be a long process—we are talking about at least a decade—but now would be precisely the wrong time to send a signal that there are arbitrary barriers facing any individual country. There are, of course, objective criteria, but we want to ensure that we do not close the door to further enlargement of the European Union.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): May I encourage the Minister to take my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) to the Kurdish areas of Turkey—[Laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman has said that he has no intention of going there in the near future, but may I urge him and others on the Treasury Bench to do so when they have an opportunity, as I am sure that they will in relation to Turkey's application to join the European Union? I urge them in particular to consider the human rights of the Kurds, because there is concern that human rights abuses are continuing. While he is there, the Minister might also have an opportunity to consider the situation of the Kurdish communities in Syria and Iran, where there are also large numbers of human rights abuses.

Mr. Alexander: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his observations. I note that he did not request that I bring his colleague back when I return from that visit. The House will draw its own conclusions from his helpful comment. On the serious substance of the hon.

Gentleman's question, it is fair to recognise the scale of work that has already been done in Turkey. It has made enormous progress over the past two years, through the adoption of a series of constitutional and legislative reforms such as the abolition of the death penalty, new protections against torture, greater freedoms of expression, greater cultural rights for Kurds and others, and a reduction in the military's role in the Government. As I sought to reflect in my earlier response, we recognise that there is significant progress yet to be made, but the House should none the less be heartened by the pace and scale of the progress already achieved.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): When the Minister does visit Turkey, I would urge him to visit the Kurdish areas in the south and east of the country and to have discussions with the Kurdish people there. While progress has been made on the recognition of linguistic rights, for example, I fear that many of those rights are simply not working on the ground, and meetings and discussions with those groups would be of great benefit to him. Will he also consider the use of the military by the Turkish Government in south-east Turkey, where it has been used to oppress many Kurdish groups? Will he also remind the Turkish Government that the banning of organisations is not necessarily the best way of ensuring that they have free political representation? It is much better to promote an inclusive society in which all communities feel able to be, and are, represented at national level.

Mr. Alexander: On my hon. Friend's point about visits to the south and south-east of Turkey, I can assure him that Peter Westmacott, the British ambassador, and a number of his colleagues representing Britain in Turkey, visit that part of the country on a regular basis. We receive full reports on their view of the situation on the ground. I would note, however, the progress that has been made, not just in terms of the legislative changes that I have mentioned. Broadcasting in non-Turkish languages, including Kurdish, started on national television and radio in June 2004, and I understand that Kurdish music cassettes, CDs and newspapers are now far more freely available, and that Kurdish plays and concerts are taking place.

I would not diminish the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn), however. Of course we want to ensure that those rights are being given practical expression on the ground, and I can assure him that the issue of human rights in Turkey will be at the forefront of many European Union member states' minds over the coming years. I am sure that that will provide an opportunity to scrutinise exactly what is happening in the Kurdish areas and in other parts of Turkey.

Darfur

4. Anne Milton (Guildford) (Con): If he will make a statement on the political situation in Darfur. [12881]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): There can be no military solution to the situation in Darfur. Only a political agreement can deliver long-term peace and security. We welcome the signature by the parties to the conflict of a declaration of principles as a basis for a lasting settlement, and congratulate the African Union on that achievement. We urge all parties to negotiate in good faith at the next round of talks in Abuja, due to resume on 24 August.

Anne Milton: With 180,000 dead in Darfur, 2 million people displaced and reliant only on humanitarian aid in camps, killing and rapes continuing in those camps, and warnings that hundreds of thousands more might die of starvation and disease, will the Minister assure us that real action will follow his words? The Government talk of passing strong messages to the Sudanese Government, but to many those words have a hollow ring. The public, and many agencies such as Amnesty, need some reassurance.

Ian Pearson: The hon. Lady is right to point to the situation in Darfur. It is much calmer than it was a few months ago, but there are serious humanitarian issues, with approximately 3 million people in need of assistance. I would like her to recognise, however, the work of the Department for International Development in terms of providing humanitarian assistance, and the work of other member states in Europe and internationally. The work of the African Union in brokering discussions between the parties, which we hope will lead to a successful and peaceful Darfur in the future, should also be recognised. Those are real actions undertaken by the African Union, and they deserve the support of the House.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend will know that the peace talks at Abuja are within the framework of the comprehensive peace agreement, and we wish all the parties well. Does he agree, however, that there is a real need for capacity to be given, particularly on the side of the rebels, the Sudan Liberation Army and the Justice and Equality Movement, as the British Government did an awful lot of good work latterly at Naivasha in relation to the north-south peace talks? Will he assure me that that is already going on, and will continue in the future?

Ian Pearson: My hon. Friend is right to point to the capacity issue. As far as the comprehensive peace agreement is concerned, we very much welcome the signature on 9 July this year of the Government of national unity, and the formation of the new presidency. There is a lot of work to be done in terms of the commissions that are to be established. We have already assisted in providing capacity to enable that to take place, and we will continue to do so in Khartoum in relation to the CPA, and where appropriate in Darfur.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that the Sudanese Government in Khartoum orchestrated, funded, practised and then defended the genocide of ethnic Darfurians, what assessment has the Minister made of the prospects for the safety of people fleeing Darfur if they are forced to settle in Khartoum?

Ian Pearson: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the situation in Darfur is more stable than it has been previously. There are still some 3 million displaced people, however. The situation is fragile, and far too many incidents of attacks on civilians and deaths due to those attacks still take place. It is important that we strengthen the AU mission, as there is clear evidence that where it has been deployed, it has been effective in calming the situation. It will increase from 2,900 to 7,700 in the coming months. We will keep that figure under review, but we believe that it will make a real difference, as does the AU.

CAP Reform

5. Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): What discussions he had on EU common agricultural policy reform during the G8 summit. [12882]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): I chaired the summit in place of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister while he returned to London following the terrorist atrocities of 7 July. At the summit, the CAP as such was not discussed. However, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister called for reform in all G8 countries, and pressed colleagues to agree on a date by which to end export subsidies.

Mr. Bailey: Does the Foreign Secretary not agree that the benefits of the deals made at the G8 conference on aid to Africa and development would be lost if the EU CAP export subsidies continued to undermine the economies of those self-same African countries? Will he pledge—notwithstanding the demonstrations that have taken place in Brussels over the last couple of days—to press for an end to the CAP regime and export subsidies to developing countries?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend is right about the damaging effects of those export subsidies, which, in the case of wheat, powdered milk and sugar respectively, are estimated to lead to prices approximately 34 per cent., 50 per cent. and 24 per cent. below EU costs of production. They have a destabilising effect on natural producers outside the European Union. We are pledged to seek 2010 as the end date for the subsidies. Whether we succeed will depend on whether we secure the full support of our EU colleagues, and then on whether success is achieved at the World Trade Organisation round in Hong Kong in December.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that it is simply self-indulgent of European Union leaders to go to the G8 summit and sign up to the aspiration to make poverty history, while at the same time defending the present structure of the common agricultural policy? Will the Government focus their advocacy of CAP reform on structural reform of the policy to open European markets to agricultural products from elsewhere in the world? Do the Government accept that the implication of that is reduced EU expenditure, which should lead to a reduction in the overall level of the EU budget?

Mr. Straw: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman's last point. Fundamental reform of the CAP must constitute a straightforward reduction in total financial support for it. However, I do not consider EU member states with a different view to be capricious. Their view is connected with their politics, and the strength of their agricultural lobbies and their electorates. What we must do inside the EU is secure an agreement that is ultimately acceptable to all.

To those who think that the answer is to renationalise agricultural support, I say that that is not the answer, because it could lead to a degree of national competition that would in turn result in increased subsidies for European farming.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I am sure my right hon. Friend agrees that "reform" can mean as much or as little as we want it to mean, whereas "abolition" is very clear. Will he include abolition as at least one option for debate during the EU presidency, and examine its full implications?

Mr. Straw: I have thought about that, because I am an open-minded sort of guy. I have thought about it a lot, because at first blush the criticisms of the CAP are so intense that it would seem to follow naturally that its abolition was the answer. I am afraid, however, that we cannot escape the fact that if we abolish the CAP—including any common policy preventing national state aid from going to the agriculture industry—we could end up worse off, with a bidding up of agricultural subsidies in each of the existing EU member states. We need the continuation of a common regime which will bring down the totality of agriculture spending, while shifting the balance of that spending away from direct support for production to rural development—which is what we have tried to do in this country.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): When the Minister for Europe gave me the Government's priorities for the UK presidency on 6 June, CAP reform was not even mentioned. Two weeks later the Prime Minister was describing the CAP as irrational, and on 23 June he told the European Parliament that a new budget could not be agreed unless it set out

"a process that leads to a more rational Budget."

We strongly welcome the Government's new commitment to negotiating a radical reform of the treaties, but does the Foreign Secretary agree that the time has come for the Government to spell out the detail of the reform that they are seeking? To that end, will he now agree to our request for a Green Paper setting out the Government's proposals?

Mr. Straw: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman was paying attention to what my right hon. Friend the Minister for Europe said—[Interruption.] That is very clear, because reform of the common agricultural policy is in the White Paper and is also embraced by the policy priority of future financing. One cannot reform the future financing of the European Union without reforming the CAP, which is 40 per cent. of the total spent. As to how that reform is to be achieved, we do not need a Green Paper or a White Paper to spell out the key elements—a reduction in the total amount of spend and a shift in the balance of that spend. What we need is to secure the agreement of our EU colleagues, which is what we are now seeking to do.

Mr. Brady: The Foreign Secretary has obviously not read the written answer of 6 June, which did not mention CAP reform at all. He is also being a little vague in his answer. Perhaps it is his inability to give a straight answer on CAP reform that led the French Foreign Minister to tell the International Herald Tribune today that the idea of reforming the EU budget before 2014 is "not serious". Will the Foreign Secretary now prove how serious he is about CAP reform by publishing detailed proposals to reform it? Specifically, if it is irrational for 40 per cent. of the EU budget to be spent on agricultural subsidy, what percentage would be acceptable? Given that Ministers now say that they do not expect any change overnight, will he also set out the timetable? There is a rare agreement across the House that we have a real opportunity to reform the EU for the better. If the Foreign Secretary refuses to answer those simple questions, the British people will be forced to conclude that the Government are wasting that golden opportunity.

Mr. Straw: I think it would be a good idea for Front-Bench Opposition spokesmen to listen to the answers before they deliver the supplementaries that they write outside the House. I say again that we have been very clear about what we are seeking and about the timetable. We are seeking a mid-term review of the forthcoming financial perspective between 2007 and 2013. What we propose can be seen in the conclusions to the last European Council in June—that it should be set some time during 2008–09. So far as the—

Mr. Brady: What percentage?

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman is muttering at me.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is something that the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) should not do. I gave him some licence when he spoke for too long in his second supplementary and I am not going to allow him to interrupt the Secretary of State again.

Mr. Straw: So far as the detail is concerned, what we have to do now is not publish a Green Paper—our trajectory is now very clear—but gain the agreement of our EU colleagues.

Mr. Speaker: Sir Menzies Campbell? Chris Bryant, then.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): A sad replacement, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.] I have clearly united the House.

As one who was born three days before the common agricultural policy came into existence, may I say to the Foreign Secretary that one does not have to be an old Eurosceptic like my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) to believe that the CAP is in urgent need of reform? I hear what the Foreign Secretary said about being opposed to the repatriation of the CAP, as it might lead to an increase in agricultural subsidy, which would be unfortunate. However, if a co-financing system were on the table, which meant that more money would be paid by the French Government for French subsidies and that subsidies across the whole of Europe were reduced in quantity, would the Government be able to support it?

Mr. Straw: We learn something every day and I believe that my hon. Friend was born on 11 January 1962, as the CAP came into force on 14 January 1962—so there we are. On his particular point, I agree with my hon. Friend that co-financing within a common regime may provide a way forward.

Regime Change

6. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): What his policy is on regime change in respect of Governments whose policies he considers unacceptable. [12883]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): We have no policy as such on regime change—except in the Conservative party. Without context, regime change is an abstraction. Our focus is on ensuring that all other states live up to their international obligations. Where they fail to do so we seek to change their behaviour. We actively encourage and support the development of democracy across the world, as that is the best way by far to secure change in regimes by peaceful means.

Richard Ottaway: I think that the House will take that answer with a pinch of salt. Will the Foreign Secretary accept that there is inconsistency in a policy that takes us to war against a country that has no weapons of mass destruction, yet chooses to ignore countries such as North Korea, which is developing nuclear weapons programmes, or, even worse, Burma, which is using chemical weapons against neighbouring countries? I anticipate that in his reply the Foreign Secretary will fall back on the United Nations, in which case will he explain why there is no UN resolution condemning either country?

Mr. Straw: I am indeed going to rely on the UN charter, as it is one of the fundamental foundations of international law. It is not a question of falling back on it; it happens to be the whole of the explanation. In the case of Iraq, there were 12 years of mandatory chapter VII resolutions that authorised the use of force—all necessary means—in 687, 678 and subsequently 1441. In the case of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and Burma there are no such resolutions. Why? Because of the difficulty of securing international consensus.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend agrees that the policies of the Government of Burma are unacceptable, and I for one would like that regime changed. In the context of his response just now, what progress has been made in discussions with other Association of South East Asian Nations members? Their role is mission-critical in developing the kind of international support necessary for the changes we want to see embraced in Burma.

Mr. Straw: Almost all the other ASEAN countries disapprove of the Burmese regime, but take a different view from the UK and the European Union about the way forward. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Europe met the ASEAN countries last year when he had responsibility for that part of the world and, as he has just reminded me, was unable to gain their support for a new Security Council resolution. We continue to say to our ASEAN friends that we do not believe that their approach of constructive engagement with and qualified support for Burma has shown any sign whatever of producing a positive change in that regime.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): I apologise for my false start earlier, Mr. Speaker.

The Foreign Secretary will be aware that paragraph 36 of the Attorney-General's opinion of 7 March 2003, which was published during the general election, stated that no doubt in recognition of article 2, paragraph 4, of the United Nations charter to which the Foreign Secretary has just referred. Perhaps today the right hon. Gentleman could take the House into his confidence. Was there ever any doubt that once military action was commenced against Iraq it would be pursued to the point of the removal of Saddam Hussein? Indeed, was there ever any doubt that regime change was the objective of that military action?

"regime change cannot be the objective of military action"—

Mr. Straw: It is a matter of record that we gave Saddam an ultimatum in the second week of March 2003, which was for him to leave the country and so not face the prospect of military action. He failed to meet it. I accept that the matter has been the subject of controversy and will remain so, but the position of the British, American and many other Governments around the world is that under the UN charter, in principle, if there is an appropriate chapter VII resolution, regime change can be a legitimate consequence of military action so authorised. In the case of Iraq it was our judgment, and the Attorney-General's advice, that such military action was indeed justified.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to praise the memory of the three soldiers from the Staffordshire Regiment who were killed carrying out their duty on behalf of the country? The regiment has a distinguished tradition.

Will my right hon. Friend also take this opportunity to express our horror at the manner in which, among all the killing and carnage that took place in Iraq last week, children, some as young as six, were butchered by terrorists? Is it not the case that anyone in the House who justifies in any way such killing and terrorism is not fit to be a Member of this place? They should be held in the same contempt as those who try to justify what happened in London on 7 July.

Mr. Straw: Like my hon. Friend, I pay tribute to the Staffordshire Regiment and to those three very brave soldiers from that regiment who gave their lives for the cause of peace and security in Iraq; there is no higher service than that which they have given.

On the wider issue that my hon. Friend raises, I agree with him, and I would just like to say that the victims of this terrorism in Iraq have all been Muslim, which I think makes a very important point when we consider whether there is any justification for such outrages and inhumane actions.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): On the subject of regime change, has the latest publication by Chatham House, explaining the link between terrorism and the mishandling of the problems of Iraq and Palestine, been drawn to the attention of the Government of the United States and carefully studied by the Foreign Secretary?

Mr. Straw: I cannot speak for the United States Government. The report has certainly been carefully studied by me, and it makes interesting contributions to the debate, although the hon. Gentleman will see that, at the bottom of page 2, for example, it is much more qualified than many newspapers have suggested. There the authors of the report say that yes, in their judgment,

"military campaigns to topple the Taleban regime in Afghanistan and in Iraq, and"

the fact that the UK

"has taken a leading role in international intelligence, police and judicial cooperation against Al-Qaeda and in efforts to suppress its finances" have made us more of a target. All I say to the hon. Gentleman, through you, Mr. Speaker, is that it is inconceivable that we, as a member of the international community, even if we had not engaged in the military action in Iraq, would not have engaged in the action in Afghanistan or stood up against al-Qaeda; and the report says that if we take all those things together it makes us a target. Yes it did; and we were a target in any event, and we would have been notwithstanding Iraq. I say to the hon. Gentleman and other Members who are sceptical about this, with respect, that they need to remember that the al-Qaeda attack against the United States took place out of the blue, unprovoked, on 11 September 2001, 18 months before military action against Iraq, not six months afterwards.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I join the Foreign Secretary and the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) in paying tribute to the three soldiers who so tragically lost their lives in Iraq. The Government, who were swift to intervene to change the regime in Iraq, have not sought to intervene to change the regime in Zimbabwe, yet Zimbabwe is failing to live up to its international obligations. What action would he consider to be necessary and proportionate to deal with the regime in Zimbabwe?

Mr. Straw: I think it is the first time that the hon. Lady has questioned me, and I welcome her to the Front Bench in that new capacity. I share the frustration that she and everybody else feels about the situation in Zimbabwe, but the truth is that up to now, it has not been possible for us to gain an international consensus inside the United Nations Security Council against Zimbabwe, much though we believe that there should be one and that the situation there is damaging the whole region.

I also say to the hon. Lady that it is easy to feel frustrated but it is dangerous for her to imply that the answer is some kind of military intervention. I know of no military plan that could possibly work in respect of Zimbabwe. Moreover, this was emphatically ruled out by the former Conservative shadow Foreign Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), when he wrote to me back in October 2002, saying that he had not called for military action in Zimbabwe. [Interruption.] The hon. Lady is indicating that she is not. I am glad she is not, but in its absence, we have to work with the tools that we have.

We managed to secure Zimbabwe's suspension from the Commonwealth. We have had increasingly effective and tough sanctions established inside the European Union. Meanwhile we await the report of Anna Tibaijuka, the Secretary-General's special representative, who has just returned from Zimbabwe, and will certainly concert with all our international colleagues to see whether further effective diplomatic and other action can be taken in respect of Zimbabwe.

Military Technology Transfer

7. Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): What role his Department plays in making representations to the US Administration on issues relating to military technology transfer to the UK. [12884]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): The Foreign and Commonwealth Office works closely with the Ministry of Defence to improve the transfer of military technology between the United States and the United Kingdom. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary raised the issue with the US Administration most recently in May of this year. Those in our embassy in Washington have frequent contact on the issue with their colleagues at all levels of the US Administration and Congress.

Mr. Jack: Although I acknowledge the Foreign Secretary and Prime Minister's efforts particularly to free up the technology of the joint strike fighter project for availability in the United Kingdom, so far we are only trusted with 10 per cent. of that technology. If Britain is to take the industrial and military opportunities presented by the joint strike fighter project, what further steps will the Minister put to the US Administration and members on the Hill to encourage them to trust their ally and give us opportunities to participate fully in that programme? What advice can he give to hon. Members about the role that we can play to convince our opposite numbers on the Hill that this is a matter for trust, not secrecy?

Mr. Alexander: The right hon. Gentleman raises a very important point, and I am grateful to him for giving me the opportunity to reply, not least because I understand that he shares a strong constituency interest in the matter with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary—so for that reason alone, I can assure him that the issue is uppermost in our thoughts. The right hon. Gentleman raises the important point, however, that this is not simply a matter of bilateral relations between the UK Government and the US Administration.

One of the challenges that we face is with the role of committees in the House of Representatives and, indeed, the US Senate. In that regard, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that we continue to work on that effort. We have not made as much progress on technology transfer as many of us would have wished, particularly in relation to the joint strike fighter; but I can none the less assure him that we will continue to use our contacts—not just those with our embassy, but at ministerial level—to make those points.

The right hon. Gentleman's final point was about the role that hon. Members can play. I understand that he has travelled to the US on this matter, and I applaud him for his efforts on behalf of his constituents and in the interests of British industry more generally. If colleagues on both sides of the House are travelling to the US and, in particular, to Washington, I would certainly welcome the opportunity to furnish them with information, to equip them to take forward this discussion with colleagues from the Senate and, indeed, the House of Representatives.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): It seems quite clear that the US and UK military strategy is framed entirely by a high-tech weapons-based approach, which has seen annual global military budgets soar to $1 trillion a year. Would it not make much more sense for some of those huge resources to be deployed on things like peace building, disarmament, climate change mitigation, clean energy technology and on measures to tackle resource depletion and environmental degradation, which are the root of so much national and regional instability? Why take the high-tech weapons approach all the time?

Mr. Alexander: Of course, it is a matter of record that, as recently as the G8 summit at Gleneagles, important discussions were held between ourselves, the United States and other G8 partners on some of the issues that my hon. Friend has addressed, but I would respectfully point out that the procurement of military capacity and military technology can contribute to effective joint working on peace building and the range of work that we want to take forward with allies such as the United States.

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): May I thank the Minister on behalf of the small delegation that will visit Washington next week to make representations on the joint strike fighter? Does he agree that BAE Systems has a great deal to offer not only in vertical take-off and landing technology, but in the Typhoon's construction techniques, and that it is crucial that the Royal Air Force and British industrial interests should have access to full information about the joint strike fighter if the RAF is to operate that aircraft?

Mr. Alexander: I am certainly happy to concur with the point made by the hon. Gentleman. Indeed, I reiterate the offer that I made: if we can facilitate further information being provided to him during the coming days—no doubt, in addition to the information provided by the British company involved—we in the Foreign Office will certainly be happy to do so.

Arms Sales (China)

8. Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): If he will make a statement on EU arms sales to China. [12885]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): We are continuing discussions with EU partners on the modernisation of strategic export controls, including the review of the arms embargo on China. There will need to be more consultation in the EU and with other international partners before any decision on the arms embargo is taken. In those discussions, we recall the European Council conclusions in December 2004 that any decision on the arms embargo would not result in an increase of arms exports to China in either quantitative or qualitative terms.

Mr. Hunt: I am grateful to the Minister for his answer. While I appreciate the diplomatic and commercial significance of the decision on the arms embargo, I am sure he will agree that the decision also has tremendous military significance for the people of Taiwan. Does he agree that our policy towards Taiwan must be consistent with our policy towards Afghanistan and Iraq, where we have always recognised the fundamental importance of allowing and promoting people's right to determine their own destiny?

Mr. Alexander: Despite having no diplomatic ties with Taiwan, we enjoy good relations with it in areas such as trade, investment, culture and, indeed, education. However, sometimes a fallacy creeps into the discussion about the review of the arms embargo. I point out that the embargo that is in place at present does not cover areas such as avionics, radar and satellite and communications systems, so although it is important to be respectful of the points of view of all parties, which will be covered by the review, we should be absolutely clear about the effect of the review that is under way.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Have any representations been made to Beijing about the reported remarks of General Zhu, who envisaged a nuclear strike against the United States if conflict began over Taiwan?

Mr. Alexander: I am not aware of the comments to which my hon. Friend refers. Of course concern has been expressed about the anti-secession law that was recently passed. Although we in the United Kingdom wish to support China when it states that it wants to resolve the Taiwan issue using peaceful means, as is recorded in the law, we remain concerned about the reference to the possibility of "non-peaceful means".

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I fully support the maintenance of the embargo on EU arms sales to China, but I do so in particular because, as the Government will be aware, China is taking an increasing interest in Africa and is involved in the sale of arms to Zimbabwe. Are the Government concerned about that? Does it weigh heavily with them in respect of their consideration of lifting the arms embargo? Are they in favour of China actually selling arms and weapons to Mr. Robert Mugabe so that he can subdue the poor people of his country?

Mr. Alexander: The Foreign Secretary has already made clear the extent to which we deplore the actions of Robert Mugabe's Government in Zimbabwe, even during the course of these questions. The general point that the hon. Gentleman raises is important, which is why we have been advancing the argument for an arms trade treaty. It is fair to say that support for such an idea is limited to a fairly small number of countries, but I assure the House that we will try to expand the group greatly to get a consensus for negotiation in the United Nations on such a treaty.

EU Presidency (Environment and Sustainable Development)

9. Helen Southworth (Warrington, South) (Lab): What discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on the priority given to environment and sustainable development during the UK's Presidency of the EU. [12886]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): Our two Departments worked closely together on the EU presidency White Paper, which sets out the priorities for our presidency. These include climate change, the review of the EU sustainable development strategy and the new EU chemicals strategy.

Helen Southworth: Is my right hon. Friend aware that environmentally conscious chemicals manufacturers in Warrington are worried that the excessive regulation proposed in EU chemicals directives could destroy competitiveness and drive chemical manufacturing out of the UK and into unregulated states, which would have a considerable cost for jobs in the UK and the global environment? Will he take action?

Mr. Alexander: I assure my hon. Friend that we have taken a close interest in the matter, not least because the type of chemical industries that she describes exist not only in Warrington, but in Paisley and Renfrewshire, South, which I have the privilege of representing. Ciba Speciality Chemicals, which is in my constituency, has on several occasions raised with me its concerns about the proposed REACH—registration, evaluation and authorisation of chemicals—directive, which is why I welcome the steps taken by the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. We make it clear that although we are keen to make progress on REACH, we must balance the environmental needs that we all uphold with the need to secure the competitiveness of EU countries.

UK/US Relations

10. Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): What steps he is taking to improve bilateral relations between the UK and the US. [12887]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): Our bilateral relations with the United States are excellent. The United States is crucial to the achievement of the United Kingdom's own international strategic priorities. In that connection I should like to extend a warm welcome to the new

United States ambassador to the Court of St. James, the hon. Robert H. Tuttle, who arrived in London at the weekend.

Paul Flynn: In the interests of improving the harmony of those bilateral relations, does the Minister agree with the statement by his counterpart, Condoleezza Rice, that Britain's involvement in the Iraq war increased—I repeat, increased—the threat of terrorist action here?

Mr. Straw: I am afraid I am unaware that Condoleezza Rice has made any such statement, but I am happy to catch up with my hon. Friend, and if she did, I will write him a commentary on that.

May I take this opportunity to put on record something else about my hon. Friend—my appreciation for the first occasion during my whole time as a Minister on which he has expressed unequivocal thanks for something I have done: I arranged for EU Foreign Ministers to hold an informal meeting in his constituency, and he wrote back saying, "Thank you"—full stop. I say to him, "Thank you—full stop."

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that the former British ambassador to the United Nations, Sir Jeremy Greenstock, has been circulating a draft of a book called, "The Cost of War"? Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that it is unfortunate, and perhaps embarrassing for him, that Sir Jeremy calls the Americans' decision to go to war politically illegitimate? When Sir Jeremy was our ambassador at the United Nations, did he ever express such views to the Foreign Secretary or the Prime Minister?

Mr. Straw: This is a matter of speculation, but there is an issue—and I am glad the hon. Gentleman has raised it—for all Members and for all parties, particularly those which aspire to enter government. There is a long-standing tradition in this country, going back to the middle of the 19th century, by which we have a permanent and impartial civil service, and part of that necessary arrangement is a very high level of trust and confidence between Ministers and officials. For that reason, there are clear rules laid down in the civil service and in the diplomatic service, and we all look forward to those being adhered to in both their spirit and their letter.

BILL PRESENTED

FOOD SUPPLEMENTS (EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES ACT 1972 DISAPPLICATION)

Mr. William Cash, supported by Mr. Austin Mitchell, Nick Harvey, Mr. Christopher Chope, Mr. Richard Shepherd, Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory, Mr. Owen Paterson, Mr. Bernard Jenkin, Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson, Mr. Edward Leigh, Michael Gove and Philip Davies presented a Bill to provide that a specified Community instrument relating to food supplements shall not have effect in the United Kingdom notwithstanding the provisions of the European Communities Act 1972; to revoke secondary legislation giving effect in the United Kingdom to that instrument; to amend the Food Safety Act 1990 in relation to food supplements; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First Time; and ordered to be read a Second Time on Friday 14 October, and to be printed. [Bill 46].

Local Government and Planning (Parkland and Windfall Development)

3.34 pm

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a That leave be given to bring in a Bill to impose conditions on the sale of parkland by local authorities; to make provision about the circumstances in which a planning application may be rejected by a local authority and about rights of appeal in such circumstances; to prohibit repeated planning applications in certain circumstances; and for connected purposes.

This Bill is intended to give communities a greater say in building developments and in keeping the green heritage that shapes the character of their lives. My constituency of Solihull, like many leafy suburbs, is characterised by green open space, parks and many lovely old properties. But that character is being eroded by threats to that green open space and the constant destruction of those houses and the erection of blocks of luxury flats in their stead. The flats or, to use developer speak, "apartments", stick out from the rest of the housing nearby like sore thumbs. Residents hate such development, and more than half of my postbag relates to residents calling for action to stop windfall developments of that kind.

If councillors want to stop the developments, they are constrained by central Government planning guidance and policy, which permits developers to appeal against council decisions and to make councils pay all the costs if the council loses. So councils may be reluctant to object to planning applications, but if the council will not bite the bullet and refuse a planning application, local people have nowhere else to turn. They cannot object in their own right because there is no third-party right of appeal. If the developer does not appeal, he can make fresh applications again and again, wearing down a community, blighting residents' lives for years and years until they either move away or lose the will to carry on fighting.

We understand that current planning law was designed to achieve higher intensity development that reduces the necessity for building on open space and green belt. We applaud that, but by designating people's gardens as brownfield land, planning guidelines have had the unintended consequence of enabling developers to target windfall developments in preference to true brownfield sites. Developers, like any other business people, are in business to make a profit. If they can develop a soft target, instead of tackling polluted and more difficult inner-city true brownfield sites, they will do so. It is like putting a goat in a garden and telling it to eat thistles and not the flowers: unless it is restrained, it will go for the prize begonias every time. But when a developer seeks to build in someone's garden, there are often things more substantial than begonias in the way—in other words, trees.

Often, the first thing a developer will do before an application is submitted is to fell any trees so that their presence cannot be used as a justification for refusing planning permission. And unless those trees are fortunate enough to be sited in a conservation area, or have tree preservation orders on them, there is not a thing that anyone can do about it. That is our first problem.

[Lorely Burt]

The second problem occurs if a council decides to sell off green open space, parkland or some other green amenity as defined in PPG17. In Solihull, despite large petitions objecting, the council has determined that it will sell off more than six hectares of open space to fund the redevelopment of the local leisure centre. Despite the fact that the local community is up in arms, the council is ploughing ahead with destroying our green heritage. When that parkland is gone, it will be gone for ever.

What happens when the council has another project it needs to fund? What other bit of parkland will it sell off then? Soon Solihull, whose motto is "Urbs in rure" or "town in the country", will have to change its motto to simply "Urbs", or even "Urbs 'r' us", because there will be no "rure" left to talk about.

People care passionately about their local environment, but they have no say in the decisions taken in their name other than to vote out those who have made the decisions at election time. By then, it can be too late.

Sometimes the sale of green space affects too small an electorate to enable those people to vote out the perpetrators. There has to be a way of addressing the balance and of giving local people a say in what the character of their local area should be. So that is the problem, and I shall outline how I propose that the provisions in the Bill would tackle it.

First, there is the issue of public green space. Councils have a duty to consult local people before green space is sold off, but where the council is determined to impose a course of action, consultation can be a sham. I therefore propose that local communities should be given management control of council green space, effectively making it true common land. That would mean that they would have to agree to any change of use or sale. This is already the case in rural areas where there are still commons, and the locals vote on any development proposals. If we extended that principle to public green space, local people in urban areas would then have the responsibilities as well as rights over their green environment.

I believe that windfall developments are a largely unintended consequence of PPG3. I propose amending PPG3 to redesignate garden land as greenfield land. Under the sequential test of PPG3, true brownfield land would then have to be developed before garden land could be considered. An exception for extensions into back gardens of existing properties would need to be made. If a development involved the building of more than one property, the rules of PPG3 could apply. I further propose a third-party right of appeal so that where councils were unwilling to refuse an application that contravenes the local plan, local people themselves could appeal to the Secretary of State.

Next is the blighting of communities by continuing re-applications for planning permission. The Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004 will abolish twin-tracking of applications when it is introduced. That will give some relief. However, there is nothing to stop a developer continuing to reapply for different developments on the same site. I propose that after three applications have been turned down within three years, local residents should be given a rest and that no further applications would be eligible for consideration within a further three years. That would enable an almost acceptable application to be modified and re-submitted while protecting local residents from the constant pressure of continuous new applications—a sort of "three strikes and you're out" formula.

The only trees that are currently protected from destruction are those that are subject to preservation orders, or trees that are in conservation areas. I propose that our leafy suburbs and urban areas should be protected by extending to all urban areas the rules regarding felling and works to trees over a certain size or age. That would put the onus on developers and on everyone else who wants to destroy trees over a certain size or age to notify the local authority. Trees are not only beautiful and worth preserving in their own right; they are the green lung of our communities. We cannot have leafy suburbia without leaves.

Central control of planning is needed in some circumstances, but one size does not fit all at a local level. People want, and should have, more control over the planning decisions that affect their lives, and the Bill would give it to them.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Lorely Burt, John Barrett, Mr. Colin Breed, Mr. Paul Burstow, Mr. Nick Clegg, Tim Farron, Sandra Gidley, Mark Hunter, Mark Williams and Stephen Williams.

Local Government and Planning (Parkland and Windfall Development)

Lorely Burt accordingly presented a Bill to impose conditions on the sale of parkland by local authorities, to make provision about the circumstances in which a planning application may be rejected by a local authority and about rights of appeal in such circumstances; to prohibit repeated planning applications in certain circumstances; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 24 February, and to be printed [Bill 47].

Business of the House

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, at this day's sitting, the Speaker shall put forthwith the Questions on any Motion relating to committal of the Crossrail Bill and on any instruction to the Committee on the Bill, and the Questions may be decided after the moment of interruption.—[Mr. Coaker]

3.45 pm

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I am always suspicious of business motions, particularly when no explanation is offered for them. I hoped that at least a brief explanation would be forthcoming. I am concerned, because an earlier business motion, to which I freely admit, I did not pay sufficient attention, precluded the amendment of instructions to the Crossrail Bill Committee. Paragraph (b)(i) of the Government instruction is particularly offensive, as it prevents the Committee from considering extensions beyond Maidenhead to Reading. An earlier business motion limited the powers of the House to provide effective scrutiny of the Bill, and I am now concerned about the implications of the present business motion. The Government owe us at least an explanation of the need for it.

3.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): The motion before the House deals with the committal motion and the instruction on the Crossrail Bill. The committal motion formally commits the Bill to be considered by a Select Committee. It sets out the size of the Committee, how it is to be appointed and how it is to operate. Those essentially logistical provisions are well precedented. More importantly, it also sets the petitioning period. Hon. Members will see that we have given people nine weeks, until 16 September, to lodge a petition. Traditionally, petitioning periods have lasted two to three weeks—we are giving people three times that amount of time. The instruction is required to help ensure that the hybrid Bill process that is used for Crossrail is fully compliant with the environmental impact assessment directive. It is designed to guide the Select Committee in its consideration of comments on the environmental statement. Second Reading establishes the principle of the Bill, but that principle is not considered by the Committee. Where comments on the environmental statement relate to the matters that the Committee has a remit to consider, the Committee will take them into account in its assessment.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I am listening carefully to the Minister. The argument that he has just evinced suggests that he considers the termination of Crossrail in the west at Maidenhead a point of principle. Am I correct in my understanding of the Government's position?

Derek Twigg: That is the case, but a Select Committee can consider other related matters. The instruction invites the Committee to inform the House of, but not to comment on or analyse, the nature of representations on the environmental impact of the project that constitute opposition to the principle of the Bill and that, for that reasor , fall outside the Committee's remit.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to the Minister for his generosity in giving way to me a second time, but he has just implied that the Select Committee will be able to look at the issue of the termini on the Crossrail line. In fact, the Government instruction expressly forbids the Select Committee from looking at alternative termini for that line. He says that it is a matter of principle for the Government, so why are they refusing to give the Select Committee permission to look at alternative termini?

Derek Twigg: The Committee cannot look at the principle, but it can look at the detail.

Mr. George Galloway (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Respect): The exchange between the Minister and the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) suggests the ragged nature of the Government's preparation. The Minister will be aware of the looming shadow of judicial review, so why at midday today were the papers from Bindman and Partners, expressly pointing out the grounds on which judicial review could be sought, not among the documents that the Government provided for today's proceedings?

Derek Twigg: I do not know why that is the case, but we will obviously try to find out during today's debate.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I detect some confusion in the House about the Minister's answer a moment ago about a Committee being able to look at the detail but not the principle. Will the Committee be able to consider the merits or otherwise of extending the line to Reading?

Derek Twigg: What the Committee wishes to consider is a matter for the Committee, but the principle of the Bill is set out.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. According to the note in the Lobby, under the title, "The Speaker's Provisional Selection of Instructions", you have decided that the instruction in the name of the Secretary of State be moved and voted on, and that the instruction in the name of the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), with which my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) and others are associated, could also potentially be voted on, but only if the Secretary of State's instruction is defeated. Will you reconsider that, for this reason: the second instruction has a broader remit than the first? The logic might be, if it were acceptable to you and others, that we vote on the wider alternative before voting on the narrower. These are highly controversial matters, as you know. Is there any scope for that decision being reconsidered now or during the afternoon's proceedings?

Mr. Speaker: I must follow the order on the Order Paper. That is why the instructions are laid in the No Lobby, as I intended to tell the House.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The motion is debatable, and I would far rather the Minister made his contribution and that others came in, instead of the Minister constantly giving way. It is rather untidy to do it that way.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister said that it is for the Committee to decide what it considers and what it does not consider. My understanding was that the instruction was quite specific in tailoring what the Committee can or cannot consider, in a way that seems to contradict what the Minister has just told us. For the sake of clarity and to inform the present debate, will you give us your guidance?

Mr. Speaker: It is for the Minister, not for me, to interpret his instruction.

Peter Luff: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is an awkward debate. We are trying to establish the orderliness of our proceedings, and the questions that I want to put might perhaps be more appropriately put to you. The Minister has so far not answered the question that I put to him, which was why we need the motion, from a procedural point of view. He explained the elements of the debate and we understand that, but if he does not answer that question, would it be in order for me to put a point of order to you, asking why we need the motion?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman can always put a point of order to me, but he has lost me there. It is the Minister's motion, not mine.

Derek Twigg: A number of the issues that hon. Members have raised and will raise on the committal motion will be debated during the afternoon and evening. The committal motion is self-explanatory. Clearly, it is for the Select Committee to consider the matters. If the Committee wanted to consider the principle, it would have to come back to the House. It is for the House to decide, but what we wish to set today is the principle, and that is what the committal motion does.

3.53 pm

Mr. George Galloway (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Respect) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to take part in the debate?

Mr. Galloway: Yes, Mr. Speaker, with trepidation, because I want to catch your eye more substantively later.

What the Minister has just said flatly contradicts what he said a few minutes ago. The Government will have to get some inspiration as to what the real facts are. It cannot be true both that it is up to the Select Committee to decide what it wants to consider, and that the instruction, if passed, circumscribes what it can consider. Both those statements cannot be true. I sympathise with the Minister. The issue is detailed, complex and controversial and I do not want to fall out with him at this stage, because I shall ask him for many things in the course of the debate. We must have clarity on the subject, for clarity there is none in the House at this point.

3.54 pm

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): It is touching that the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) and the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) have cited the case for the procedure to include the extension of Crossrail to Reading. On mature reflection, the Minister may wish that his answer had addressed these points. The Department for Transport is consulting on safeguarding the route from Maidenhead to Reading in response to very strong lobbying from the business community and Reading Members of Parliament—we have established a cross-party consensus. Those of us who have an interest in seeing the Crossrail project proceed, but who are also concerned about its impact on existing high-speed services and freight lines and the roll-out to Reading, wonder why the instruction to the Select Committee is so prescriptive. I invite the Minister to open the door to wider discussions on the consequences of Crossrail, which all hon. Members want to approve in principle, because important details have not yet been examined.

The hybrid Bill process is, by its nature, complex. The Select Committee will have about 12 months of detailed consideration to take on board all the points and concerns. Hon. Members are concerned that the Committee may be fettered by the tightly drawn terms of its instruction, on which we will vote today. I hope that the Minister will reflect on the concerns expressed by hon. Members who support the principle of Crossrail, who want Crossrail to work for the people of London, but who also want it to work for people who seek to commute into London from various constituencies to the west and the east. I hope that that has helped the Minister.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Hon. Members on both sides of the House clearly want to consider the instruction to the Committee. If the motion is passed, there will be no opportunity for further debate, because the question will be put forthwith. The Minister is shaking his head, but is that the case, Mr. Speaker? Will you allow at least some concurrent discussion on Second Reading about the instruction motion, so that hon. Members can make their points?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has answered his own point of order. I will allow the instruction to be debated on Second Reading.

3.57 pm

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I want to say a word or two about the motion, which I want the Government to withdraw after reflection.

I support the Crossrail project, but this is not the way to win friends and influence people. If we are to achieve consensus, which the hon. Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter) and others want, we must have a wide debate on Second Reading and in the early procedural stages to allow all the issues to be put on the table. It is entirely wrong for the Government to foreclose the discussion about what the Select Committee is entitled to do before we get into the substance of the debate, in which my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) will lead for the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman has mentioned the vital importance of achieving a consensus that includes not only politicians, but various people in the railway network. Does he agree that this instruction is unlikely to achieve that purpose?

Simon Hughes: I entirely accept that. I am trying to ensure that we end up with an east-west rail link through London from the west to east that will serve people from the west country and the Thames valley, come into and through the capital, and go out to the eastern home counties and East Anglia. That has been on the agenda of this country and this Parliament for many years—certainly throughout your speakership, Mr. Speaker, and before that.

I want to make three points about why I hope that the Government will reconsider this rather surprising business motion, of which I was not aware in advance. I thought that I was coming here to debate the Second Reading of the Crossrail Bill and that, having debated its principles and substance, we could debate the remit that we give to the Select Committee when we ask it to get on with the detailed consideration of petitions against the Bill.

Martin Salter: Before the hon. Gentleman treats the House to his three substantive points, may I seek clarification from the Liberal Democrats that they join the other parties in supporting the principle of the western terminus for Crossrail being in Reading rather than in Maidenhead, as proposed?

Simon Hughes: I think that the answer is yes, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington will confirm that when he speaks on our behalf on Second Reading. I am speaking on the basis of a London constituency interest.

Peter Luff: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Simon Hughes: Just once more, as I want to make my three points and move on.

Peter Luff: Is it the hon. Gentleman's understanding, as it is mine, that the purpose of this business motion is to ensure that the subsequent debate and votes occur today? I wish that the Minister had confirmed that, but he would not do so. I would welcome that outcome. I support Crossrail in principle, but this instruction turns me against the whole thing because of its restrictive nature. I would like separate debates and votes on the separate issues.

Simon Hughes: That prompts me to make my first point. We have waited a long time for this Bill. It was due in the last Parliament and never came. It was in the Queen's Speech and we hoped that it would come early in this Parliament, but it was put back; it was trailed but did not happen. We understand the reasons for that—I am not being over-critical—but we now have to get moving. The trouble is that we are up against the buffer of the last three days of the parliamentary term before the summer recess. I can understand the dilemma: how does one have a Second Reading debate without any filibustering or delay that would prevent us from forming the Select Committee?

I cannot speak for colleagues in other parties, but certainly my colleagues and I would facilitate having the procedural debate later tonight or tomorrow, which would be entirely possible. There would be no difficulty if we were allowed to send the Committee a brief saying that it could look at the whole range of issues. That would not divide the House—it would produce a consensus and we could vote on it. This is a serious request to the Secretary of State, who knows these issues very well. Let us have Second Reading of the Bill, which will, I believe, receive the approval of this House in due course, but please do not fetter the hands of the Committee at this stage because there will be complaints that it is not addressing the issues properly.

My second point is that there is a large degree of consensus. The first parts of the Secretary of State's instructions and those in the name of the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) and of my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington and others are the same. They both call for a process dealing with the environmental impact and for the principle of the Bill to allow debate on where the termini should be. It is fairly obvious that if we are to have a great railway line through the country, the decisions on the locations of the termini are central and should be discussed by the Select Committee.

The instructions agree that intermediate stations should be provided in eight places: Paddington, which is obvious; Bond Street; Tottenham Court Road; Farringdon, with an interchange with the north-south Thameslink line; Liverpool Street, with an interchange with the mainline station; Whitechapel; the Isle of Dogs; and Custom House. So far, there is consensus. The difference is that my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington and the other signatories to the third instruction ask the Committee to consider three important questions.

The first question deals with Crossrail's effect on freight and other passenger services. That is an obvious consideration. When a great new railway line is established, the knock-on effect on other users—passenger and freight—should be considered. That is not unreasonable but sensible. The Government, who, to their credit, keep saying that they want an integrated rail network, should accept that.

The second question requests that the Committee be allowed to consider whether the line could be part of the integrated rail network. We all want that. If one travels from, for example, Hull to Plymouth and happens to go through Oxford or Reading, one wants to know that there will be some interconnection. If one makes a journey down the east coast to Cambridge, one wants to ensure that there is a connection.

The third question is obvious. Now that we have won the Olympic bid and have the great opportunity of the games, which I have always supported and now welcome—it is fantastic for London—we need to ensure, given the Government's claim at the outset that we did not need Crossrail for the bid, that we do not commit ourselves to building something that disrupts the necessary work for delivering the transport for the

[Simon Hughes]

Olympics, for example, the east London railway line extension and other projects to which we are committed. It is no good doing a Boston and digging up the whole of London because of Crossrail when we are trying to fulfil commitments in the east end and in south-east London, where I live.

The second substantive point is, therefore, a request to the Government to give the Committee the job of examining the logical questions on the Order Paper.

The third point—[HON. MEMBERS: "It is the fourth."] No, it is the third substantive point, which is about procedure. If the Government are uncertain about willingness to co-operate, will they accept assurances from colleagues of all parties that we are all willing to co-operate with getting the Bill from the Floor of the House into Committee before the summer so that we can get on with the job as soon as possible? Nobody wishes to delay progress. If the Government would be reasonable about the process, hon. Members would be reasonable about how we handle the Bill. I therefore beg the Government to withdraw the motion and allow us to do orderly business so that the Committee can get on with its job.

Peter Luff: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is always unsatisfactory if the House votes on a motion the purpose of which it does not understand. The Government have given no explanation of the motion so far. If we do not pass the motion, am I right that the House could not vote on the subsequent motions after Second Reading?

Mr. Speaker: I simply want to take the motion before us and then I will worry about what happens afterwards. The hon. Gentleman asks a hypothetical question. I will know what to do when the House makes a decision. It is up to the House to make a decision.

Mr. Hayes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you know, the Opposition have tabled an instruction. Will it not be debated after Second Reading? When I took advice before the debate, I was told that there might be an opportunity to do that, but it now seems clear from the Under-Secretary's comments and your ruling that, if we pass the imperfect motion that we are considering, which has been criticised by all parties, there will be no opportunity to discuss anything else on the Order Paper after Second Reading.

Mr. Speaker: I shall consult on the matter.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Let me answer the point of order. If the business motion is defeated, the committal motion and the instructions cannot be debated today.

Peter Luff: They cannot be voted on.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. My apologies—they cannot be voted on today.

Mr. Galloway: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I promise to brief, though my immediate thought is, "What a way to build a railroad." Is not it possible for a short adjournment to take place while advice is sought about framing the motion in a way that would take account of what has been said? It would be passing strange for the House to vote on a motion that Ministers are not even prepared to defend at the Dispatch Box, so bereft are they of justification for it.

Mr. Speaker: The Secretary of State has indicated to me that he wishes to address the House on that matter.

Mr. Darling: I intend to cover all the points that have been raised in relation to the instruction and the procedures, and to give the Government's view on them. However, as I understand it, if the House agrees to the business motion now, there will be a vote on the principle of the Bill—its Second Reading—at 10 o'clock. We will then reach motion No. 8, which is the Government's instruction, and if the House does not like it, it can vote it down. Then, as I understand it, the Opposition's instruction to the Committee would be considered. However, the business motion gives the House the opportunity to vote on these matters. At risk of straying from the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I hope, during the course of my remarks, to be able to accommodate many, if not all, of the points made by hon. Members? I believe that our instruction to the Committee will allow that.

Mr. Speaker: In that case, allow me to put the Question.

Question put and agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Crossrail Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Secretary of State, I would like to inform the House that the list of my selection of instructions is in the No Lobby.

4.11 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

London has relied on railways and underground lines built largely by the Victorians and it now needs Crossrail if it is going to cope with the needs of the 21st century. The Bill will provide the powers needed to build Crossrail, a new railway that will bring enormous benefits not only to London, but to the south-east and the wider United Kingdom.

As I suggested in the previous debate, I want to cover three main areas. The first involves the procedures involved with a hybrid Bill. During that part of my speech, I want to cover the points raised by Members on both sides of the House relating to the instructions. The second area involves what the Bill does, and the third covers the proposed route. That might help Members to time their interventions.

The procedures in relation to a hybrid Bill are unusual, so the House would benefit from some discussion on that before we come to discuss the route. I hope that, subject to stretching your patience, Mr. Speaker, I shall be able to give way to all Members who wish to raise points. I recognise that a Bill of this importance, and which impacts on the interests of a large number of people along its route, is bound to be controversial—not necessarily on party political grounds, although some hon. Members are against the proposal on principle—and it is in the interest of the House to debate these matters properly.

I now come to the nature of the Bill. The last hybrid Bill to be introduced to the House, over a decade ago, dealt with the channel tunnel rail link. Hybrid Bills are used for projects of such national importance that it is appropriate for the Government to take the lead in strategic development. However, because they deal with specific private interests, they are dealt with differently in both Houses of Parliament. A hybrid Bill has aspects of both a public and a private Bill. It is introduced by the Government and, like any public Bill, contains provisions that either affect everyone or affect particular classes of people.

The hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) and my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter) asked how Crossrail would link into the national network, in relation to trains running to the west of Paddington. I shall come to that issue later in my speech, but I mention it because it will be dealt with by an unusual procedure, because this is a hybrid Bill. If we give the Bill a Second Reading, it will go to a Special Select Committee that will have the power to hear petitions against it. That is where people who have concerns about their property or about disturbances, for example, will have an opportunity to be heard. That Select Committee will sit a quasi-judicial capucity. It then goes to a Standing Committee—most of the House will be familiar with that as it is a normal procedure on a Bill—then on to Third Reading and then to another place, where exactly the same procedure is followed.

It is patently obvious that because the Bill has such long stages in both Houses it will take some considerable time to go through Parliament, which means that there ought to be ample opportunity for just about every possible complaint and comment to be heard. As a word of caution, however, the last Crossrail Bill fell precisely because there was a lack of clarity as to the reason for the Bill in the first place—because it was a private Member's Bill, the House never decided on the question of principle—and it eventually collapsed under the sheer weight of objections. I very much hope that we can avoid that fate.

The procedural position is that if the Bill gets its Second Reading tonight, it will be sent to a Select Committee, in accordance with the instruction that we have tabled—to be fair, I think that all the instructions do that—with an opportunity for members of the public and others to petition against the Bill, so that their objections can be tabled, and which the Select Committee can then hear. The point is that there will be ample opportunity for members of the public and Members of both Houses of Parliament to have their concerns dealt with.

Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): For clarification, what, if any, detrimental effect would the construction phase of the Crossrail project have on south Wales rail services relying on Paddington station?

Mr. Darling: I shall come to that later. I know that concerns have been raised by Members representing constituencies to the west of Paddington about access into Paddington station. I will go into that in further detail, but there is no reason why trains coming into Paddington from south Wales and the west country will not continue to be able to do so, as they do now, as they use the fast lines into Paddington, whereas Crossrail will be using the slow ones. I shall explain in greater detail why there will not be the impact that people fear.

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Darling: I want to deal with the procedural points before giving way again, or we will get tangled up.

Martin Salter: I shall intervene later on the issue of routing. Can the Secretary of State clarify, in a way that his colleague chose not to do, the interrelationship between the instruction to the Select Committee and the current consultation that the Department for Transport is carrying out on the safeguarding of the route from Maidenhead to Reading, which, at a later stage, would allow Crossrail to have a western terminus at Reading rather than at Maidenhead as proposed? What is the interrelationship between the consideration and work of the Select Committee and the current consultation that the Department is carrying out?

Mr. Darling: I will deal with that matter later, as it takes me into a long passage of my speech with which I must deal.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My point is on a procedural matter—the relationship of the franchises, particularly the Greater Western franchise, which is currently being discussed. Is not it possible that those who are bidding for that franchise will at least try to gauge the likelihood of the Crossrail Bill going through, as that has a major implication in terms of how many additions, or reductions, to services might take place? Will my right hon. Friend comment on that?

Mr. Darling: On no possible view will Crossrail be open for services before the current Greater Western franchise is completed. Indeed, if discussions go on much longer this afternoon, it might be some considerable time before Crossrail opens. The franchisees who are bidding for the Greater Western franchise at the moment know of Crossrail and what the plans are, as they have discussed them with the Department. On any view, however, that franchise expires before Crossrail services will be running, so I do not think that that is a problem.

I want to deal with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West. I want to say something about the instructions. As a preliminary point, the House knows that the Select Committees that we set up have a fair amount of latitude. Indeed, successive Governments have got into awful trouble by being over-prescriptive. Nevertheless, because of difficulties we have encountered in the past and because I think we must get people to focus on a particular proposition—which is the subject of the Bill—we have tabled an instruction to the Select Committee to regard the principle of the Bill as including a proposition, namely, the provision of a railway running from Maidenhead in the west to Shenfield and Abbey Wood in the east, with a prescribed number of named stations on its route. That does not preclude the Select Committee from considering possible variations, and if it heard representations relating to other matters it would not be precluded from saying so to the House.

I note, incidentally, that every amendment to our instruction includes a restriction relating to the environmental impact, so the principle has been accepted to that extent. I fear, however, that if we do not issue our instruction, the Committee will receive only the most generalised instruction. The whole process could continue for months, if not years. There is a serious risk that one of two things could happen: either we might not reach a conclusion, or the costs of the project could rise beyond any reasonable level.

The purpose of our instruction is to tell the Committee that the House has given the Bill a Second Reading and that the principle of the Bill ought to include the establishment of a railway line that is specified in the instruction. I do not think that the Government or the House can tell the Committee, "Thou shalt not consider anything else"—for example, matters relating to any one of the stations along the route. It is open to the Committee to say that a station is in the wrong place, or that there ought to be a station somewhere else. We cannot tell the Committee, "No, you cannot consider any of those things." However, unless we have a stab at instructing it on what it ought to be considering, we run a serious risk of allowing this Crossrail project to meet exactly the same fate as others in the past. The whole thing could run into the sand.

At 10 pm, the House will have the option of voting down our instruction—although I should say for the avoidance of doubt that I hope that my colleagues will join me in the Lobby. If our instruction falls, there are others tabled by the Opposition and by individual Members—among them the hon. Member for Ongar, to whom I now give way.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): I am grateful to the Secretary of State, but he should not forget the Brentwood part of my constituency—and, more particularly, the Shenfield part.

The Secretary of State is being very clear and he is trying to be reasonable about the powers of the Select Committee. Does that reasonableness extend to petitioners? Will they be able to petition Parliament on where the termini should be, or will such petitions be ruled out of order?

Mr. Darling: I do not think that we can prescribe what is in a petition. The instruction is to a Select Committee. Members of the public are entitled to petition Parliament on whatever they want. I suspect that there will be petitions against the principle of the Bill, full stop. Indeed, I should be astonished if there were not, and we cannot stop them from coming in.

All the instructions are similar, in that they tell the Committee that it should treat the principle as having been established by Second Reading. Our instruction goes further, in that it suggests the route. I repeat, however, that if someone came along and said that the stations or the termini should be different, the Select Committee may well want to consider that. It would be up to the Committee.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Darling: Hon. Members should not worry. Everyone will have a chance to intervene. On this occasion, patience will be rewarded.

The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar's instruction would restrict the termini to Paddington and Liverpool Street stations, which would make it far narrower than the Government are proposing. I must say that it would destroy the economic case for the development, because unless the railway line runs beyond the two ends of the tunnel, it becomes an extremely expensive proposition.

Mr. Pickles rose—

Mr. Darling: I shall allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene again in a few moments.

Our instruction allows a full debate of the sort that the House wants. The other general point—I think that the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey raised it earlier—is that public policy issues such as freight policy or the integration of the railways are likely to be discussed less in the petitioning process and the Select Committee than in the Standing Committee. That is what the Standing Committee procedure is all about.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Darling: I give way first, as promised, to the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar.

Mr. Pickles: I am most grateful to the Secretary of State, who is being very reasonable. My particular instruction was not selected, so discussion of it is largely academic, but if the right hon. Gentleman is saying that no technical restrictions would prevent my constituents from petitioning the Select Committee with regard to the termini, he may well have satisfied me.

Mr. Darling: That would be amazing. The hon. Gentleman went to the trouble of tabling an instruction, so I wanted to point out that it was very restrictive and would have rendered the project uneconomic. The House should make the point to the Select Committee that if we do not receive some guidance about what the Bill is all about, we could end up, frankly, going all over the place, which none of us wants.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I appreciate what the Secretary of State says about our amendment to the instruction perhaps prolonging the Committee stage, but given that petitions can be accepted on anything, I do not really see quite why that is the case. Inasmuch as our proposal refers to the need for proper rail freight services and an integrated transport network as well as the requirement to be properly in tune with plans for the 2012 Olympics, how does it depart in any way from Government policy?

Mr. Darling: I do not think that we have yet reached the stage where Conservative policy is exactly the same as ours—[Interruption.] We shall see. The point is that the Select Committee will concentrate on matters relating to the petitions, which I would expect to be mainly concerned with matters of private interest—property take, land acquisition and so forth. In respect of the acquisition of sites presently used for freight, for example, some broader policy issues will be raised. The second part of the Opposition's instruction refers to rail freight, the national rail network and the Olympics and I intend to say something about all of them shortly. Typically, those issues would be dealt with by a Standing Committee because they deal with general public policy rather than private interest.

Mr. Duncan indicated assent.

Mr. Darling: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman accepts that. As the House will appreciate, it is our job as Members of Parliament to determine matters of public interest. When private interests are at stake, it is right to establish a separate procedure to deal with them. That is why the hon. Gentleman's instruction is unnecessary.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab): I speak as a Member who served on the Select Committee that considered the original Channel Tunnel Bill—not the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill—19 years ago. That Select Committee sat for almost six months and had to deal with an enormous quantity of petitions and it clearly lacked the sort of detailed instruction that is being proposed today, which should make it possible to decide what priority to give to a range of petitions. Given the risk of so many petitions clogging up the Committee's work and diverting it from its priorities, I hope that my right hon. Friend will not give the impression that anyone can petition and that all those petitions will be considered. It is precisely the need for clarity about priorities that Select Committees faced with a deluge of petitions require. I hope that I am not being unhelpful to my right hon. Friend, but I want to be helpful to the Select Committee that will have to consider the petitions.

Mr. Darling: Actually, my right hon. Friend's comments are helpful, as he speaks from experience. It is open to anyone who wants to do so to petition Parliament; people have a constitutional right to do that and we cannot turn them away. However, the point that I was making, with which I think my right hon. Friend agrees, is that unless the Committee has some instruction and guidance from the House on what it is supposed to be deciding, someone could, at the extreme, argue passionately for the inclusion of a Crossrail station at Georgetown, near Thurso—the Select Committee might take the view that that would be a station too far—so it is important that we give some clarity. As my right hon. Friend was so helpful, it pains me to say that I do not think that I can accept his instruction, although I shall deal with the question of Woolwich later on.

I hope that the House can accept that we are trying to balance people's right and need to be heard with the fact that if we do not give the Committee some clarity it will be difficult, as my right hon. Friend has just said, for it to make progress in anything like a sensible period of time.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for his explanations and clarification. He will appreciate that there are great concerns, especially in central London, about the precise nature of the route. For the avoidance of doubt, may I take it that his comments of the past 10 minutes ensure that the route through central London is by no means set in stone, even though it has been set out, and that it will be open to full debate in the Committee?

Mr. Darling: As I said earlier, it is open to the Select Committee, after listening to petitions and representations, to come up with proposals. I also said that if the House gives the Bill a Second Reading—I hope that it will receive cross-party support—the Select Committee will bear in mind that the one thing that would kill the Bill would be amendments that hugely add to its expense or so change it that the whole of its economics change.

I am sure that not every aspect of the Bill is perfect, and it will need changes, so we have to achieve a balance in the amendments. All members of the Select Committee should bear in mind that without too much difficulty we could end up creating a railway line that was completely different, vastly more expensive and would thus almost certainly never be built. For the sake of London, in particular, that would be an absolute tragedy. However, the hon. Gentleman is right—if Members and the public want to make representations about stations and the route, they can do so to the Select Committee.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): The Secretary of State is being generous in giving way. His distinction of the roles of Select and Standing Committees was genuinely helpful, although I suspect that paragraph (c)(i) in both my instruction and that of the official Opposition touches on private interests and should thus be a matter for the Select Committee.

May we have clarification on the nature of an instruction? In my reading of the Government's instruction, paragraph (b)(i) says in effect, "You may not look beyond Maidenhead" and that was my central objection. However, the Secretary of State seems to be telling the House that it is not really an instruction but a piece of advice, and that if the Select Committee wants to look at issues relating to Maidenhead and Reading, it may do so. In that case, what is the purpose of the instruction? That is not a hostile question; it is genuine intellectual curiosity. Why?

Mr. Darling: Because, as I have said on a number of occasions, we deliberately took a light touch. Select Committees must have a certain amount of leeway if they are to work effectively, but I think that the Select Committee will want some guidance from the House on what it should be considering, precisely to avoid the difficulties that my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) raised. That is why the Government's instruction puts to the House the proposition that an instruction be given to the Select Committee to look at a specific proposition. However, as I said earlier, if someone comes along with a petition on something different, such as varying the line of the route, no Government or, indeed, the House, would say that the Select Committee should not consider it. At the end of the day, when the House is invited to consider the report of the Select Committee, a judgment will have to be reached. I shall say something about Reading later in my remarks, which I should get back to in the not-too-distant future.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): The House is in some difficulty, because while hon. Members want all the evidence to be available, there are a number of parallel issues that will not actually be involved. Will my right hon. Friend make it very clear that he will be discussing the way that this scheme meshes in with Olympic developments and other overall railway issues, which would divide off in people's minds the problems that we are facing this afternoon and the need to have an overall clear railway policy?

Mr. Darling: I intend to come to that matter. Having probably been too generous in terms of the usual convention of the House, I will now come to some of these matters later. My hon. Friend is quite right—there are matters of general policy that will get debated, especially in the Standing Committee, although inevitably because of the nature of petitioning I suspect that one or two will come up in the Select Committee as well. My hon. Friend is right that it is important that we ask ourselves how Crossrail fits into the national picture. I can deal with the Olympic points very quickly—

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Darling: No; I shall make progress and then I will let hon. Members intervene.

For the avoidance of doubt, the Government have always made it clear that Crossrail was never, ever going to be ready for the Olympics, although there are other issues, such as the planning and initial construction of Crossrail at the same time—

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD):The Secretary of State is being very helpful. Will he clarify two final things on the instruction process? Will he explain the implication of the first bit of his instruction? What are the environmental matters that cannot be considered by the Select Committee? I think the phrase is,

"prevented from considering by the practice of the House".

Do we all understand the Secretary of State to say that the three matters that were in the additional instruction, but not in his, are actually all public policy matters that he believes it is perfectly proper for the Committee and the whole House to consider as and when they want to?

Mr. Darling: Inasmuch as I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is making, the policy matters that he touched on—such as rail freight, the services out of Paddington to the west and the integration, to which I shall come—are not really Select Committee matters, although the Select Committee may touch on them if it wants. However, they are certainly Standing Committee and Third Reading matters and they will be discussed then.

The first instruction is common to all the instructions. It is basically saying to the Select Committee that if someone comes in with an environmental objection and says, "I am against it on principle", the Committee can tell us about it but it cannot take it on board, because there is no point in our having an "in principle" Second Reading debate if the Committee then says, "We do not think there is a need for Crossrail"—which is what happened in 1994. Who knows? If that had not happened in 1994, Crossrail might have been open. It might not, but it might have been.

Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): The Secretary of State has reassured a number of hon. Members that both the termini and the railway stations along the route can be reviewed in the Select Committee. Will he reassure me that this also applies to the proposed location of the depot, which is proposed to be placed within my constituency of Romford?

Mr. Darling: Yes, I can. The depot at Romford is an integral part of the project. Clearly, if we cannot maintain the trains, Crossrail will not run for very long. I know that there are issues that the hon. Gentleman has raised in written questions in the House and that his constituents will no doubt want to raise in relation to the depot and the access to it, so yes, that will be considered.

To conclude this part of my speech, what I am inviting the House to do tonight is to agree the principle of the Crossrail project, which is a railway that runs between the termini at Shenfield, Maidenhead and Abbey Wood, and to agree that the main intermediate stations are at Paddington, Bond Street, Tottenham Court Road, Farringdon, Liverpool Street, Whitechapel, the Isle of Dogs and Custom House. Separate Committees in both Houses will consider these matters further and there will be an opportunity for more general debate, as I have described.

I shall outline the purpose of the Bill. Crossrail will deliver extra capacity on the rail network in London and, importantly, will provide—as hon. Members have already mentioned—a vital new link in the strategic rail network, into which it will be integrated. The main purpose of the Bill is to secure the powers necessary to build Crossrail, and that will consist of new rail tunnels running east-west through central London, connecting directly the existing surface rail routes to Maidenhead and Heathrow in the west and Shenfield and Abbey Wood in the east. By connecting the major London rail terminals at Paddington and Liverpool Street, it will enable interconnecting main line train services to cross the centre of London, through a number of new purpose-built stations. So, Crossrail will be part of the existing railway network either side of the London tunnels, and that adds a very important dimension to London's railways.

Crossrail will be regulated by the Office of Rail Regulation. Once built, its operations can be devolved to the Mayor of London or to Network Rail because the railway will serve London and the wider network. That will bring significant benefits. London's present transport system faces significant problems in meeting demand during the rush hour and we need to deal with the congestion and overcrowding on much of the network during peak hours.

Mr. Francois: The Secretary of State mentioned a few minutes ago that the Bill was not perfect and accepted that certain reasonable amendments might be needed. I am particularly concerned about clauses 21 to 31, which appear to give Crossrail priority over all other rail users. There is much concern around the House about that. Is he prepared to look at that point specifically to ensure that we try to get the advantages of Crossrail without damaging interoperability with the existing rail network?

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising an important issue. The Bill is designed to enable Crossrail to be constructed and, to do so, it is necessary to take powers not only to acquire land but, crucially, to allow the Crossrail services to run. Now that the Government have strategic control of the direction of the railways as a result of the Railways Act 2005, we clearly have an interest in ensuring that we have a railway network that not only serves London and its commuters, but is part of the national network. We are putting into London a new stretch of railway, while inevitably using existing railway lines, so it is necessary to take powers in the Bill to ensure that the Crossrail services can run. However, I make it clear to the House that, although the Crossrail services are important, it is equally important that we maintain the other services that run into London, such as the lines that come up from the west of England and south Wales and, at the eastern end of the tunnel, the trains that run on the Great Eastern and East Anglia network generally.

As I said, the Bill will give us the power to devolve the track itself to Network Rail or to the Mayor of London, but I am absolutely clear that we cannot have a railway where one bit operates to the great disadvantage of the other bit. Crossrail will not just carry the sort of metro services that run in the inner part of London, but link the City of London with areas to the west, using existing services, as well as Crossrail services to some extent. We want the Heathrow Express to continue, as does BAA, which operates it. Crossrail must also tie into the largely commuter services that come in from East Anglia, as well as not just cross-channel but Kent services.

I want to make it abundantly clear that, once Crossrail is complete, we must regard the railway as precisely what it is: part of the national network, albeit one that clearly serves large parts of London in particular. The reason why I need those powers is to ensure that we can make Crossrail happen, but, as it develops, we want to ensure that we can have a proper, integrated railway network, which is a concern that a number—

Mr. Darling: Do not worry—everyone will get in.

The reason why I will have those powers is that I fear that, without them, neither I nor my successors could ensure that Crossrail works and that we can get those services in place. I want to make it abundantly clear that we must ensure that we regard Crossrail as part of the national network and that it does not squeeze out, to any unjustified degree, other services that are equally necessary.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): With due respect, the comments that the Secretary of State has just made appear contradictory. The whole point about the national rail network is that access to it is determined by the Office of Rail Regulation, so the balance of priorities between certain train operating companies and the freight services is determined by that office. The Bill will take that power away from it and enable the Secretary of State to require that certain services be given priority. He cannot justify the statement that Crossrail will be a normal part of the national rail network operated by the Office of Rail Regulation and support the Bill.

Mr. Darling: I said a few moments ago that I envisaged that the railway would be regulated by the Office of Rail Regulation. Our difficulty is that we are trying to build a new railway that will be partly completely new—the tunnels—and partly integrated with the existing network. Powers must thus be taken through the Bill to make that happen and to allow the Crossrail services to run. It is intended that the railway will be part of the national network and that it will be regulated by the ORR. Although it is perfectly true that one cannot run two trains on one piece of railway at the same time—I will come on to deal with questions about the west country service, which I know affects the right hon. Lady—the intention is that Crossrail will be run as part of the national network. Yes, it will provide London commuter services, but it will also provide links for different parts of the United Kingdom.

The right hon. Lady should have no fear that this will somehow be a bit of railway that will be run entirely independently from the rest of the network. That would not be possible owing to its very nature. If that were the intention, we would do precisely what the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) envisages in the instruction that he has tabled and stop it at the tunnel ends, but that is not the case.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): The Secretary of State's comments are helpful, but what will happen to new services that are proposed? I am thinking particularly of Airtrack, of which he will be aware and which I think that the Government support. The Airtrack proposers are worried that they will be blocked out of terminal 5, where there will be a shortage of platforms, if Crossrail takes those platforms.

Mr. Darling: I do not think that that will happen. It might help the hon. Gentleman if I say that the Government and BAA, which owns Heathrow, have had many discussions about how Crossrail, Heathrow Express and Airtrack will tie in. Those discussions will continue. The current intention is that Crossrail trains will run to terminal 4, with the Heathrow Express running to terminal 5—obviously, both will call at terminals 1, 2 and 3. The current Airtrack proposal is that it will be able to come into terminal 5, but those proposals are not especially advanced at present, so that has not yet been finalised.

Given the history of the railways, some fragmentation is inevitable, although that is not all to do with what happened 10 years ago. BAA built its own railway as a separate entity from the main railway network. However, Heathrow Express runs perfectly sensibly and well with the existing network, so Crossrail can do exactly the same thing. My specific answer to the hon. Gentleman's point is that BAA and the Department are having extremely useful discussions. The intention is that Crossrail will go to terminal 4, so it will not squeeze out developments at terminal 5.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West) (Lab/Co-op): The Secretary of State is being generous in giving way and helpful by answering questions. He implied earlier in response to a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mrs. James) that there would be few problems because the two fast lines into Paddington from the west and Wales would remain as they are now. However, it is quite common to find that all four existing rails into Paddington are used, so passenger trains that are meant to be on the fast rails are going on to the slow rails even now, before any construction has begun. Many of my constituents in Bristol are worried that the powers that are being taken could be used to give Crossrail trains priority over trains that currently run between the west and Paddington. It is important that we get some reassurance on this.

Another reason why the four tracks are often in use is because freight also uses the line, and a lot of important freight comes from the west country—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Interventions are getting rather long and we have a long list of hon. Members who wish to try to catch my eye.

Mr. Darling: Perhaps that is an instruction to me as well, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend raises an important point on which my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West and others have also touched.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Doug Naysmith) is right that trains coming into Paddington experience delays. That is partly because the lines to the west of Paddington, like those in many other parts of the network, could have done with investment to improve signalling and track capacity over many years. I shall not get into the argument about that problem again because we all know why it happened. Part of the Crossrail proposal is to spend something like £1 billion on upgrading those lines and making it easier for freight trains to get on and off the main line. If a freight train comes off the main line and goes into a siding at the moment, it can effectively block the line for six or seven minutes. That might not seem like a long time, but if that happens several times a day, the problem soon mounts up, so that is one reason why my hon. Friend's trains sometimes get held up.

The intention is that Crossrail will use existing slow lines, not the fast lines. The fast lines will benefit from the additional electrification to ease freight train access to which I referred, and fast train services ought to be able to run. Some of the stories appearing in Bristol and further south-west about 40 per cent. cuts in capacity are absolute rubbish. It is one person feeding off another and such stories are not justified. There is no way that I would sanction anything in London that would result in a 40 per cent. cut in trains from the south-west of England.

Dr. Naysmith: I am pleased to hear it.

Mr. Darling: I am glad that my hon. Friend thinks that. The south-west of England is very important to the country and such scaremongering is nonsense. Crossrail will use the slow lines and also subsume some suburban lines. He should not be concerned about any adverse impact on trains from points west of Paddington, especially long-distance ones. Overall, the additional investment from Crossrail on lines to the west of Paddington will be beneficial not just to intercity services but to suburban services. In fact, the project will contribute much-needed investment to that part of the line, which has been overdue for some time. I hope that I have satisfied him on that point. If not, no doubt he will let me know.

Martin Salter: I certainly associate myself with some of the concerns expressed by other hon. Members. The Secretary of State said that Crossrail will be a vital rail route, connecting with the rest of the rail network.

With due respect to Maidenhead, it does not connect with anywhere. Does he accept that there is a powerful and logical case for locating Crossrail's western terminus in Reading?

Mr. Darling: Not entirely, no. My hon. Friend is a little unkind to Maidenhead—there is no reason why trains should not stop there. Reading was not included in the proposal because taking the train out there would add considerably to the expense of the project, not least because substantial resignalling around the Reading area would be required and there are problems with capacity at Reading even at the moment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty), the former Minister in the Department, said in the debate on the carry-over motion that the Government would consult on whether we ought to safeguard the route from Maidenhead to Reading. We shall be writing in the next few days to ask whether there ought to be such consultation, bearing it in mind that safeguarding brings problems. Once land has been safeguarded, there are consequences for local authorities, and not necessarily for the Government.

As I said right at the start, the project had to be made manageable and the sums had to stack up, and that is why we chose not to include Reading. My hon. Friend and his constituents and others will no doubt wish to petition the Select Committee on that, but, if we are going to get this built, we have to try to nail down a proposition. I am not closing the door: what my hon. Friend the former Transport Minister said on safeguarding remains the case.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his generosity in giving way to so many hon. Members. I hope that, if I incur the wrath of my hon. Friends on constituency points, they will move the issue on slightly.

The Secretary of State is discussing the powers that he is to take for funding Crossrail. As he knows, businesses in London are very supportive of the principle, but there is concern that they will be asked to contribute considerably to the cost. In central London, where the congestion charge is at last being quantified as having a negative impact on the retail, leisure and tourism industries, there is concern that an extra levy on businesses could reduce even further their viability and hence not even the expected amount of money will be raised. Is he coming to that issue or will he reassure businesses in London that they will be able to continue to exist?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the Secretary of State replies, I wish to repeat my advice to the House about the length of interventions. I understand why the Secretary of State is taking interventions and why hon. Members are making them, but we must try to keep them to reasonable proportions.

Mr. Darling: By happy coincidence, I was about to come to the cost, but, first, I wish to make a point directly relevant to the hon. Lady's intervention. If we do nothing, there is a serious prospect that at some point in the next decade—or certainly the one after—London will not be able to carry the number of people who come into it. Of all the difficulties that London business faces, that would be the No.1. That is why, over the past few weeks, I have said to the House time and again that we must all ask how we can get more capacity out of the system, be it road or rail.

Peter Luff rose—

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con) rose—

Mr. Darling: I wish to answer the hon. Lady's point first. You made a fair point, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I understand that some 18 hon. Members are down to speak. I do not want to make a Budget-length speech, and I shall now concentrate on the cost issue.

We think that Crossrail will add some £20 billion to the UK's GDP. It will also benefit London substantially through congestion relief and additional capacity, which will assist commuters. That is why it is necessary to build Crossrail. We think that Crossrail will cost some £15 billion or £16 billion at today's prices. The Bill envisages construction between 2008 and 2015, and, if one looks at the money that would be spent in those years, adjusted upward to take account of inflation, that is the probable order of magnitude.

I said last year that my Department, together with the Treasury and Transport for London, would take forward work on alternative funding mechanisms that could be used to raise a contribution from London. Most London business organisations are willing to contribute, because they perceive the direct benefit that London as a whole will receive. However, in light of the work that is being done by Sir Michael Lyons in reviewing local government funding more widely, it makes sense to see what he recommends before deciding the detailed balance of funding on Crossrail. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor and I have therefore decided to defer the consultation on alternative funding mechanisms until after the Lyons review.

It is important to demonstrate our commitment to the project, which is underlined by the fact that we are taking this Bill forward to establish the principle and route of Crossrail. Nevertheless, as the hon. Lady says, it is a significant sum. The cost will be some £15 billion or £16 billion in cash terms. It is a huge challenge, both in terms of funding and in respect of the wider fiscal position, so we need to get the funding right and to take the time to make that happen. My Department will continue to take those issues forward, including the issue of additional development funding, working together with Transport for London.

Mr. Rob Wilson: The Secretary of State made the point that Reading was uneconomic as the western terminus. What cost-benefit analysis of that has been made and why would Reading be uneconomic?

Mr. Darling: The issue was considered as part of the cross-London rail links project and all the information is available in the Library. It would take the best part of the rest of the debate to read it all out, but in simple terms, the costs would arise from extending the railway line from Maidenhead to Reading, including construction costs and the consequent need for resignalling at Reading. There are also capacity problems at Reading. I did not say to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West that, in terms of time gained, the studies that were carried out showed that most people would find it quicker to get from Reading into Paddington and then change; it would be quicker to use the existing high-speed services than to use Crossrail, which would be a local service. The studies were carried out and the hon. Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson) is welcome to examine them. I may have said that construction costs were based on 2008 to 2015. If I remember rightly, it is 2007 to 2013.

As I have said, there is a new central tunnel section for the stations to which I referred earlier. Major construction work is necessary at each station site as well as intermediate ventilation and emergency intervention shafts. It is my guess that a number of these areas may concern hon. Members and their constituents. I know that the hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Mr. Galloway) will certainly be concerned about Hanbury street. These are matters that the petitioning process is designed precisely to address so that we can ascertain what we can do to try to address concerns, if that is possible. We have tried throughout the process to examine all the options and to come up with those that are the least environmentally damaging and the least inconvenient to people. Inevitably, the construction of a large-scale railway underneath one of the largest cities in the world is bound to have some element of disruption.

I have mentioned that there are three outlying sections of the scheme to the west, the north-east and the south-east, and I hope that I have explained how they link with the existing network. Decisions about the route, the location of stations and so on were the subject of consultation both in 2003 and 2004. In addition to that, a number of plans have been put forward as alternatives to Crossrail, on which Members may wish to touch. However, I believe that the proposition that we have before us gives us a realistic chance of getting something constructed. It will take time, however, and it will be expensive. I believe that it will benefit London, the south-east and the whole country overall.

I hope that, during the course of the afternoon, I have been able to address some of the points that have been raised. I suspect that the House will have quite a long time to consider these matters because of the process that has been established both in relation to this place and another place. I hope that right hon. and hon. Members, as well as their constituents, will have ample opportunity to have their concerns explored.

Having considered these matters for the past three or four years, I am convinced that, if we do not do something about transport problems in London, not only London but the entire country will pay the price. I hope that, as we consider Crossrail and all the problems that we face, we can try together to reach some consensus in relation, first, to the building of Crossrail and, secondly, on the precise shape and form of it. I hope that we can avoid a situation where, in people's desire to be helpful and to add bits on here and there, we do not end up killing the entire project.

If we pass the Bill tonight, it will mark the biggest single development since Victorian times. It is a huge project with huge benefits. I commend the Bill to the House.

5.3 pm

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I begin by thanking the Secretary of State for the thoroughness, the patience and the courtesy with which he has treated the House. He has been generous in giving way and he has answered some pretty technical and complicated questions. I think that he has largely overcome the original confusion that was sown about the remit of the Select Committee. I think that the House will be grateful for the understanding tone that he has adopted towards this difficult and complex issue.

The country needs infrastructure. Building high-capacity routes in a densely populated country is an evermore complex and controversial endeavour. I hope that at least in principle, if not in every detail, we can make the issue of Crossrail something that has cross-party support.

Britain is crowded. In the past few centuries, we built our infrastructure very well—we constructed ports, canals, railways, airports, roads and now, by virtue of this project, we will construct railways again. As we build more, however, everything becomes entwined, and as we are not building any more space, inevitably the facilities that we are trying to construct for the betterment of our life overlap and compete for that space. That is nowhere more so than in our capital city, which is congested, highly populated and has many intense traffic movements from day to day. We have built in and out of London; we have built the M25 around it, but we have not built anything across it. The project will go from east to west, and from west to east. Inevitably, it must be a Government endeavour or at least a Government-authorised endeavour, so that the powers needed to implement it are enshrined in law. That is what the Bill attempts to do.

The Bill has been a long time a-coming. Any infrastructure project of this scale needs some push and drive. The people working on it need to adopt a "get on with it" attitude, balanced, as is clear from our deliberations today, by acute sensitivity to local and private concerns. Over the years, as I have said in previous debates with the Secretary of State, the country's infrastructure planning has been bedevilled by short-term horizons. The project attempts to take a longer view, and tries to solve a problem before we are completely bunged up and are compelled to do something about it. I lived in Singapore in the mid-1980s, and as we look across the world from west to east, we can see that that country had great planning horizons, and built great capacity, in excess of what was thought necessary at the time. As a result, it has a world-standard metro and a world-standard airport, which has capacity for even more flights.

Henry Miller wrote:

"Life, as it is called, is for most of us one long postponement."

To some extent, that is true of the Crossrail project. For as long as I have been in the House, the concept has been hovering, waiting to be put into practice. It has been knocked off course every now and then, particularly in 1994. One of the consequent costs is the escalation of the price that the country has to pay to make it happen. Something that began as a £2 billion project is probably now a £10 billion project, and we can comfortably predict that by the time it is completed it will be a £20 billion project.

There is no point, however, in rehearsing the passage of events over the past 15 years. Instead, we should take our text from a letter in the Financial Times yesterday that referred to our forthcoming debate. It was signed by many senior business men, including the director general of the CBI, the chairman of Citigroup and others, who urged the Government to get on with it, as it is essential for the economic growth of London and the United Kingdom. We must, as the Secretary of State largely did, look at the route, its planning and construction, as well as its interrelationship with the plans for construction projects for the 2012 Olympics. We must look at funding—the Secretary of State did not say very much about that, so we may wish to return to the subject later. We must look at the effect of the project on local interests and the intensity of local opinion along the route and among people who believe that they are affected by the knock-on effects of this massive undertaking. We must look at the interaction with other networks, and the regulatory regime, mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), that will govern it.

It is proper to put on record the scale of this huge engineering project. If it is undertaken as we expect, it will be one of the wonders of the world. I shall paraphrase the details rather than read them all out, as hon. Members will be familiar with them. There will be 46 km of massive tunnels, some of them 50 m below street level, going under huge buildings and built-up areas of London. That is an enormous engineering endeavour, the likes of which we have never seen before.

There will be safety issues. In the current security climate, the ventilation and escape shafts are a poignant detail that the Committee will want to study. We will also have to examine the interrelationship with existing railway corridors. Although the Secretary of State offered us some reassurance this afternoon, that interrelationship may pose a problem because we are trying to squeeze if not a quart into a pint pot, a great deal of activity on existing railway capacity, which will be pushed to the limit.

We are told that Crossrail will be running by 2013. I suspect that is quite an ambitious finish date. A project of such a scale may well take a decade, but it is clear that some of the other suggested schemes are not realistic, and Crossrail is currently the only one on the blocks.

I said that Crossrail would probably be at least a £10 billion project, and perhaps even more. There is an estimated shortfall in funding of about £7 billion. I would appreciate hearing more from the Minister in his winding-up speech about how that will be made up, and what sort of undertakings and guarantees will be given at the beginning of the project that the money will be available to see it through to completion. All of us can cast our mind back to the channel tunnel, a comparable infrastructure project that was always bedevilled by increased costs and insufficient funding to underpin it, such that it almost went bankrupt. We need to make sure that Crossrail is fully underpinned and can definitely go ahead.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan: Yes, of course. Always.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The hon. Gentleman is always enormously courteous and helpful. Is he suggesting that the state should underwrite the whole cost?

Mr. Duncan: I shall come in a moment to the relationship between the private sector and the state. That is extremely important, and no doubt the hon. Lady's magnificent Committee will want to look into the matter as well.

We need a clearer picture of the structure of revenues and funding. The Montague report identified five main potential sources for funding the construction of Crossrail: net travel-generated revenues, which in plain English means fares; any appropriate European Union subventions—it would be interesting to know what they might be; contributions from London businesses and/or individuals, which might be voluntary or mandatory; property revenues; and direct Exchequer support. That is quite a complex structure of financing, with a large number of elements, all of which are fairly uncertain, unless the Minister is able to reassure us at the end of today's debate. I hope that a clearer picture of funding can be forthcoming.

Mr. Pickles: Does my hon. Friend recall that the Montague review also stated that it could not confirm the delivery of the business case? Has he seen any evidence produced by the Government or any other documents to suggest that matters have moved on since Montague's statement?

Mr. Duncan: No doubt all that will be discussed fully in Committee, but any such infrastructure project will have very large costs at the beginning and will be generating revenues going for decades, if not centuries, afterwards, so the economic models are not easy to draw.

How the project will interact, in terms of both funding and construction, with the plans that are being laid in preparation for the 2012 Olympics has not been answered adequately this afternoon. I appreciate that we will have the Second Reading of the London Olympics Bill on Thursday, but it is important for the House to have a clear picture of how the two will interact and happily interrelate.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who is Chairman of the Transport Select Committee, and the House is very pleased to see her back in that job for a further term, asked about the funding. Following the demise of Railtrack, one must ask whether business men will feel like taking a risk on a project such as Crossrail with the Government as partner. Strong reassurance, and now probably even guarantees, will need to be given if people are to risk tens, if not hundreds, of millions on a project of such a scale in partnership with the Government. The question whether the partnership between the Government and private enterprise may take on an extremely sour tone is extremely serious. I hope that it is certain that that will not happen with this project.

Peter Luff: Has my hon. Friend seen the BAA submission to the Government's consultation, in which BAA expressed serious concerns about the effect on its services to Paddington during the construction phase and subsequently? The construction phase will occur at the same time as the Olympic games, a bizarre moment at which to make traffic difficult between Heathrow and Paddington.

Mr. Duncan: My hon. Friend is right to point out that the construction of Crossrail may be to the detriment of the Olympics and that it may decrease capacity between Paddington and Heathrow.

Mr. Mark Field: It is unsurprising that Government Front Benchers have not confirmed this point, but there is little doubt that Crossrail will not be constructed before the Olympic games. In my constituency, Charing Cross road will be closed for some two years during the construction phase, when the whole of central London will become a building site. Many of my constituents will welcome Crossrail after it has been constructed, but they are concerned about the impact of construction on day-to-day life. It is inconceivable that large-scale construction will take place before the 2012 Olympics.

Mr. Duncan: My hon. Friend has hit on a serious point. We have been told that the likely completion date for Crossrail is 2013—if one allows a couple of years for slippage, it is 2015—and the Olympics will take place in 2012. If the hybrid Bill process is completed in both Houses in two years' time and the Bill is enacted, will significant construction get under way before the Olympics? I hope that the Minister answers that question in his winding-up speech. [Interruption.] The Secretary of State spoke for nearly an hour, but every word was worth it, and we are grateful for his thorough approach.

I do not want to speak for much longer, because I know that today's debate is an important forum for other hon. Members to express their concerns for their individual constituencies. My right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead and her constituency neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie), are concerned about the question, "Why not Reading?", which has been answered, although not conclusively, this afternoon. My hon. Friends the Members for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), for Witney (Mr. Cameron), for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) and for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) are concerned about the knock-on effects. My hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell) is deeply concerned about the construction of the depot in his constituency, and if he succeeds in catching your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have no doubt that he will enthusiastically explain the matter in great detail.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): My hon. Friend used the analogy of squeezing a quart into a pint bottle. Will he accept that Paddington is the narrow part of the bottle? However much one speeds up the process, it is not possible to get more trains in and out of Paddington, which means that lines to the west will not be developed further. In other words, Crossrail will fossilise our rail services, which we would like to expand to allow more people to travel on the railways.

Mr. Duncan: A wag once told me that I, of all people, prove that one can squeeze a quart into a pint pot—or, perhaps, a pint into a half-pint pot.

My hon. Friend's point is valid, and the hybrid Bill process is designed to study such issues in detail. We have not seen a hybrid Bill dealing with such a project for a long time, and it will be interesting to see whether the procedure has stood the test of time and can cope with a project of this magnitude.

Before I finish, I should like to return to the relationship between Crossrail and existing networks and the regulatory regime. Many in the industry who have made representations feel that the Bill undermines the principle of independent regulation. They think that its powers could negatively affect Network Rail's ability to deliver services and that it challenges the wider principle of independent regulation, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead suggested. Taken together, clauses 21 to 26 allow the Secretary of State to override the existing processes and access rights that are designed to ensure that timetables reflect the needs of all route users. They enable the Secretary of State to instruct—not just permit, but instruct—the Office of Rail Regulation to amend existing track access agreements to give priority to Crossrail.

That appears to establish a regime not of equity but of preference, and therefore challenges the even-handed approach that the ORR is currently required to display. The existing regulatory structure allows the ORR to operate in a balanced way, taking account of the overall need of the entire rail network, but the Bill fundamentally undermines and changes the ORR's role in that respect. It will allow control of the Crossrail tracks to be taken away from Network Rail and force the ORR to give priority to Crossrail trains over those of other operators. That would give Crossrail trains exclusive access to half the track capacity on the routes between Paddington and Maidenhead and between Stratford and Shenfield, which would substantially reduce the capacity available to non-Crossrail users on those routes, force reductions in current service levels, and make future growth impossible. A serious knock-on issue of capacity and track congestion flows from the Bill.

One of the main representations that we have received, which is very strongly felt, concerns freight. The industry has expressed concern that there is a real risk that large quantities of bulk materials—including aggregates, cement, fuel oil and domestic waste—and high-value goods such as cars and manufactured products in containers will be forced from rail by Crossrail services. It is important, in trying to maintain a cross-party consensus, that the Minister should provide a good rebuttal of that suggestion if he can.

The railway industry has made every effort to advise the Secretary of State of its concerns. In reply, he said that "there are no plans to acquire permanently part of the Network Rail network for dedicated use for Crossrail services".

He also said:

"It follows that Network Rail will operate and manage services on Network Rail's network including Crossrail services."

There are none the less concerns that such powers remain in this hybrid Bill. We are concerned that the Secretary of State's words are not matched by the black and white text of the Bill; and in the end, as we have learned to our cost in many other areas of legislation, what it says in black and white matters most, because that is what courts will decide on, however honest the Secretary of State is.

I do not want to detain the House any longer because many Members want to speak. This project has been a long time a-coming. We should like to see a broad coalition of support behind it, but one that is sensitive and responsive to the local needs and concerns detailed by many right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House. Looking to the welcome award of the Olympics to Britain in 2012, we want to hear that that project will not unreasonably delay the Crossrail project. In short, I say to the Government that they should get on with this if they mean it, but if they do not, they should not raise false hopes and lead everyone a merry dance. We should like it to happen; let us make it happen.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): I speak as the chair of the all-party Crossrail group and I begin by paying tribute to Linda Perham, who established it in the previous Parliament. Without the group, perhaps we would not be considering Second Reading at this time.

As chair of the all-party group, I emphasise that it consists not only of hon. Members of all parties but of people with very different views. Members of the group will raise some concerns and criticisms in the debate because we are all committed to improving transport across London and to the national benefits and implications of that. However, we also acknowledge that we have constituency and local interests, which must be taken into account.

I want to comment on my constituency because Ilford is one of the areas that will benefit greatly from Crossrail. Ilford station is between Stratford and Shenfield and my constituency also contains the stations of Seven Kings and Goodmayes. Chadwell Heath is at the edge of my constituency, although the station is in the neighbouring constituency. The platforms in those stations will need to be extended, which will involve considerable reconstructive engineering work, the removal of waste, many vehicles and possible disruption to the lives of many of my constituents.

I am unique, in that I am the only Member on Crossrail's designated route who will have a loop in the constituency. That means the possibility of freight and passenger trains being able to pass each other. That, too, will involve considerable work, including the construction of a line close to the back gardens of many of my constituents. I want to place that on record because, when we discuss practicalities and implications, it is possible that the lives of many people will be disrupted in the short term for the greater good.

If the Bill is successfully piloted through Parliament and gets on to the statute book, and construction work begins in 2007, 2008 or 2009 in my constituency and others, it will have an impact on many people. There are concerns about adequate shielding from noise and construction work, the times of day when the work will be undertaken, shielding from lighting to prevent people from being woken up or kept awake at all hours and the times when vehicles move materials backwards and forwards. All those matters will have an impact. Many other hon. Members will have similar worries when work is carried out in their constituencies. I therefore hope that the Committee can take those matters into account when it receives the many petitions and submissions that will doubtless arrive in the next few weeks.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady should not turn her back to the Chair. All remarks are to the Chair.

Meg Hillier: My apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall not make that mistake again.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend has referred to benefits for London. I hope that he agrees that constituents will gain in many parts of London, especially Hackney, where people will benefit from the clearing of the Liverpool Street throat. That will mean faster trains from Enfield and Chingford to that area. That is a great spin-off from Crossrail.

Mike Gapes: Yes, of course. After detailing my constituency's interests, I intended to explain that, despite the disruption that many constituents face, there will be enormous benefits.

In east London, there is a problem with overcrowding on the Central line. I was on a train that was going into Liverpool Street station this morning, before I transferred to the Jubilee line at Stratford, where I can be guaranteed to get a seat. I certainly could not get one when I squeezed myself into a crowded carriage at Ilford station at about 7.30 this morning. That also applies at 8.30 and at 9.30; there is always pressure on that line into Liverpool Street.

One of the consequences of Crossrail will be to increase capacity. It will also mean that people do not have to get out of the trains from Shenfield at Liverpool Street; they will be able to go beyond it and across London. They will no longer have to decant themselves on to the Central line, the District line or the Jubilee line, or perhaps go round the Metropolitan line to get on to the Northern line. There will be fantastic improvements. Crossrail will cut travel times across our city and reduce stress and disruption for many people.

Mr. Lee Scott (Ilford, North) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that Crossrail will increase not only capacity but the regeneration of the London borough of Redbridge, in which both our constituencies are situated? The impact on the areas surrounding us must also be considered, as we have heard from other hon. Members.

Mike Gapes: I agree with my neighbour. He and I have a big interest—he is still a member of the borough council, and I am a constituency MP—in the regeneration of Ilford station. That station is linked to the regeneration proposed in the progressive Ilford plan, which the council is introducing on a cross-party basis. Crossrail will give us the opportunity to reposition the station entrance, to remodel the road system around the station, and to regenerate the centre of my constituency, which it greatly needs. Such spin-off benefits will occur not only in my constituency but elsewhere as a result of Crossrail.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): The hon. Gentleman has noted that stations along the route will enjoy platform lengthening. Has he noticed, however, that not all of them will benefit from access for the disabled? Does he agree that this is a golden opportunity, with large sums of money being spent on refurbishing stations, and that disabled access should always be included; otherwise we shall be spoiling the ship for a ha'p'orth of tar?

Mike Gapes: I entirely agree, and I hope that that matter can be addressed as we consider the later stages of the Bill.

I have referred to the underground system. The other important benefit will be the links to the docklands light railway, the East London line and other routes that come into and across the city. The Secretary of State said that Crossrail had to form part of an integrated national network. That relates not only to the lines that come in from hundreds of miles away but to those in the greater south-east region, with its many millions of people who need to cross our capital city either for work, leisure or other reasons. Crossrail will at last give us the opportunity to create sensible, integrated cross-London routing and connections, which we would not otherwise have.

Those of us who are proud to have been born in this capital city, and to represent it in the House, know that it is important that the rest of the country should be behind these developments, just as it is behind the great achievement of winning the Olympics for London. Crossrail will provide people from all of the UK with the ability to travel more easily across our capital city. It will provide an integrated link between different parts of the country.

Crossrail represents an historic opportunity—an opportunity that we missed a decade ago. When I first came into this place in 1992, I remember asking Steve Norris questions about it. Later, my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Glenda Jackson) dealt with the matter, followed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Warley (Mr. Spellar). Still later, it was the responsibility of the present Secretary of State for Defence, whose constituency name has changed but who, at the time, represented Motherwell. All kinds of Ministers have passed through during that period, and we had the frustration of not seeing the Bill introduced until right at the end of the previous Parliament. At last, we have a historic opportunity, which, as a country, we cannot afford to miss. This country needs Crossrail, London needs it, and millions of people will benefit from using it once it is built. I am therefore positive that we must go ahead.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): I can see the hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm for Crossrail and I will certainly be among its supporters. He is also an enthusiast for the London Olympics, however, and given that, for instance, Newham is just emerging from disruptive construction work, what kind of disruption will there be in 2012 if we expect Crossrail to open in around 2013?

Mike Gapes: Clearly, there must be co-ordination. In relation to Pudding Mill lane station and other works, which are to be used both for the Olympics and Crossrail, planning of the engineering work will be necessary. Such issues need to be discussed before that work starts, and clearly, phasing is required. I am not an engineer or an expert, but I am sure that those who are experts can find ways of doing it. Obviously, it is vital that we have a successful Olympics, and that we have Crossrail built and running as soon as possible afterwards. We all need to recognise the realities and the practical issues, but I am sure that it is not beyond the wit of men and women to find a solution.

Andrew Rosindell: I admire the hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm for the whole Crossrail scheme. He understands that the huge depot will be located in Romford. Would he be equally enthusiastic were it to be located in Ilford?

Mike Gapes: Regrettably, most of the land in my constituency seems to have been built on for housing and high-rise flats. I am not sure that we have a location as suitable as that in Romford. I hope, however, that discussions can take place about making sure that brownfield sites are used and that the needs of the community are taken into account. I am sure that the issue will be resolved in due course to the benefit of all of us in London, not least the hon. Gentleman's constituents.

I have detained the House for long enough, and I want to allow other Members to speak. Crossrail is supported by a spectrum of organisations in London, by employees, trade unions, community organisations and commuters, and by a wide spectrum of interests of all kinds. Let us unite and make sure that it becomes a reality.

5.38 pm

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): The start of this debate was perhaps a little more muddled than I had anticipated, and I welcome the clarity that the Secretary of State brought.

As hon. Members know, we have been waiting for this Bill for a long time. Speaking as a commuter in London for the past 25 years, commuting has been the best of times and the worst of times. The emotions that commuters experience range from relief when everything runs smoothly to frustration and, at the tail end, to exasperation when their train sits outside a station for 10 or 15 minutes without explanation.

London's commuters and businesses want and have been desperate for Crossrail. Importantly, it is not an upgrade, an extension to an existing system or a tweak to an existing line. It is new capacity, which we need, and a new influx of spaces for London, which continues to grow, and the economy of which continues to grow. Crossrail also provides the necessary proof that we are not prepared simply to rest on the laurels of our Victorian forefathers for another century.

Crossrail is not without its critics, who come in all shapes and sizes. They include community groups that will be directly affected and, perhaps more surprisingly, Network Rail and many other players in the rail industry. I shall say more about that shortly, but first I shall focus on four main subjects: responses to the Crossrail Bill environmental statement, the rail industry's fears about the impact on freight and passenger services, the impact on the Olympics, and Crossrail's funding.

The responses to the environmental statement may be the best indicator of what local communities will think of the Bill. A range of issues were raised and it is difficult to say which are the most important, but I shall list just a few: availability of the statement, alternative alignments for the central tunnel, alternative schemes, construction working hours, noise and pollution, location of spoils, spoil mountains, and locations of shafts and work site. One of the most significant issues, however, was whether the proposals complied with the relevant European Union directives. I know that the Government took on board concerns about the process by extending the time frame and making information more readily available, but I hope the Minister will confirm that he is satisfied that the statement complies with those directives in all respects.

Many responses questioned the availability of evidence that alternative alignments had been considered. That applied to alternative alignments through Spitalfields and Whitechapel. There was also concern about proposed sites such as the one at Hanbury street, which I know also concerns some Members, and about the disposal of spoil at Mile End. I am sure that many if not all Members have been lobbied about alternative schemes by organisations such as Superlink, and I shall say more about that as well. The environmental statement acknowledges the requirement for an outline of the main alternatives studied by the applicant or appellant, but many respondents assert that it has not been met.

The Bill has months, if not years, of work behind it. There is little evidence to suggest that Superlink has devoted the same effort, time and expenditure to its proposals: indeed, it is clear that it has not done so. It has, however, raised issues with which I hope the Minister will deal in a way that addresses my concerns and those felt, I suspect, by other Members. One of the main issues is funding. I appreciate that this is a hybrid Bill and that we are not here to discuss funding, but it must be a source of anxiety, given the scale of the project and the fact that so little is known about how it will be financed.

Mrs. Dunwoody: May I put to the hon. Gentleman the simple question that I put to the Conservative spokesman? Is he in favour of the whole of the scheme being underwritten by the state?

Tom Brake: I am happy to respond to that. The honest answer has to be no. A range of funding mechanisms are available to the Government. We know that discussions have taken place about increasing the business rate for businesses of a certain size for a restricted period. I had hoped that that would have been highlighted earlier when the Secretary of State opened the debate, but perhaps the Minister will comment when he replies.

The funding issues are made more significant as a result of our successful bid for the Olympic games. To a certain degree, if not a great degree, there may be some competition for accessing available funds. The Superlink proposal challenges the Crossrail proposal in respect of regional links and making better use of services, drawing in commuters from further afield.

Mike Gapes: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the all-party group had discussions with Superlink earlier this week. I have to say that, personally, I was not at all convinced of the viability of its proposals. Questions are raised about the reliability of a system that is so dependent on existing operators and existing lines. Another problem is that Superlink has not actually published a route, so I do not know whether it proposes to tunnel under my high street or under my main station.

Tom Brake: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that helpful intervention. As I said a few moments ago, the Superlink proposal is much less developed than the Crossrail proposal, but it nevertheless raises some interesting questions, to which it would be appropriate for the Minister to respond.

Mr. Pickles: It is not a question of Superlink failing to develop its proposal. It has a route: it is simply not prepared to tell the public what that route is.

Tom Brake: If Superlink indeed has a secret plan, as the hon. Gentleman suggests, it would be entirely appropriate for it to be made a matter of public record. We must be able to see what the proposals amount to and what the proposed route is. It would be entirely honest to proceed in that way.

Peter Luff: I am going to rise to the defence of Superlink. It does not have the resources of the main Crossrail promoters. It is a David and Goliath situation and, on this occasion, David is right and Goliath is wrong. It is difficult for Superlink to improve its proposals with the resources that it has at its disposal.

Tom Brake: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. Clearly, we have to consider what is in the public domain, and we have a large body of evidence from Crossrail and a much smaller body of evidence from Superlink. The general feeling is, quite rightly, that we should proceed with the Crossrail scheme before us.

Other issues raised in response to the environmental statement were working hours and noise. I hope that the Minister will comment briefly on them, particularly if, as some respondents claim, the noise levels will seriously breach World Health Organisation limits. I believe that I have covered the main points that emerged from the environmental statement.

I want to move on to the helpful briefing from the industry, which many Members have received. It is worth highlighting the main organisations that contributed to it—freight operators, Network Rail, BAA and the Rail Freight Group. If I have any concern about the Crossrail Bill, it is that it has succeeded in uniting all those different groups in expressing such serious reservations about it. The briefing highlights the fact that more than 500,000 people travel on services provided by Great Western and Heathrow Express, while more than 200 freight trains use the rail corridors.

The industry's view, with which I am sure all Members agree, is that Crossrail should be integrated in, and operated as part of, the national network—the Secretary of State gave some reassurance on that point—and that it should be subject to the existing regulatory framework and managed by Network Rail within the existing operational structure. It believes that amendments will be required to recognise the rights of existing rail users, to ensure that there is sufficient capacity for existing and future rail users and to safeguard the independence of the Office of Rail Regulation. I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure us that no such amendments will be required, as the Government already intend those points to be covered by the development of the Bill.The industry has specific concerns about the Bill's impact. There will be a new-build project, similar to the channel tunnel rail link, and a major construction project around existing rail services. The Minister will not be surprised that the industry's solution involves Network Rail taking responsibility for changes to the existing infrastructure, although the new-build could be handled separately. There are great concerns about fragmentation, a theme that has run through many contributions, although to give him his due, the Secretary of State has partly addressed them. As the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) said, the industry has concerns about the operation of Crossrail and its integration with the existing network. I hope the Minister will be able to satisfy the House that those concerns are over-stated.

I have a few further points. A huge amount of work will be required for the Olympics. I understand that the Olympic team, the Crossrail team, Transport for London and the Mayor's office are all working closely together to ensure that there is proper integration and that the major works for Crossrail are not undertaken precisely when we need the transport network running smoothly in London. However, there is concern that the Crossrail Bill and the London Olympics Bill take different approaches to the Office of Rail Regulation.

Clause 22 of the Crossrail Bill states that the ORR has an "overriding duty" to facilitate the operation of Crossrail to a specific date, whereas the London Olympics Bill requires the ORR only to "exercise the functions assigned or transferred to it . . . in a manner which will facilitate the provision, management and control of facilities for transport in connection with the London Olympics".

Those seem to be different priorities, so I hope the Minister will address that point.

The longest part of my speech should have dealt with how the scheme will be funded, but there is little to say on that significant point. We know that on 26 June Goldman Sachs and Lexicon—apparently, a corporate finance boutique, although I am not sure that we need a boutique to take charge of the matter—have been selected to advise the Government on the funding of Crossrail. An article on the subject states that the funding structure will be complicated,

"with the possibility of a special London business rate being levied to help finance it".

Angela Watkinson: The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the great concerns of small and medium enterprises about a possible levy of 1.5 or even 3 per cent. on business rates. Does he agree with their proposal that the levy should be proportionate to the likely benefit to them?

Tom Brake: That is an interesting point, although I am not sure how easy it would be to establish the benefits that businesses might or might not derive. We certainly need an indication of the level at which the levy will apply. How large will a business have to be before it has to contribute? Regrettably, little is said about funding.

The Bill is welcome and long overdue. It has the potential to transform an unexceptional public transport system in London into a world-beating one. However, there is consensus among Opposition parties and other partners that the measure will require detailed scrutiny and that its remit must be allowed to extend to issues such as integration. Taxpayers, especially London-based taxpayers, whether business or private, will be paying for the project for many years to come. London has already had one millennium dome inflicted on it; it cannot afford another. Nor can it afford a 15-mile stretch of tunnel that improves services for London's commuters at the expense of the rest of the country.

The Bill is embarking on what promises to be an epic parliamentary journey—a bit of a rollercoaster. We must ensure that it arrives at its destination improved and able to deliver a greatly enhanced transport system for Londoners and other commuters alike. If we do not do so, it could suffer the same fate as its predecessor 15 years ago and be stifled at birth.

5.56 pm

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab): I start by drawing attention to an interest that I have declared in the Register of Members' Interests, as deputy chairman of the Construction Industry Council.

I am pleased to support the Second Reading of the Bill, which is hugely important to the future of transport in London. Transport is widely recognised as London's Achilles heel. It regularly features as one of the downsides of life in what is otherwise recognised as one of the most vibrant and successful cities in the world.

The problem of poor transport in London reflects continuing failure over much of the second half of the last century to invest adequately in transport infrastructure. As the Secretary of State rightly reflected in his speech, there must be severe worries about London's future economic success if that inheritance of under-investment in transport is not made good. That is one of the key factors that we should bear in mind.

Where new investment in public transport has been made, notably the Jubilee line, it has proved resoundingly successful in opening up formerly depressed and disadvantaged parts of London and easing congestion on existing transport links. Developments in areas such as Southwark, Canary Wharf, north Greenwich, Canning Town and Stratford have all been enormously helped by the new Jubilee line. Crossrail has similar potential to ease congestion in central London and to support new development and regeneration, not least in the Thames Gateway area, which will be served by two links from Liverpool Street, one north of the river to Shenfield, the other passing through docklands south of the river to Abbey Wood.

The scheme is not a new one. As we all know, it was first proposed in 1989, about 16 years ago, and progress has been painfully slow. Why is that? We all know that it is because of the cost. The scheme is highly expensive, depending on two new tunnels bored through central London—major engineering works that have been conventionally costed at about £10 billion, but as the Secretary of State commented, the likely out-turn figures may be between £15 billion and £16 billion. That inevitably poses important and difficult questions about how the costs should be met, and specifically what the balance should be in the contributions respectively of the fare-paying users of the service, the general taxpayer and the business interests that stand to gain, some very significantly, from the project.

The scope for substantial increases in values of property and of development sites adjoining and surrounding stations is increasingly understood. How best to recover a proportion of that planning gain is less well understood. In my view, it is essential for us to look carefully at this, in respect of Crossrail and other new rail and infrastructure developments, because I believe that this holds the key to making possible development that might otherwise not be regarded as economic.

What is not, in my view, sustainable is the defeatist notion that because of the scheme's high cost, further delay is inevitable or even desirable. We have already seen too long a delay in bringing forward the Crossrail scheme. Further cost-driven delay would be not just a mistake but counterproductive, as the ultimate costs of delivering an essential element for the resolution of London's transport problems would be even higher.

A similar mistake to which, unfortunately, the scheme has already been subject, is the false economy of eliminating necessary and desirable elements so as to reduce the cost. That has occurred with the Woolwich station, which was an integral part of the earlier proposals, but which has been deleted from the current scheme—albeit with the site of the station still safeguarded—purely for cost-saving reasons. If ever there was an illustration of the penny wise, pound foolish mentality, this is it.

Woolwich is a major transport hub for a significant area of south-east London and is the focus of ambitious regeneration plans. Badly hit by the recessions of the 1980s and early 1990s and the decline of the traditional heavy industry that was the source of Woolwich's prosperity in the 19th and 20th centuries, it is at last beginning to see revival, with successful regeneration of the former Woolwich arsenal site. That incipient recovery would be given a huge boost by a new station involving rapid transport links to central and west London. The regeneration benefits of a Crossrail station at Woolwich are enormous.

Not only would that opportunity be lost if the scheme progressed without a station at Woolwich, but there would be very serious transport disadvantages. There would be literally no stations over a six-mile section of the railway between Custom House and Abbey Wood. Furthermore, potential passengers from a wide swathe of south-east London would have no easy point of access to Crossrail. The only south-east London station would be Abbey Wood, which is not well placed to meet the needs of travellers from much of the Greenwich and Lewisham areas, and does not have the benefit of being a major transport hub, as is a Woolwich.

Supporters of Crossrail in south-east London to whom I have spoken in recent months are almost unanimous in recognising the very substantial transport and regeneration benefits of a Woolwich station. Most are astonished at the proposal that the trains should pass underneath Woolwich without stopping, when there is a very suitable location for a station already safeguarded.

Those of us who represent the London borough of Greenwich are sadly familiar with short-sighted thinking of that nature on previous infrastructure projects. The original Jubilee line proposal did not include a station at North Greenwich. Without it, the regeneration of the former British Gas site, derelict and heavily polluted, would never have taken place, with 12,500 new homes now being built on that site—a major contribution to the Thames Gateway—and the millennium dome. Whatever people feel about the millennium dome—I think particularly of the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake), who made a predictably negative comment, probably not thinking about it—this project has had a huge impact on the regeneration of formerly derelict and abandoned industrial land, and the dome will provide a magnificent site for the gymnastics in the Olympic games in London in 2012. None of that would have happened if there had not been a station at North Greenwich. Fortunately, common sense prevailed. The North Greenwich station was built and it has been not just a catalyst for regeneration, but is proving to be a thriving transport hub.

A few years later we went through an eerily similar process with the docklands light railway extension to Greenwich and Lewisham. Believe it or not, one of the cost-cutting proposals before that scheme got the go-ahead was to eliminate the station at Cutty Sark, one of London's most popular tourist destinations. Once again, our community in Greenwich had to run a high-profile campaign to reverse that false economy. Fortunately, we won. Cutty Sark station is now one of the most heavily used on the DLR network and the very idea of DLR trains passing underneath that site but not stopping is self-evidently ludicrous.

I must question the sense of the Department for Transport in once again proposing to eliminate a very significant station in the borough of Greenwich as a cost-cutting measure. Conspiracy theorists—I am not one—might suspect a vendetta against our part of London. I prefer to attribute this to a cock-up rather than to a conspiracy. That is why I tabled an amendment instructing the Select Committee to have regard to the benefit of a station in Woolwich and its economic, transport and regeneration implications. I was surprised and a little disappointed to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State express a rather negative view of that amendment. I can see no possible reason why the Select Committee should not consider the merits of a station at Woolwich and I do hope that when the Under-Secretary winds up he will make it clear that it is reasonable and proper for the Select Committee to consider this proposal as part of its consideration of the Bill.

I shall briefly raise two points before concluding. The issue of conflict with freight and other users of the railway has been raised by a number of hon. Members, not least the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan). It is a very important issue and we have a specific concern about south-east London. A very large aggregates depot, which serves the Thames Gateway area and is likely to be a major source of aggregates for the Olympics and Crossrail as well as the Thames Gateway development, is sited in my constituency near the Angerstein junction. It includes a freight link for very large quantities of aggregate brought in from the midlands by aggregate industries. Representatives of those industries have written to me, rightly expressing concern that their business could be affected by the proposals. It is not just a question of potential conflict for access to the track; there are also implications if reduced access were to lead to increased track access charges, which could make the rail transport of aggregates non-economic, in which case there would be a very substantial transfer of aggregate from rail to road, with huge environmental implications. Those issues need to be looked at very carefully indeed.

Tom Brake: A rail freight statement published today says that the Government will work with the freight industry to understand its needs when setting the strategy for the rail network. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would like to ask the Minister to elaborate on how that is working in relation to Crossrail.

Mr. Raynsford: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman regretted not having asked that question in his speech and is now trying to get me to do his work. I have no doubt that my right hon. and hon. Friends will want to look very closely at the issues of access to the total railway, to ensure that there is the continued opportunity—the importance of which I have emphasised—of freight access to carry aggregates into one of the biggest development sites in the south of England, without that being frustrated by access problems to the track and an unwelcome transfer of aggregate from rail to road.

Finally, I shall say a few words about the timetable for the Crossrail works and the interface, in more senses than one, with the London Olympic games. Two major infrastructure projects on that scale will undoubtedly put pressure on the capacity of the construction industry. There are implications for prices, skills and general capacity issues. There are also conflicts relating to one or more sites where works would need to be undertaken for both Crossrail and the Olympics. Those difficulties will need to be carefully addressed, but I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench will not allow these challenges to be used as an excuse for further substantial delay in the Crossrail project.

In last week's issue of New Civil Engineer, the former chief executive of Cross London Rail Links Ltd., Norman Haste, is quoted as calling for a debate on whether construction of Crossrail should be delayed until after the Olympics. I put it to my right hon. and hon. Friends that while it is absolutely right that the implications for the timetabling of these two massively important schemes must be considered carefully and must be effectively co-ordinated, it would imply a serious loss of nerve and confidence if Crossrail, which has already been 16 years in gestation, were to be kicked into touch for a further seven.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will be able to give the House some reassurance on those issues tonight, as well as the reassurance that I sought earlier on the Woolwich station. With those caveats, I am happy to support Second Reading.

6.9 pm

Mr. George Galloway (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Respect): Owing to my special relationship with the Labour Whips earlier in my parliamentary life, I served in quick succession on the Committees that considered the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill and then the King's Cross Railways Bill, which was the longest running railway Bill since Isambard Kingdom Brunel. When I stepped off those great sets of parliamentary proceedings, it was my intention never to return to vast infrastructural projects again, but my detour to east London at the last general election places me slap bang in the middle—indeed, the epicentre—of the controversy that these proposals will cause, for my constituency is more seriously affected than any other.

The House is full of Members this evening who support Crossrail as the rope supports the hanging man. I want to say, quite bluntly, that I just want to hang it. I am against it and will vote against it this evening for reasons that I hope to make clear—reasons such as those adduced by the secretary of the Woodseer and Hanbury residents association in my constituency, who wrote:

> "Crossrail is a project that will never pay for itself. The 2002 estimate of £15 billion is likely to cost £20 billion by the time it is built, especially if it is delayed until after the Olympic games—the cost of 40 new hospitals or more than 400 new schools".

Of course, the cost could be very much greater than £20 billion.

Crossrail is a five-day commuter service that will primarily benefit the City, but cause unnecessary harm to London's communities from the east end to Mayfair. The country, particularly London, will subsidise a suburban railway for ever, and the residents and small businesses of my constituency will pay the greatest price for a service designed to connect Canary Wharf to Heathrow airport.

MPs are being asked to vote for the Bill even though the finances for the Crossrail scheme are not even being presented to Parliament. There can be no other country in the world that would seriously pass a Bill in its Parliament for a project that might cost £20 billion or more with the derisory amount of time that the Bill has been given by the Government this evening devoted to the issue of who will pay for it. I suspect that the public will end up underwriting a very considerable amount of the cost.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats, mentioned the millennium dome. In fact, this project might turn out to be 20, 25 or 30 millennium domes. Notwithstanding the enthusiasm of the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) for the millennium dome, which he says will be a wonderful gymnastics hall for a couple of weeks in a few years' time, it will end up, of course, as the most expensive publicly funded super-casino in world history.

If taxpayers pay for the railway for the next 30 years, sacrificing other projects, it should have the highest environmental and health impact standards and should not openly violate human rights. Crossrail has not properly considered the risk to human safety. It has failed to adopt the multi-modal approach originally demanded by the then Minister of State. That brings me to the point that I made in our preliminary debate, on which I hope that the Minister will now be able to advise the House.

At 12 o'clock today, there was still not tabled in the papers for these proceedings the very serious matter of a barrister's legal opinion that Members are being asked to vote for something that is illegal. I refer to the paper submitted by Bindman and Partners. I shall read from the letter that the WHRA sent to the Bill team:

"We have noted a serious omission in the tabled papers as part of the Government's responses. It does not include a letter from ... Bindmans ... You may be aware that the letter raises serious legal matters in relation to the Crossrail Bill ... Please could you provide reasons for the omission of the letter from tabled papers as this prevents MPs from considering serious issues about procedure and compliance with the EIA and human rights obligations."

I am ready to allow the Minister to intervene now if he is able, as he promised, to indicate why those papers are not among those tabled for these proceedings today. I see that he intends to remain sedentary—so perhaps later we will be informed of why that information, which goes right to the heart of the judicial review that will inevitably occur, is not before Members today, even though it should be.

I am conscious of the fact that many Members want to speak, but if time permitted me, I would demonstrate in detail that there is no doubt that Crossrail has not produced systematic comparisons of alternatives, which it is obliged by law to do. It is legally required to consider alternatives, to supply information requested by the public and to allow them an opportunity to comment to ensure compliance with the environmental impact assessment directive and human rights provisions.

Crossrail appears not to have considered any alternative route alignments between Liverpool Street and Canary Wharf. Crossrail has not considered any option without Whitechapel station. The hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) misstated the position among my electorate. For the avoidance of doubt, let me make it clear that we do not want a station at Whitechapel. In so far as there will be a station at Whitechapel, it will cost about £200 million, forcing cost-cutting measures elsewhere in the project, which will impact on the placing of the tunnelling and other engineering work that is required.

Let me volunteer something to the Minister: he should drop the Whitechapel station from the proposals. We do not need the Whitechapel station. Whitechapel has a perfectly adequate underground station at the moment. Moreover, it will be substantially overhauled by London Underground by 2009—an overhaul that would almost certainly be delayed if the Bill is passed and if a Crossrail station is built at Whitechapel.

A Whitechapel station will be a disbenefit to us, not only for the reason that I have stated, but for another reason, which is a source of great anger on this subject in my constituency. A vast number of people commute into the Tower Hamlets to work and then commute out again. There are huge areas adjacent to Tower Hamlets where local people cannot get a job. There are great citadels of wealth in Canary Wharf and the City of London, with hardly a local person working in them. In the City of London, where tens of thousands of people work, there are only 88 Bangladeshis working in white collar jobs. Less than 10 per cent. of the people who work in Canary Wharf come from Tower Hamlets, and no one is able to give us a demographic breakdown of that 10 per cent. We already have a problem with local people not being able to get jobs in the area, and a Crossrail station at Whitechapel will merely make that problem worse.

We understand from evidence that the six sites in Spitalfields were considered without environmental data and without proper consultation, contrary to article 1.5 of the EIA directive. Crossrail has failed to justify interference with the property rights of residents or shown any proper consideration of alternative alignments, contrary to human rights provisions. As the benchmark route and the location of work sites in Spitalfields is likely to cause significant harm, we ask the Minister—this was asked of him on 27 June in questions that were handed to him, and I hope that he will answer some of them soon—how will Crossrail remedy that error? Why were alternatives, such as tunnelling from both ends, not produced until after the deposit of the Bill and the production of the environmental statement?

I say from my great experience, to which I referred earlier, that there is no engineering reason why the tunnel cannot be dug from both ends. The only reason is financial, because Crossrail wants to save the money that it would cost to dig from both ends. In that case, I demand a cost-benefit analysis, because that what Crossrail will save by digging from only one end will be paid for overwhelmingly by my constituents through damage to their businesses, their property rights, their environment, their health, and in many other ways. The possibility of tunnelling from the ends instead of going through Spitalfields was produced after the environmental statement and after it was demanded by residents, who are not engineers. We want to know why alternatives were not considered and compared before the benchmark alignments were chosen, because those alignments will undoubtedly form the basis for any subsequent discussion and will be difficult to move.

There are many other questions on the list of, I think, 20 that were given to the Minister, but I do not have time to adduce them all this evening. I hope that he will seriously consider them, however, because my overarching point is that Crossrail will absolutely devastate my constituency. It will have three major tunnelling sites, yet it is the only part of the whole route said that will be affected in that way. The reasons behind that are financially driven—they are not driven by any other consideration.

For those who are not familiar with Spitalfields Banglatown, which is the area that we are talking about, it has one of the densest populations in the capital. They are overwhelmingly poor people, a substantial proportion of whom are from the ethnic minorities and so will be disproportionately affected by the proposals. Some 60 per cent. of the population of Spitalfields Banglatown are of Bangladeshi origin. A growing and visible Somali minority lives in the area and there is a small indigenous white community. There is also a new group of young, upwardly mobile professionals in the area, who moved there precisely because it was the area that it was, but for six or seven long years it will be a ground zero.

I hope that I can convey to hon. Members the impact that Crossrail will have. It will be like a major bombing raid on the east end. There will be three major tunnelling sites and a 2 m wide conveyor belt will operate 24 hours a day, seven days a week, for six years to carry spoil from the digging of those sites. It will go past people's houses—inches from their windows in some cases, and feet away in others. Ten-tonne lorries will come and go through this small, densely populated, poor, disadvantaged and multiply deprived area at the rate of one every five minutes, with consequent dangers for children at local schools and the health of local people—and male life expectancy in that part of London is already 6 per cent. less than that throughout London as a whole. Higher than average incidences of asthma, diabetes, blood pressure and other health problems are already present in this multiply deprived community, yet we are going to make a ground zero right in the middle of it that will devastate the community for years—day and night, 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

I will tell you my suspicion, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as someone who has been the Member of Parliament for the constituency for only a few weeks. I suspect that the Government are doing this to our community because they would not dare do it to another community. They are doing to the east end what they would not dare do to the west end because they would not get away with it in the west end. The political representatives in the west end would raise such a hue and cry that it would be politically impossible to do such a thing. The highly educated and articulate people who know the way to lobby on such things would ensure that such action would not be taken.

Our area was chosen because it was, politically speaking, a pushover. Until we dragged the local council into the fray with our political campaign, it was fully in favour of the Crossrail scheme. Until we dragged the then Member of Parliament into the fray due to our pressure, she was fully in favour of Crossrail. When they did enter the fray, they did so half-heartedly. Indeed, Tower Hamlets council is the origin of the reason for the station at Whitechapel, which, as I have already stated, we do not want because it will be a disbenefit to us, add to the cost and force certain engineering decisions upon us that will be disadvantageous. The council and the former Member of Parliament were not ready to stand up for local residents, which was why the Government chose this area, of all the areas, to be subjected to the demolition—the ground zero—that they intend to visit, if they get away with it, on the multiply deprived people of my constituency.

I do not want to leave the issue of the racial character of the community because it is important. Banglatown is a national treasure. It is an international tourist destination. In looking from around the world at London as a tourist destination, one of the things that people look at is Banglatown. I know very well, because I live just off Brick lane, that people come from all over the world, all over London and all over Britain to see the community, its restaurants, shops and mosques, and all the other things that make Banglatown the national and international treasure that it is.

The Minister is a fair-minded man, so I hope that he will accept my invitation to come and meet the communities. Today, I met residents associations, the Brick lane business association, the ethnic minority enterprise project, the Banglatown restaurant association, the Bangladesh welfare association and the Chicksand residents association. Chicksand is one of the poorest estates in Britain, in an area in which some of the poorest people in Britain live, yet it will be at the epicentre of the epicentre. People will not be able to move on the Chicksand estate for 10-tonne trucks—with their spoil flying in the wind, no doubt—for six long years, day and night, seven days a week.

Well, things have changed. There is now a new political power in the area that is represented by my election victory. I tell the House that we intend to make this matter a major election issue in the run-up to the local council elections next May. We hope—we intend—to be the administration in Tower Hamlets council just 10 months from now. If we are, Tower Hamlets council will no longer be a pushover.

I promise the Minister that if we win control of Tower Hamlets council, it will use every means at its disposal, and all its resources, to try to stop such devastation being visited on local people, so he should factor that into his consideration. He should also factor into his consideration the fact that he is no longer dealing with a Member of Parliament who is a pushover. Many groups are already preparing for peaceful, non-violent, civil disobedience to try to throw a spanner in the works, so all told, it would be better to give us a wide berth. We do not want the station. Give us a wide berth and go around us. Go along the river or go somewhere else. We do not want Crossrail. We are prepared to fight it and we will make it a very politically costly matter for the Government if they proceed along the route that they currently intend to follow.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): May I reinforce the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Mr. Galloway) that it would be useful—in fact, invaluable—to have the Bindmans papers before us? It is the duty of the House to have them circulated this evening.

I support the Bill because I take the view that the London transport system is in urgent need of expansion. I speak as chair of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers parliamentary group and I shall also talk about constituency matters.

Last year, almost 1 billion journeys were made on the London underground and, in the 10 years since 1994–95, there has been a 40 per cent. increase in mainline rail travel between London and the south-east and a 22 per cent. increase in mainline rail journeys in London itself. Our population as a city is predicted to grow by 700,000 by 2016, which will increase the demands on our rail infrastructure. During the gestation of Crossrail from the first Bill to this, my constituency has seen the development of Heathrow airport, with a fourth and now a fifth terminal. As a result of lack of investment in public transport, journeys by car, lorry and other vehicles to that airport are making my constituency the most air polluted in the country.

Concerns about the timing of the construction of Crossrail have been mentioned. It is disappointing that we cannot plan major projects such as the London Olympics and Crossrail to coincide. However, I wholeheartedly welcome some parts of the Bill. Clause 34, for example, disapplies the prohibition in section 25 of the Railways Act 1993 on public sector operators providing passenger services. That is a major commitment to public service operation. One might even describe it as an advance for democratic socialism, but I do not want to go too far.

There are a number of concerns about the Bill, such as network control. When we debated the Railways Bill earlier this year, we identified unnecessary fragmentation and lack of clear lines of accountability and control as the worst features of the privatisation of rail. The Railways Act 2005 therefore gave Network Rail additional responsibilities for railway infrastructure. That was reinforced in the Warwick agreement between the Labour party and the trade unions, which clearly stated that Network Rail was to oversee all rail engineering work. I would welcome ministerial confirmation that Network Rail will have responsibility for the oversight of maintenance and renewals on Crossrail.

Concern has been expressed about freight and it is important that we ensure that Crossrail will bring environmental benefits. We are therefore looking for assurances that freight currently moved by rail on the great eastern and great western main lines is not put in jeopardy. Crossrail could temporarily cut off a number of freight terminals on both those lines and lead to the closure of the rail-connected concrete plant in Royal Oak. It would be useful to have a ministerial assurance that freight currently moved by rail will not lose out because of the Crossrail project.

Mention has been made of the costs of the project. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow that, given that the legislation will make such a hefty requirement of the public sector should costs fall on it, it is extraordinary that the Bill does not identify where funding will come from. I suggest that the rail proposal will significantly benefit London's business community and that the project therefore provides the Government with an excellent opportunity to explore some innovative ways of meeting the Crossrail costs from the private sector. The very principle that those who benefit should contribute to the cost of the scheme should be in the legislation.

Asking businesses to pay their fair share towards transport projects is already the norm in countries from France to the United States of America. Research published in June 2004 on behalf of the passenger transport executive showed, for example, that the city of Lyons can raise more than £100 million a year from a dedicated payroll tax that can be levied on all firms, both public and private, at up to 1.75 per cent. of the company payroll. Lyons has a population of about 1.4 million; by comparison, London's population is in excess of 7 million. A payroll tax levied at, say, 1.63 per cent. would raise more than £500 million a year. Over five years that would amount to £2.5 billion towards the cost of the Crossrail project in the capital.

As the railway will greatly assist the airport, I suggest that we look to BAA for a contribution. At its annual general meeting on Friday, BAA announced profits of more than £500 million. Surely it can pay something towards a project of major benefit to the airport. In Paris, there is also a levy on employers and half the revenue raised from traffic and parking fines goes to transport investment. The RMT-commissioned "Funding London Underground" report last year looked at the state and the city of New York, which fund grants and subsidies accounting for 46 per cent. of the metropolitan transportation authority funding. A large proportion of subsidy comes from hypothecated taxation, which in principle at least is targeted at non-fare paying beneficiaries of the scheme in the private sector.

Mention has been made by my hon. Friends of the increase in land values. Now is the ideal time to explore the concept of land value taxation on those who will benefit directly from the development of Crossrail. Experience of the Jubilee line demonstrates just how land values and property prices can soar in an area and provide an adequate source of financing.

In London, we have long complained about lack of investment in the manufacturing of rolling stock. In the past few years, there have been significant job losses in the rail manufacturing and maintenance sector at sites including Birmingham Washwood Heath, Eastleigh and Derby, as well as in the capital. It is regrettable that the new high-speed trains for the proposed integrated Kent franchise will be built in Japan and not in Britain. Crossrail gives us the opportunity to kick-start a recovery in the manufacturing of railway stock in the UK as a railway workshop. I therefore encourage the Government to bring all their influence to bear to ensure that new rolling stock for Crossrail is manufactured and maintained in Britain.

Having objected to the original Crossrail scheme, largely because of the implications of the development of the Heathrow express for my constituents, I should say that such objections no longer exist in my constituency, except in companies that want some certainty about the development of the project. Companies and homes have been blighted for a long time as a result of the proposals. We desperately need a decision in principle and on the time scale. We want clarification of precisely which areas of land will be affected and for what period. That will allow companies such as Leemark Engineering and H. G. Timber in Hayes and Lafarge Aggregates to plan in the short term for the length of their operation on their present site and, if necessary, in the long term, for relocation.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend rightly talks of the need for a decision in principle because uncertainty is a problem, but does he agree that, before that can be taken, people who might support the Bill need to know about the ongoing revenue consequences of the capital programme? Until that is known, how can we expect people to support the programme with hard cash?

John McDonnell: That is a good point—the issue needs to be addressed in the ongoing debate. The benefits to a number of constituencies, to the environment and to the economy of London and the south-east and of the country as a whole, warrant some public sector commitment to the ongoing revenue funding, and that should come from public taxation. I accept that there might be growth in the subsidy that will be required, but that burden can be borne by business and through public taxation in the long term. That is why I urge the Government to look now at both the capital and revenue costs and establish a system such as those across Europe and the United States that enable projects to be adequately funded from hypothecated taxation.

The issue of certainty leads me to that of compensation. There is reference in the Bill to the usual compensation for compulsory purchase. I hope that we have a debate on the Floor of the House about the compensation that will be awarded to people for protection of their homes following any environmental impact and for any relocation. I am concerned that the levels that were discussed when the issue was first considered 15 years ago will not be adequate to meet the demands of relocation, or even the costs of short-term operation, as affected by transportation issues and other environmental impacts of the construction of the rail.

Overall, I welcome the Bill and look forward to the opportunity for my constituents and me to make representations to the Committee. I hope that the Government will address the significant issue of funding that I have raised and that we can achieve a consensus across London, even if we do have to bypass Bethnal Green and Bow—and I would fully understand why.

6.40 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I have long been a supporter of Crossrail. Indeed, I believe that Crossrail is a very good idea. However, the handling of the Bill so far suggests that Crossrail is a very good idea that is going badly wrong, in several ways. First, it is going wrong in relation to the impact on services on the main rail network; secondly, it is going wrong in relation to the interaction of Crossrail with the main rail network; and, thirdly, it is going wrong in relation to the impact that it will have on the principle of independent economic regulation, because of the powers that the Bill will give to the Secretary of State to give priority to Crossrail over and above the judgment made by the Office of Rail Regulation.

I have a particular interest in the Bill because, as several hon. Members have mentioned, the proposed western terminus for Crossrail is Maidenhead, the main town in my constituency. My constituents will be affected—both those who live in Maidenhead, by the works, and those who commute from Maidenhead. Other parts of my constituency will also be affected.

I was comforted by the Secretary of State's remark that it would be open to the Committee that will be set up to look at any issues raised by petitioners against the Bill and that the instruction to be given by the House will merely be guidance to the Committee about the areas that it can cover. However, I am concerned to learn that the legal advice is that the instruction is just that and that it will not be possible for the Committee to consider matters not in the instruction—specifically, the termini.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): As I understand it, the legal opinion is that the Committee can look at matters that are within its terms of reference, which encompass the Bill and the instruction. In those circumstances, it is hard to see how the Committee will be able to consider the issues of Reading, the Olympics or the wider implications for the rail network, both freight and passenger, that that the Crossrail project may have.

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend is right. Several of us were comforted by the comments made by the Secretary of State earlier, but if the Committee will not be able to consider the location of the termini—and whether the line should be extended to Reading—it will make a mockery of the Secretary of State's remarks this afternoon and of the Government's intention to consider whether to safeguard the line through to Reading. I hope that the Minister will be able to clarify the position when he winds up.

Peter Luff: It may assist my right hon. Friend and the House if I say that I have sought advice on that point. The clear advice that I have received is that the instruction is precisely that—an instruction—and it would not be possible for the Chairman of the Committee to go beyond Maidenhead in consideration of the Bill. That is the advice at present, and that is why I would like a debate on the instruction, but we are denied that. It is important that the Minister give a definitive undertaking on that point when he winds up, because otherwise I will be obliged to vote against the instruction.

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. I hope that the Minister will give a definitive view on that issue, but I also hope that he will go further. If the legal advice that my hon. Friend mentions is indeed correct, and the Committee will not be able to go beyond the specific instruction from the House, I hope that the Minister will tell us how representations can properly be made in the debate on the Bill on the possibility of extending the line to Reading.

The Crossrail line could be of enormous benefit to my constituents, but the services proposed would unfortunately ensure that they would receive a worse train service than they currently receive. The extension of the line to Reading could provide benefits, not only for my constituents using the Maidenhead and Twyford stations and the two branch lines to Henley and to Marlow and Bourne End, but for the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson) and the hon. Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter). The hon. Gentleman earlier made an unkind reference to Maidenhead when he said that rail passengers could not connect to anywhere from the town. It is true that there are not many places to connect to from Maidenhead, but one can connect to Cookham, Furze Platt, Marlow and Bourne End—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am grateful to my hon. Friends for their support for those wonderful places.

The branch line will be affected by the services, but the main line network will be particularly affected, because after Crossrail, Maidenhead station will receive only four services in peak hours. Far from having fast and semi-fast services direct to Paddington or stopping only at Slough, the services will in future stop at 10, 11 or 12 stations before Paddington. I have recently had a significant debate with First Great Western—indeed, I raised the matter in an Adjournment debate—about the fact that its December timetable last year extended the length of the journey from Maidenhead to Paddington from 20 or 21 minutes to 25 or 26 minutes. The Crossrail proposals would see that time double to 40 minutes or longer. The benefit of Crossrail to my constituents would be if one could take a fast or semi-fast service from Maidenhead to Paddington and then access the west end or the City without changing. If the journey to Paddington is on a stopping service, the benefit will be lost.

I have described the impact on passengers from Maidenhead, but those who access Twyford station, either directly or by the branch line from Henley through Wargrave, will face an even worse problem. They currently enjoy up to seven services an hour in peak times, but that would be reduced to two services an hour under the Crossrail proposals. I noted that the Secretary of State said that Crossrail would bring benefits to the south-east. He also said that it would be wholly beneficial to suburban lines, but I have news for him. For Maidenhead and Twyford suburban lines, it will not be wholly beneficial.

The Secretary of State also said that one need not worry about services to the west of London, because those went on the main line and Crossrail would go on the relief lines. The whole debate about the December timetable from my constituency has revealed that all the stopping services and the suburban services have been moved from the main line to the relief lines, and they will have to share those lines with Crossrail. It simply will not be possible for the services to be improved from what they are today. In fact, the services will deteriorate. I am therefore surprised by the categoric statements that the Secretary of State made earlier about the benefits of the proposal for everybody in the south-east. Taking the line to Reading would have significant benefits for my constituents, because those travelling from Twyford would be able to use the service, provided that the services to Paddington were fast or semi-fast.

The biggest physical effect on my constituency would arise from electrification of the line, which would lead to gantries being built on Brunel's bridge at Maidenhead. That bridge remains the longest brick arch bridge in the world and it is part of our national railway heritage. The view across Brunel's bridge would be changed by the erection of electrification gantries. I have raised with Crossrail and Network Rail the possibility of a third rail system, but that is apparently out of the question because it would be far too expensive and the systems could not be mixed and matched along the line. However, I urge the Government to ensure that the debate about electrification includes consideration of innovative ways to ensure that the impact on Brunel's bridge is as light as possible. We recognise that there will be some impact, but Crossrail, sadly, has shown no desire to try to ensure that it reduces that impact as far as possible. That is an issue to which I shall return during consideration of the Bill.

The Bill gives the railway the possibility of taking over Guards Club park. That means that lorries will be taken through a residential part of Maidenhead into a park that is used by families, including children. It is a major benefit to Maidenhead. Sadly, Crossrail has refused to consider innovative ways of accessing the work site at Brunel's bridge. For goodness' sake, it is over a river, and the park is next to a river. It would be possible to use the river to provide some access for the heavy materials that need to be moved in, and not bring them in by road through the park. I hope that that will be able to reduce the use of the park.

There are two further points that concern me. The first point is whether Crossrail is part of the main rail network. My constituents have no desire to be part of the Mayor of London's transport scheme. The idea that Transport for London could take responsibility for the line through to its terminus at Maidenhead fills me and, I believe, most of my constituents with horror. I trust that the Minister will be able to give us a definitive statement that the project will be part of the main rail network and that it will not be handed over wholly to the Mayor of London, for him to increase his orbit and ambit through the west of London on to Maidenhead.

Central to whether the project is part of the main rail network is the question of independent economic regulation. I challenged the Secretary of State on that question. The Bill gives the Secretary of State the power to give Crossrail priority over other rail services. At present, the situation is clear: there is a balance of priorities that is struck by an independent economic regulator, which is the Office of Rail Regulation. I have a tinge of sadness that we have moved away from the previous rail regulator, Mr. Tom Winsor, who was known for his trenchant comments to the Government about what was happening on the railways, to the Office of Rail Regulation, which I fear that few people have heard of since it took over from Mr. Winsor.

In January 2004, in a statement on the future of the railways, the Secretary of State said:

"the principle of independent economic regulation for the railways is essential and will be central to our proposals."—[Official Report, 19 January 2004; Vol. 416, c.1078.]

Those were proposals for the future of the rail network. Sadly, the Bill is entirely contrary to that statement. The Bill will take Crossrail away from the Office of Rail Regulation and enables priority to be established outside of that regulator. That has implications not only for Crossrail and the railways but for independent economic regulation throughout the raft of industries and utilities in this country. I urge the Government to think again on that aspect of the Bill.

Crossrail could be of enormous benefit to my constituents, but what is proposed in the hybrid Bill that is before us is not of benefit to them. I trust that, over the next year or more, we will be able to ensure that the Crossrail that is built is one that reflects a good idea and is of benefit to the south-east, and not the proposal that, sadly, is going badly wrong today.

Jon Cruddas (Dagenham) (Lab): I echo the support for the Bill offered by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), who spoke about economic development in the east of London. A durable Thames Gateway requires integrated transport links that offer access to town centres and job generation sites. Crossrail is to be welcomed as it will develop a rail spine for the London Thames Gateway, providing fast-track links between London's three central grid districts of Canary wharf, the City and the west end. Crossrail is needed to help manage the huge population movements into and within the boundaries of the capital. I shall focus primarily on that important element in my contribution. However, concerns about the present route and its impact on local communities deserve to be discussed and the very nature of the hybrid Bill will allow those detailed concerns to be considered. It is to be hoped that compromises can be found to accommodate affected residents, including those whom I represent.

Let us consider Crossrail in terms of population movements into London. London's population stands at about 7.3 million, just short of the combined population of Rome, Paris, Vienna and Brussels. As far as I can ascertain, it is the only major European capital that is growing. The Mayor of London's plan estimates a further population growth of about 800,000 by 2016. That is about an extra 17,000 people net per year. London is seen increasingly as a world city, with about 50 separate national and ethnic communities scattered across it and about 300 languages spoken.

According to figures provided by the Office for National Statistics for the period 1992–2003, annual inflows of international migrants into the capital more than doubled from under 100,000 to about 200,000. At the same time we can assume that many of the recently estimated stock of illegal workers are resident in the capital. We do not know whether the latest survey estimate of about 570,000 such individuals includes independants. We can assume that London retains a disproportionate number of those currently within the asylum application process—for example, a high proportion of the 280,000 individual failed asylum seekers, as estimated by the ONS. These figures do not appear to include dependants. In short, the dynamic at work in terms of population flows into the capital is extraordinary, but it remains unquantifiable in terms of the real levels of immigration and economic activity. It can be said, however, that the figure of 7.3 million is likely to be a severe underestimate.

Against that backdrop we can consider population movements within London. The extraordinary movement of people into the city requires a suitable public policy response in respect of public services and resource distribution. Yet we must assume that the baseline for public policy making severely understates the number of people living in the city. Rapid immigration has occurred alongside dramatic inflation in property prices, which has pushed immigrant groups, both legal and illegal, into the poorest parts of the capital and those areas with the lowest-cost housing.

My constituency sits at the centre of the Thames Gateway. It covers much of the London riverside area—that is part of the gateway—and has a massive amount of brownfield land. It has the lowest-cost housing market in Greater London. There is a growing private housing market through the consequential effects of the right-to-buy policy. Across the London riverside area, and excluding Barking town centre, we anticipate building about 20,000 new homes over the next 10 to 15 years. Population growth estimates range up to about a 60,000 population increase in the small borough over the next 10 years.

Before that development, the population was already increasing dramatically through the dynamic internal population movement within the capital. The trend decline in the borough's population has dramatically reversed over the past few years. There are some estimates that the population has increased by anything up to 20,000 since 2001. This in turn is likely to lead to an underestimate of population movements locally in terms of both illegal migrants and those within the asylum system. Those facts are useful in terms of considering some of the macro-economic London-wide considerations in the Crossrail debate.

The only way in which we can manage population movements into the capital is to seek to rebalance the city and open up the east side. The economic centre of gravity must move to the east as we, in effect, tilt the capital. That is why the Thames Gateway debate is so important. The interest in it has been reinforced over the past couple of years by the strategy of national Government who have established the Thames Gateway as a national priority, with its own dedicated Cabinet Sub-Committee, MISC 22. That policy is obviously conditioned by the housing crisis in the south-east.

Mr. Mark Field: How does the hon. Gentleman believe that there will be a shift in the planned development in the Thames Gateway, which I think that we all support, much as it means the centre of gravity, as he rightly said, of London going eastwards? How does he feel that that will be affected by our winning the Olympic bid and the obvious focus of regeneration over the next seven years, specifically in the Lea valley?

Jon Cruddas: I was about to touch on that.

It seems that Crossrail is an illustrative example of the infrastructural investment that is needed to the east side of the city to handle dramatic population movements into and within the city. It is needed also as a lever for other transport infrastructural links into the central spine that is thereby created.

Business development and relocation, as well as the decanting of the population will result from the Olympic bid. I am part of the London riverside action group, which anticipates a great deal of business relocation as a result of the development of the Olympic site. All roads lead back to the transmission belt or the transport infrastructural network that is being developed across the east side of the city, the spine of which remains Crossrail. Because of population movements and the needs of the east side of town I was always in favour of Crossrail going through the royal docks, Barking, Dagenham and Rainham, rather than along the Shenfield line. That proposal disappeared a few years ago, but it is part of the joined-up strategy that we all seek.

Returning to the dynamic of the housing market, growth is constrained across the economy because of the lower interest rate which, however, may ignite southeast house price inflation. As a result, a priority for the Government's macro-economic strategy is surely house building in the south-east. That would allow for medium-term economic growth, everything else being equal, accompanied by a lower rate of interest. Similarly our prospective entry into the euro, if anyone is still interested in that, is conditioned by applying the brake on the housing market in the south-east. If we are seeking both macro-economic inhibitors on growth and the management of the population growth in the capital, all roads lead eastwards. Nationally and in the offices of the Mayor of London, Crossrail is seen as the key infrastructural project needed to support macro-economic strategy and managed population growth. It will help to rebalance growth by supporting house building and simultaneously offer London a route map to manage its population within the capital's borders.

For the Government and the Mayor the case for Crossrail rests on technical macro-economics and pan-London population issues. I look at the issue very differently, however, and regard Crossrail as offering a local case for infrastructure. The city's dynamics far exceed the ability of public policy and national Government to keep track of it, let alone get ahead. London is growing dramatically, and the official, lagged statistics do not even begin to tell the real story. The state tends to operate within static models of resource distribution on the basis of outmoded population statistics. Those formal statistics do not begin to quantify the real patterns of immigration, on which we tacitly rely to underpin the growth of public services and the private service sector in the capital. Immigration also builds the labour market flexibility so desired by the business community, as reflected in recent comments by the Governor of the Bank of England. Yet we hide away from the debate about immigration and its macro-economic consequences.

The development of the Thames Gateway often appears to be a technical abstract debate conducted by the regeneration professionals, but in reality it is occurring in communities like mine as we speak. It is not some future blueprint for 2015 but a method for understanding the day-to-day momentum of the capital. Because the state is ill-equipped to deal with that dynamic as a result of lagged decision making and an underestimate of the population, huge tensions have developed. In my own constituency, for example, the local community is experiencing rapid transformation. It is growing and changing rapidly to help accommodate movements into and within the city. That change is taking place against the backdrop of a long-term legacy of underinvestment in public services and infrastructure together with patterns of enduring poverty. Fundamental tensions result from those legacies, contemporary changes and the sustainability of future developments under the banner of the Thames Gateway.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): The proposed route of Crossrail runs north of the Thames Gateway. Given the need to assist with regeneration, does the hon. Gentleman agree that an earlier proposal for the route to run south of the area would help solve the transit issues that affect his constituency and my adjoining constituency?

Jon Cruddas: I agree, as I said earlier.

The tensions in my community are manifest in the form of the far right and British National party activity. There have been five council by-elections in the past year, and the BNP have averaged 33 per cent. of the vote. Its members seek to pull the community apart, playing on its limited resources, great need and the rapid change that will continue in future. That is the context in which I view the debate on Crossrail. It is a test case for the Government's aim to build genuinely sustainable communities. That is why I preferred the original plan to build Crossrail along the north shore of the Thames Gateway through Barking, Dagenham and Rainham before looping round to the south of the Thames. That proposal has been lost, but if we are seeking to manage the huge population movements across the city within the capital's borders, the Shenfield line is not logical.

Mr. Pickles: I agree with the hon. Gentleman.

Jon Cruddas: I am not sure why that proposal was abandoned. If our aim is achieve spatial economic policy making and an accompanying transport infrastructure, it would be interesting to know why that route was dropped in the debates that preceded today's decision.

In my locality, we do not have a sustainable agenda because population movements far exceed resource distribution year on year against the backdrop of a difficult economic and social legacy. The debate about regeneration in the Thames Gateway needs to be presented anew, and with greater urgency. Over the past few years we have become preoccupied with debates about institutions, including the setting up of an urban development corporation and the role of the London Development Agency, the sub-regional regeneration partnerships and the boroughs, at the expense of the project's vision. We have become preoccupied with housing units as a result of the state's macro-economic concerns. Locally, that has contaminated the regeneration debate, especially as it has arisen alongside growing distributional tensions about resources as the community undergoes dramatic change.

Three developments in the past two weeks may signal a change of direction in the development of east London. First, the successful Olympic bid will become a vehicle for driving resources into the east of the city. Secondly, the recent terrorist atrocities have allowed us to reconsider the vibrant and global nature of the city in which we live, its engine being immigration. Thirdly, the debate about Crossrail demonstrates what is needed, not for some future community, but for our dynamic city today. I hope that the cumulative effect of those three developments will initiate a new debate about economic development in east London that allows us to go back to the first principles of the vision that we are trying to achieve.

Moving from the abstract to the specific, I shall focus on the concerns of my local community. It goes without saying that investments of this scale throw up genuine local concerns. A previous hybrid Bill, for example, led to concerns about the channel tunnel rail link, which goes underground in my constituency as it heads into the centre of town. The Crossrail Action Group has voiced many legitimate arguments about the location of the proposed depot in Romford. Although the depot is outside Dagenham, residents who live in Salcombe,

[Jon Cruddas]

Coombewood and Saville roads in my constituency have genuine concerns, especially about the increase in heavy goods vehicles using the local highways. Serious problems relate to road safety, and I am concerned that a deal may have been agreed between Havering council and Crossrail to amend the preferred route for HGV vehicles entering and leaving the proposed construction site at Westlands playing fields. That outcome is unacceptable to my local council and to me, as it would clearly increase the danger posed by traffic to schoolchildren travelling to and from Warren comprehensive school, of which I am a governor, as well as Warren junior and Furze infant schools. We must address such issues as the Bill proceeds, for example when the codes on construction practice are agreed and when the location of the depot in Romford is decided.

Andrew Rosindell: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the full council of the London borough of Havering passed a resolution only two weeks ago strongly opposing all the Crossrail proposals, including one on that issue?

Jon Cruddas: I am aware of that. The borough of Barking and Dagenham supports the development of Crossrail, although it is concerned about some of the local implications of the re-routing of the HGV traffic that I mentioned away from some of the roads in the Romford area into Whalebone Lane North and the junction with the A12 in my constituency. We will have to work through those issues. Indeed, the Secretary of State gave responses that will ensure that we can work them through. I hope that accommodations and concessions can be made in the interests of all our constituents.

Overall, Crossrail is vital to the UK and to London, and to the communities of east London. It is a key building block for managing the growth of the city and providing the infrastructure for effective strategic London planning over the next decades. I therefore strongly support the Bill and appreciate the opportunity to make a contribution to the debate.

7.10 pm

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the debate, and particularly grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) for bringing Isambard Kingdom Brunel into our considerations. My reading of schedule 8 suggests that technically the bridge that he built, which was such a triumph, and the bridge that was subsequently built to exactly the same design when the line was widened could be demolished, although I do not believe that the Secretary of State would condone such an act of vandalism.

It is good that Brunel has been mentioned in the debate, as he built the first Crossrail. There is nothing new about what we are debating today. The first trains to go across London were Great Western trains, which went underground at Paddington and all the way to Aldgate. They were not viable and were withdrawn. I am sure that economic conditions in London have changed since then, but it is worth noting that there is nothing new about Crossrail—we have had it before.

In principle, I support the idea of improving east-west rail links. Crossrail is a once-in-a-generation opportunity to make a difference to transport in the south-east, which could also benefit long-distance travellers, including those from my constituency, but if the country is to spend the kind of money envisaged by the Bill, we need to provide more than the Crossrail project offers. We all agree that we must do something. The project outlined in the Bill is something, therefore we must do that. That dangerous train of logic must not seduce us into thinking that the Bill automatically deserves our support tonight.

I shall speak primarily about my constituents' interests. That is what I am here to do, and I am clear that the Bill is in direct contradiction to their interests. It is the end of all the dreams that we have in Worcestershire along the Cotswold line of improving the service to the level that we ought to have. Only last week, I believe, the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster), jointly with the chamber of commerce for Hereford and Worcester, wrote a letter to the Secretary of State asking for the track between Oxford and Worcester to be dualled all the way and for a better service. They should have done that when the Strategic Rail Authority's route utilisation strategy was up for grabs. That was the time to do that.

If the Bill passes tonight in its current form, forget it. It is not worth spending the money on doing that because there will not be the capacity between Reading and Paddington for the additional services that we want. The Secretary of State spoke reassuringly about maintaining current service levels. Current service levels between Worcestershire and London are a scandal. They do not need to be maintained; they need to be dramatically improved. Since the new Adelante rolling stock has gone on to the First Great Western service, loadings have gone through the roof. It is standing room only on most trains. There is a market there crying out to be met, to take people off the roads and put them back on to the railways. Forget it, if the Bill passes.

The Bill may well be an emperor, if not with no clothes, then with very few indeed. The aspect that could persuade me is the Reading-Maidenhead issue. If we could end the railway at Reading, not Maidenhead, with fast and semi-fast services instead of the ridiculous proposed crawling services beyond Paddington, I might be persuaded. I could happily get off a train at Reading, change to a semi-fast service into the centre of London, near where I wanted to be, but I am not prepared to get off a train at Reading, which I will almost certainly have to do, with fewer trains going through to Paddington, make a journey to Maidenhead or God knows where else, and then get on to the underground when I get to London. It is just not acceptable.

We must consider the instruction to the Select Committee. I have raised the matter privately with the Secretary of State and he may by now be in a position to give definitive guidance. It is clear that the instruction is an instruction: it is what it says on the can. The Select Committee can do nothing but obey it. The Government are instructing the Select Committee not to consider anything beyond the terminus laid down in the Bill, which is Maidenhead. That means I must vote against the instruction, because it is fundamentally wrong. I hope that when the Minister winds up, he will be able to give some more definitive guidance. I am operating on the best advice that I have had, which is clear and unequivocal.

I hope the hon. Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter) is listening in his office. He went away happy, thinking that he had got from the Secretary of State what he wanted, and that he could vote for the Bill and for the instruction tonight. He cannot. I know that the Secretary of State was giving his view in good faith. I have spoken to him and I am convinced that he was speaking in good faith, but I am not convinced that he was right. We need to consider the matter carefully.

The Secretary of State gave some useful reassurances about the other aspects of the instruction, which I had hoped to invite the House to consider this evening, about the issues relating to the likely impact of the construction and operation of Crossrail on rail freight services and other rail passenger services, and the extent to which Crossrail should be planned, operated and regulated as an integral part of the national rail network. He said those were matters more properly left to the Standing Committee stage of the Bill. Because of Bill's hybrid nature, some of those have cross-reference to the private sector implications of the Bill and should be considered by the Select Committee. I do not accept his argument in totality, although it has a good deal of validity.

The problem is that we all know how Standing Committees work in this place. The Select Committee will have a very leisurely pace—perhaps too leisurely for the liking of its members, if they are to consider all the many petitions that they will receive. The Standing Committee will be ruthlessly timetabled and guillotined. It will not have the opportunity to consider the issues in depth, as they demand. I shall vote against the instruction on those grounds too, because it does not instruct the Select Committee that it may examine those issues. I am fearful that it will not, as a result of which the House will not.

My understanding is that the rail industry supports Crossrail in principle, as long as it is considered part of the national rail network. The Secretary of State was reassuring in his remarks today, and I found myself wanting to agree with him. What he said was what I wanted to hear, but I fear, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead said, that the Bill does not do what the Secretary of State assured us it would do. I therefore have serious objections to the Bill.

I am reminded of the famous Monty Python sketch, "The Spanish Inquisition". I began with just one objection. My objection is the capacity on the lines between Maidenhead and Reading—ah, and the continuation of the service between Maidenhead and Reading—oh, and—so I have diverse objections to the Bill. It began as one, but the more I considered it, driven by the issue of capacity between Maidenhead and Paddington, I realised that it was not just one or two objections, but such diverse elements as the impact on the existing rail network, funding, the narrowness of the design, the regulatory framework, and the failure to examine alternative solutions beyond the proposal in the Bill.

I know that many other hon. Members who share my concerns had hoped to be present for the debate when it was scheduled to be held yesterday. I think particularly of my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper), who is extremely concerned, as am I, about the capacity issues. The fact that the attendance is relatively sparse tonight probably owes something to the change of business. Let us consider my hon. Friend's principal concern and that of Gloucestershire county council—the impact on the existing railway.

Crossrail will pose serious difficulties during construction and beyond. It is a massive project. It will be comparable to a combination of the second phase of the channel tunnel rail link—the tunnelling under London and into St. Pancras, which is new build—and the west coast route modernisation, which is a major construction project. It will be lengthy and undoubtedly very disruptive to existing services. Along the two principal routes 2,200 freight, commuter, long-distance passenger and airport services per day will be affected. The Great Western route from Paddington to Maidenhead and the Great Eastern route from Shenfield to Liverpool Street will be seriously affected. The most noticeable impact will be on train services during engineering periods that require route closures. That will put huge pressure on other transport modes. If the work is carried out during the Olympics, God help us.

Paddington will have particularly serious problems. The Bill allows for it to be shut for a month for construction purposes. We can bet our bottom dollar that it will end up being more than a month. Operations will be severely affected for several years during the construction of Crossrail, mainly because of the closure of Eastbourne terrace for that period and the changes required to the operational railway network. Network Rail's initial analysis suggests that some parts of the station will become unusable and that passenger flows will be severely affected. Taxis are a particular difficulty, because it would be a problem if Olympic athletes could not get taxis at Paddington.

I shall not labour the point about freight terminals, which have already been discussed, but the severe disruption might mean that building materials and other goods are not delivered to London by rail and are displaced on to the roads, which would have severe environmental effects.

I have discussed the construction phase, but what about the operational phase? Demand will be high and the operation will be intense. The network is already close to capacity, but the Bill will create no new capacity between Maidenhead and Paddington and between Shenfield and Liverpool Street. After construction, the capacity for freight and passenger services running west of Paddington to Cornwall, Devon, Bristol, north Somerset, Gloucestershire, south Wales, west Wales, Oxfordshire, the south Cotswolds and, of course, Worcestershire will be reduced from four lines to two. That is a lot of services to fit on to two lines.

Clauses 21 to 26 provide for exclusive use by Crossrail of some of the existing rail lines out of Paddington and Liverpool Street. They effectively enable the Secretary of State to determine the minimum level of principal Crossrail services and to instruct the Office of Rail Regulation to amend or even terminate existing track access agreements to make way for minimum Crossrail services. They give priority to Crossrail over all existing passenger and freight services and undermine the concept of the independent regulation of the railway. If those provisions are enacted, they will severely reduce the frequency of train services into the two main termini, especially long-distance trains and commuter services from stations outside the Crossrail operation such as Twyford, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead mentioned.

By undermining Network Rail's ability to manage Crossrail as an integral part of the overall network, which, despite the Secretary of State's calm honeyed words, would be the Bill's effect, the Bill will significantly reduce Network Rail's ability to deal with incidents on the network, because overall capacity will be reduced. In an exchange with some Government Members, the Secretary of State said, "There will be no capacity problem. I assure you that I would not bring the Bill before the House if I thought for a minute that there would be a capacity problem."

The Government's consultation on the environmental issues resulted in a weighty tome, to which Network Rail contributed submission 55:

> "In the absence of a draft timetable for Crossrail services, it is difficult to assess how existing passenger and freight services could be readily accommodated. Furthermore, it is not possible to assess without knowledge of the Crossrail service plan if proposed infrastructure changes will adequately meet the existing and future needs of the industry . . . It has not been possible for Network Rail to conclude if the infrastructure proposed for Crossrail services will be sufficient to meet future needs without compromising the needs of other route users."

That submission to the Department for Transport is dated 7 June 2005 and came from the group company secretary, Hazel Walker. In his speech, the Secretary of State said that all those matters have been settled, but the experts, Network Rail, say something different, which makes me nervous.

We have addressed the issue of funding, so I will not labour the point, but it is another reason why I am worried. The Secretary of State said that the project will cost about £15 billion, and I think that his estimate is correct. The Treasury has apparently given the Department for Transport a 10-year budget, which does not include Crossrail. I hope that the money is available.

The provisions on exclusive access to parts of the network for Crossrail services will adversely affect the existing First Great Western and One franchises—"One" is an ugly name, but that is what the franchise is called. Some 60 freight trains a day use those lines, so the situation will have interesting financial consequences.

On the narrowness of the design in relation to Reading, the scheme could have brought so much to the south-east, the south-west and the west midlands, but those possibilities are being destroyed by the ridiculous obsession with Maidenhead. We all thought that fast and semi-fast services would run from Reading, but it seems that Crossrail will simply take over existing stopping services from the west into Paddington. Crossrail will not extend to Reading, which is a major rail junction. Richard Branson's Cross Country trains go through Reading. Indeed, one can travel to almost every place in the country that is worth visiting—for example, Edinburgh, York, Darlington and Bournemouth—from Reading, which is the logical place to end Crossrail.

I was brought up near Maidenhead, a wonderful town where my great, great, great, great grandfather was once mayor, but it is an arbitrary place to end a railway—it is not a natural terminus. The Bill will rob a lot of value out of the First Great Western franchise and transfer services to Crossrail. Half the Crossrail services will not even go under London and will stop at Paddington, having crossed nothing except the Thames at Maidenhead. The project looks wonderful, but, as I have said, is the emperor really wearing any clothes?

Why have we not examined the possibility of using this huge sum of money—billions of pounds—radically to improve the London underground? With a bit of tunnelling, a little imagination and a few improvements to access, the London underground could be transformed into an underground for the 21st century. We are ignoring that option in favour of Crossrail, because Crossrail is a shiny new toy.

I shall not labour my concerns about the regulatory framework, but I share the worries expressed by other hon. Members. The Department for Transport has consistently acknowledged that this is a kitchen-sink Bill, but it claims that the situation is all right because the extensive powers, which it may not need, reassure the funders. However, I know that if Ministers are given powers, they will use them. I do not think that the Secretary of State currently intends to use those powers, but when push comes to shove, he will be tempted. Ministers should not be given dangerous toys unless they really need them.

We have not examined the sensible alternatives to Crossrail, which has mesmerised people. I have not dismissed Superlink, which is a better scheme than Crossrail. It would use a similar tunnel under central London, but, unlike Crossrail, it would link directly to regional centres and airports across the south-east, including Heathrow and Stansted, which would relieve pressure elsewhere. Superlink would attract four times as many passengers as Crossrail, which would halve the cost to the taxpayer per passenger. Although Superlink is a bit more expensive than Crossrail, it is fundable in a way in which Crossrail is probably not.

Superlink is compatible with the core section of Crossrail between Canary Wharf and Paddington, and it includes vital but small modifications at each end of that section to enable the major investment to deliver its full potential. Crossrail will not provide transport links to serve the areas of projected housing growth in the south-east and to relieve road traffic, particularly in the Thames Gateway. If Crossrail proceeds, it will pre-empt such infrastructure improvements.

Crossrail is of little benefit to constituencies on the fringes of London or in the area around it, while Superlink would serve all of those areas. By taking travellers directly to their central London destinations, Superlink would more effectively relieve congestion on the London underground and free up key national rail routes.

Interestingly, Superlink's analysis of congestion benefits was not challenged in the Cross London Rail Links analysis of Superlink. A railway that would solve the problems of Milton Keynes and Cambridge and address the east-west issues is a much more attractive option than Crossrail.

I remain unconvinced that the instruction motion will allow the Select Committee to hear well founded criticism of the Crossrail scheme or properly to evaluate alternative options. This evening, the House must reflect on this basic question: why spend so much money, largely at taxpayers' expense, building a railway from Maidenhead to Shenfield, when, with just a little more thought and a little more expense, we could secure a transport network that addresses the real problems of London and the south-east and that costs the taxpayer less? Unless the Minister can explain why the Select Committee cannot examine the alternatives, why it cannot accept the official Opposition's instruction—for that matter, why can it not accept my instruction, which has not been selected?—and why the instruction is so flawed, I will seek to divide the House on this well meaning but deeply flawed Bill.

7.29 pm

Mr. Andrew Slaughter (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): I welcome the Bill and acknowledge the Government's commitment to the Crossrail project by bringing it forward as a hybrid Bill. I also welcome the Secretary of State's wish to put some certainty into the Bill by defining the limits of the Crossrail network. That is essential if the scheme is to be practical and affordable. The project is important to the nation and will have national rail links, but it is, in essence, a London railway and it needs to be looked at in those terms.

The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) referred to Superlink. If I have got the jargon right, that proposal is essentially a commuter scheme, whereas Crossrail is a metro scheme. The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) made some complimentary references to Superlink. If that is Liberal Democrat policy, it would be of interest to my constituents.

Tom Brake: Let me make it clear that what I said about Superlink was that it raised some issues to which it was worth the Government responding; that is not quite what the hon. Gentleman is saying.

Mr. Slaughter: That is the most enthusiastic view of Superlink that I have heard. As the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) said, it did not publish the route, but it showed us a map. I believe that although Ipswich and possibly Worcester were on that map, Acton main line was not.

Peter Luff: I would love Worcester to be served by a fast service direct through to Canary Wharf, but it was nowhere near the map. The hon. Gentleman is making mischief. He says that Crossrail is a metro service. People going from Maidenhead into west London do not want a metro service: they have a perfectly good rail service. Crossrail diminishes the quality of the service for many people who currently use it; and a metro is not very attractive.

Mr. Slaughter: I may be old-fashioned, but I thought that the links to the national rail network were the London terminals of Paddington and Liverpool Street, which seem to do a perfectly good job. The principal job of Crossrail is to provide much needed relief to central London and to the western and eastern arms; that is why it has received a warm welcome from business, local government, trade unions and transport groups. Even those who intend to petition against parts of the Bill generally preface their objections with an endorsement of the scheme. My constituents largely fall into that category by giving it a clear but not unqualified welcome. I shall come on to the objections in a moment.

The benefits to the national and London economy, to employment and, in particular, to the transport network were set out in the Secretary of State's speech, and I do not intend to repeat them. The good sense of having an east-west through route connecting to national rail services and the tube is so apparent that it has been advocated for some 50 years. The commercial and operational benefits are complemented by the relief that it will bring to tube lines already operating at capacity.

The specific local benefits to my constituency are significant. Ealing Broadway will be the principal interchange station on the west arm of the route. The station itself will benefit from much needed reconstruction. Commuters will experience improved services and journey times to many destinations, as well as the new routes that will be opened up to the centre of London. Acton main line station will be rebuilt and the number of trains increased from two to four per hour, reversing the cut in services made last year. The facilities at all stations along the line will be improved and the stations extended to accommodate longer trains. That is all good news for rail users in the western part of my constituency.

However, there are three concerns about the project as currently set out. First, there is a belief that the good news in the Bill could be better. Twenty-four trains will run through the central tunnel at peak times. In the east, those will continue on one or other of the Shenfield or Abbey Wood branch lines; in the west, 14 trains will be turned round at Paddington. The central conceit of Crossrail is to make a once-in-a-generation improvement in the cross-London rail network by linking up the existing extensive but disparate web of overground and underground lines. However, no attempt has been made to interchange with the West London line at Shepherds Bush or the North London line at Acton.It is difficult to tell whether the service to Heathrow from local stations will improve. BAA, which has just introduced the Heathrow Connect service, says that it will not. It is an issue not only of timetabling but of fares. If the premium fares that are currently charged for travelling even a few miles by rail to Heathrow are to continue, many non-business users are likely to boycott the service.

The second caveat, and the basis of a groundswell of local opposition to Crossrail, is the effect that it will have on the local environment, particularly the loss of a substantial area of open space comprising allotments, school playing fields and natural habitat for a number of protected species. The London borough of Ealing and numerous local organisations from the Acton area will, with my support, petition the Select Committee on those issues. The significance of losing irreplaceable open space in inner city areas cannot be overestimated. In this case, the sites are well used and have been for several generations. They are, admittedly, part of the original Great Western estate and stand on railway land, but so does much of the residential property and other amenities in that part of Acton. The specific areas of land marked out for compulsory purchase include a sizeable part of the playing field and nature reserve of West Acton primary school and the whole Noel road allotments site.

The teachers and pupils of the school and the residents who till the allotments are not naive, and I doubt that they believe that even armed with rakes and hockey sticks they could stop a £10 billion railroad crossing their land. However, it transpires that the land grab in Acton is wholly unnecessary, as alternative brownfield sites along that part of the route could be substituted. The same applies at Ealing Broadway, where it is proposed to take over Haven green—a protected area of green space in Ealing town centre—instead of using a nearby car park for storage and construction works. I presume that that can only be for reasons of cost and convenience to the contractor. Some six years ago, similar proposals to take over those greenfield sites were turned down at the planning stage because alternative brownfield sites were available, and it remains the view of the local authority that those sites are there. Of course, the powers given by the Bill will subsume such local planning powers. Moreover, as the history of the site suggests, the proposed extensive works at Acton yard would envelop the community open space, yet they are not germane to the Crossrail scheme itself but part of separate development proposals for the freight yard. Local residents fear that were the Bill to be passed but Crossrail to be abandoned, the compulsory purchase powers given by the Bill might be used to advance other interests. That lose-lose option would mean no playing fields, but no new rail service either.

That example illustrates my third and final reservation about the Bill. Are the powers to take over existing interests, in particular the compulsory purchase of landholdings of existing users, necessary to fulfil the requirements of the Crossrail scheme? Many substantial interests with a locus in my constituency will petition on these points, including BAA, EWS Railway and Cory Environmental. I do not intend to recite the objections in detail here, as other hon. Members have mentioned them, but the general point is well made. It cannot be right for any greater powers to be taken by the Secretary of State with a view to passing them to the nominated undertaker than are necessary for the construction and operation of the Crossrail route, or for there to be no requirement to consider and negotiate the rights of existing users. If that dictum applies to other major players on the Great Western lines, it should also apply to neighbouring communities.

It is always easier in such debates to dwell on the points of difference than on the layers of agreement. I conclude by repeating that the Bill will find general and enthusiastic support in my constituency, not least because it is an essential addition to the London rail network.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to this important debate. If the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Slaughter) will forgive me, I should like to revert to the point that my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) made about the instructions.

The Secretary of State was persuasive. He managed to make me feel at ease and that I should not be so worried about whether the instruction constituted a firm set of locks on the Committee. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire took legal advice and told hon. Members that our original fears, and the reason why I tabled an instruction, were well founded because the Government's instruction would preclude the Committee from considering the possibility of, for example, moving on to Reading or moving the termini from Shenfield to Stratford.

I agree with my hon. Friend. I cannot imagine any circumstances in which the Secretary of State would stand at the Dispatch Box and mislead the House. I have no doubt that he spoke in good faith—perhaps the advice that he received was simply wrong. If so, will the Under-Secretary assure us in his winding-up speech that he will ensure that the Committee is instructed to give life to the Secretary of State's undertakings? If he does that, we can all leave the debate feeling that something significant has been achieved. I ask him for a specific response to that point.

The Secretary of State said something startling in his introduction. The issue that dare not speak its name, which has rumbled gently through the debate, is the source of the money. I was therefore startled when the Secretary of State said that he was waiting for the Lyons committee to report. That is a bizarre reason not to be forthright in the Chamber. If the Secretary of State genuinely believes that the reform of non-domestic rates and the rebanding of council tax, even with an additional band, will find the money for Crossrail, he is deluded.

Mr. Hayes: The Secretary of State is not the only one who is deluded. In an answer to a written question from me a week or so ago, the Under-Secretary declared that the cost of Crossrail would be £10.063 billion, rising to £10.292 billion. Today, the Secretary of State said that the cost was likely to be £15 billion or £16 billion. There is genuine doubt about the money and I was therefore somewhat surprised. Mick Lyons was surprised that he had to deal with it and I am sure that my hon. Friend is just as surprised to hear that news.

Mr. Pickles: With such increases, the Government would undoubtedly cap Crossrail if it were a local authority. However, the hard truth is that if we are genuinely waiting for Lyons and the money is to come from an amalgam of council tax and non-domestic rates, the price box will increase and we are likely to experience significant rises in rail, underground and bus fares to pay for Crossrail.

Peter Luff: One of the House's prime functions, along with scrutinising legislation, is to vote money to the Government. Does my hon. Friend know—I do not—of any mechanism whereby the House can consider the financial questions around Crossrail?

Mr. Pickles: As far as I understand the instructions and the role of the Select Committee, the finance is not to be considered. We are being asked to vote for probably the largest civil engineering project in Europe this century, without any genuine certainty about how it will be financed. I do not doubt Crossrail's economic importance or the significance of the engineering feat. It will reduce congestion in London and unblock the clogged lines in our capital. However, I am unhappy about the far-reaching powers that the Bill transfers to Crossrail. It threatens the stability of our railway network in terms of the timetable and fair competition. It also threatens the independence of the Office of Rail Regulation and puts the projected growth of freight at risk.

My hon. Friends spent some time considering the Office of Rail Regulation and I will not repeat those points, save to say that the contention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead about her constituents' desire to look to the Office of Rail Regulation rather than the Mayor of London is true for the people of Brentwood and of Shenfield. We must acknowledge that Crossrail's effects will be felt not only in the capital, but across country to and beyond Cardiff.

Freight has been one of the great successes of the modern railway network. We have reached double figures in the percentage of freight that is carried by rail. We are at a crucial point when significant sums of capital investment have been made in freight, and we are moving from transporting goods for which time was not critical, such as aggregates, coal and oil, to goods for which time is critical. If, at this crucial point, we restrict the ability of freight to be moved on our railways, we risk the disappearance of all that investment and the genuine possibility—at a time when our roads, especially the A12, are massively overcrowded—of freight being transferred from rail to road. That would be ironic.

I am worried about other consequences. Four tracks are available for 20 miles from London. Crossrail will take two of them, forcing other services on to the fast lines. That remains a worry to me and my constituents. Crossrail's route and plans would fit more easily into a railway pattern of the 1980s rather than 2005 or 2015. It is depressing that there appears to be no genuine grasp of the growth of docklands, the extension of the Jubilee line or the strategic importance of the Thames Gateway, about which the hon. Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas) spoke so convincingly. That is why the project starts at Maidenhead and ends at Shenfield. None of the developments that I mentioned existed when the original plans were made.

The Shenfield line runs at full capacity. Thousands of people travel on it in overcrowded trains, and the slightest delay causes a major snarl-up. Crossrail does not add to the capacity. To be fair, Crossrail claims a slight increase in capacity—from eight to 10 carriages, operating at a greater frequency at what it describes as "peak and other times". That can be achieved only at the expense of freight and other users.

Peter Luff: My hon. Friend is making an important point. The estimates that I have from the rail industry show that Crossrail's plans could mean halving services from Oxford to London, from two trains to one train an hour, and halving services from Norwich to London. I hope that the Home Secretary will therefore vote against Second Reading.

Mr. Pickles: It would be good for law and order if we kept the Home Secretary in Norwich. Every cloud has a silver lining.

If Crossrail were to operate as planned, with 24 trains an hour through the central tunnels at peak times, it is far from clear that the network could accommodate such a service on top of existing and anticipated rail passenger and freight traffic. Freight operators estimate the use of only two tracks for 40 freight trains a day in each direction to and from Shenfield, plus nine intercity and outer-suburban off-peak trains. We also have to remember, when we are talking about the line from Shenfield to Liverpool Street, that 10 to 20 trains a day cross the important crossing from Forest Gate to the North London line. That, too, has a knock-on effect. My constituents will end up with disruption, inconvenience and, in the end, a worse service.

Crossrail will make the line from Shenfield unstable in terms of timetabling and vulnerable in terms of disruption. That might be justified if Shenfield's sacrifice were in the national interest. For some time, I have been asking railway organisations why Crossrail should start at Shenfield. No one has ever come up with a convincing logistical or engineering reason. A couple of months ago, a senior representative from Crossrail gave a presentation to a packed meeting in my constituency. He conducted himself with his customary charm and was listened to attentively and politely by my constituents. I asked him to tell us why the line should start at Shenfield. He is an obliging man, and he did so. I was startled by his first point, which was that Shenfield was traditionally the end of the line; it was therefore where the train drivers had lived and joined their trains.

I am the very proud grandson of a railway worker. Shenfield and Hutton Mount were among the wealthiest places in the United Kingdom in a recent survey of household incomes, with property prices to match. A house in Shenfield or Hutton Mount would, frankly, be out of reach of most Members of this House and, unless train drivers' salaries have greatly increased in real terms since my grandfather's day, of most train drivers. In April and May, I walked the streets in that area and I cannot recall meeting any member of the railway industry other than members of the board of Network Rail.

I point this out not to poke fun at Crossrail, but to illustrate the flimsiness of the case for Shenfield. Taking over the existing Metro services and control of all the lines will add nothing to the project except extra cost. Shenfield is the end of the line because it has always been the end of the line. With the permission of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire, I should like to take up the Hans Christian Andersen theme again. This is another example of the emperor's new clothes. The line will end at Shenfield because it has always ended at Shenfield, for no particular reason. Surely it would make better sense to end Crossrail at Stratford. It is a much more natural terminus, which is important, as other hon. Members have pointed out. It is strategically placed for the natural expansion of London and it would be cheaper to construct. Also, the cost benefits of the project become more evident from Stratford onwards.

[Mr. Pickles]

I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell) is in his place; I look forward to hearing what he has to say on this. The inclusion of Shenfield has led to some very questionable logistic decisions by Crossrail, one of which involves Romford. I cannot understand why we should build a depot in the middle of Romford, costing £400 million, when there is a perfectly good one going spare near Paddington that is soon to be vacated by Eurostar. The purpose of my tabled instruction is to allow the Select Committee to study the options in this regard, and I hope that the Minister will allow our constituents and other concerned parties such as Brentwood council to talk to the Select Committee about the possibility of having a proper terminus at Stratford.

Peter Luff: This shows the value of public debates—an interesting thought has just occurred to me. I have been fixated with the idea of extending the line westwards. My hon. Friend is talking about shortening the eastern section by bringing the terminus further into London, and that is a powerful argument. Ealing Broadway now commends itself to me as the terminus in the west. It is on a cheaper line and is a natural rail junction, albeit not as powerful or impressive as Reading. The Select Committee should consider a route from Ealing Broadway to Stratford.

Mr. Pickles: There is some merit in that suggestion, but the point made by the hon. Member for Dagenham about the southern route, which would move it more naturally into the Thames Gateway, also had merit. Rather than wasting money extending the line from Stratford up to Shenfield, why not release that money and place Crossrail where there will be significant growth?

Now that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire and I are in agreement, I shall disagree violently with him on Superlink. I had hoped that my instruction to the Committee would not allow the flight of fancy represented by Superlink to distract the Committee. My constituents are not impressed by Superlink's desire to smash two new railway lines through the gently undulating Essex countryside. I hope that my hon. Friend will give the same consideration to that beautiful countryside as he gives to Brunel's marvellous bridges. Those two new lines would disturb the villages of Lambourne and Abridge to the west, and Navestock, Blackmore, Hook End, Swallows Cross and Mountnessing in the east.

Perhaps I should declare an interest. Although Superlink tells me that my property will not be affected, I have to say that a close examination of that enormous red line on its plans seems to reveal that Superlink will go right through Mrs. Pickles' and my kitchen door, so hon. Members will understand why I am not exactly happy with the idea. What Superlink airily dismisses as open field is my constituents' precious green belt. My constituents are even less impressed by Superlink's patrician refusal to publish an exact route. Any organisation that shows such disdain for the public forfeits the right to be taken seriously.

The Secretary of State made great play of the necessity for private rights to be considered by the Select Committee. There are a number of problems with the environmental impact assessment, which has, perhaps inadvertently, misled some of my constituents. I want to make one narrow point on this issue, and I would like one of my constituents to speak for the rest. My constituent, Mr. Cloke, lives at 15 Herington Grove, and although his house is shown as being likely to be affected by significant adverse noise impact, it does not qualify for noise insulation. Nos. 11 and 17 Herington Grove do qualify, however. No. 17 is interesting because it is not a building but part of the garden of No. 15, which does not qualify.

When my constituent contacted Crossrail's helpdesk, he was told "that the tables set out in the Environmental Statement were samples and not representative of whether houses will or will not be affected, which will only be known and assessed once construction work commences. This apparently was to comply with Parliamentary requirements for the document to be reduced in size".

To make the assessment only when construction commences would be contrary to the noise and vibration mitigation scheme. It also seems completely pointless. Once the construction has started, the noise, disruption and vibration will also have started. Mr. Cloke rightly asks:

"How can this be done in a realistic timeframe to alleviate and mitigate the noise from the construction?"

I would ask the Select Committee, when it is considering the private rights, to look at this aspect of the scheme as a matter of urgency. A number of my constituents have thumbed their way through the environmental report and decided either that they have nothing to worry about or that they have something to worry about. Either way, however, this is just an indicative scheme, and that is not a sensible path for either the House or Crossrail to pursue.

7.59 pm

Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to address the House on this vital issue, which affects my constituency particularly. It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles), whose views on Crossrail and its effects on our side of London and into Essex I endorse completely.

You will be aware, Madam Deputy Speaker, that in the previous Parliament I presented a petition of some 2,302 signatures, collected by me and members of the Crossrail action group based in my constituency. We have deep concerns regarding all the proposals affecting Romford by Cross London Rail Links Ltd. The aim of that extensive petition was not to prevent the betterment of public transport services in London and the south-east, nor to halt Crossrail's plans completely, but to try to encourage Cross London Rail Links Ltd. and the Department for Transport to reconsider some of their proposals for Romford, which in my view will have a devastating impact on the local community and disrupt the lives of many people there. I am sorry to say that, even though that petition was presented to Crossrail representatives and to the door of No.10 Downing street, neither Ministers nor Crossrail have taken heed of my constituents' concerns. I sincerely hope that that will change as the Bill proceeds to Committee.

As you might expect, Madam Deputy Speaker, my speech today will be devoted almost entirely to specific issues facing my constituency as a result of the Crossrail

Bill. Speaking as both the local Member of Parliament and a local resident, I back my constituents wholeheartedly in their campaign against what can only be described as outrageous proposals for our local area, particularly affecting the communities of Crowlands—the district of Romford between the London road and Crow lane—Rush Green and Gidea Park. Crossrail proposes to construct a 24-hour maintenance depot and sidings in those highly populated residential areas of Romford.

Mr. Slaughter: Whether the hon. Gentleman wishes to have a depot in his constituency is entirely a matter for him, but I wonder why he wishes that it was going to be in my constituency, as I gather that he does from questions that he has asked. Crossrail had, I think, 42 options for the depot and chose Romford. He seems keen for it to be sited in Shepherd's Bush.

Andrew Rosindell: I am keen that it goes in the location that will cause the least disruption to people's lives, which certainly is not Romford. I accept that other locations might also be contentious and that needs to be examined closely in the Select Committee. Wherever Crossrail finally decides to place its depot, if the Bill goes through, I hope that it will not devastate people's lives as is currently proposed in my constituency of Romford.

The depot proposed in Romford is set to be approximately 2.5 km in length, running through both the Romford Town and Brooklands wards. Railway sidings and an access route for vehicles are to be constructed in Squirrel's Heath ward, also in my constituency. The proposal for a depot in central Romford will undoubtedly have the greatest impact on the lives of local people, taking away playing fields and open spaces and generating a vast amount of noise and pollution, and it is likely to turn a fairly quiet residential area of Romford into something like an industrial site. No way, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Let me take you, Madam Deputy Speaker, on a journey from west to east of the proposed Romford construction works, starting from the access tracks to be placed on the Westlands playing fields, an area of green belt land often used by local community groups, as well as the adjoining St. Edwards's Church of England comprehensive school and sixth-form college. Understandably, the school strongly opposes Crossrail's proposals, which would lead to the immediate loss of sporting facilities on Westlands playing fields and 50 per cent. of its own sports area, into which much investment is currently going, not to mention the overall long-term impact on the school if it is to be situated adjacent to a large Crossrail work site, with all the associated noise, dust, disturbance and congestion.

A proportion of the land equal to approximately two thirds of the Westlands playing fields is to be used temporarily as a Crossrail work site, depriving local children and residents of its use for about four years and eight months, including one year and nine months of enabling works. The Westlands playing fields are a key recreational facility in the affected area and are also used by the constituents of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas). The Romford constituency also has lots of other green space and park land, most notably Oldchurch park, which is now being used to build a new hospital. Out of a total of 13 sports pitches on the fields, eight will be lost temporarily, and three permanently. Residents understandably feel that, once the fields have been reinstated, if it proves to be the case that local sports teams have relocated, the local authority will seize the opportunity to show those fields as surplus to requirement and sell the remaining land for development in accordance with guidelines set out by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Government claim to put children first and have expressed concern over the number of obese children in Britain today. Perhaps the Minister can tell me how children in Romford are supposed to exercise without such recreational facilities as playing fields. That issue has also been highlighted by Sport England. To compound the loss, the disruption, including the arrival and departure of as many as 10 construction lorries a day, is due to last a child's whole secondary school life and will span 16 to 20 sets of public examinations overall, ranging from key stage 3 standard assessment tests to A-levels. We are all aware of the stress that children face at the time of examinations, and to add such distraction is nothing less than irresponsible from a Government who are supposedly concerned with the future of our younger generation. Not only will the use of the green belt land be detrimental to schoolchildren, patrons and residents, but the ecology of the area will be seriously affected.

The adjacent land known locally as Westlands Rough is the last remaining field of the Thames Chase to be left untouched within the London borough of Havering. To lose that green belt site would deprive the local community of the enjoyment and education of observing many species of wildlife and fauna, as well as taking away an area that many people use and enjoy for taking their dogs for walks. My Staffordshire bull terrier, Buster, who is well known to many Members, will be devastated if this treasured area of green space is wrecked by Crossrail's plans. Some species found on the site are of high conservation priority and are all unique to this part of the London borough of Havering. Such a site cannot be replaced.

The dive-under from Westlands playing fields will bring trains from north to south of the Great Eastern main railway line, causing prolonged noise to residents in that area from slow-moving trains 24 hours a day, and particularly throughout the night and early morning when they will either go in for maintenance or leave ready for the morning rush. That will affect local residents on both sides of the main line. An area to the south of Crow lane is to be used as a work site and adjoins many residential properties. That is approximately 4 acres of green belt land that forms part of the Dagenham corridor—the barrier between the London boroughs of Havering and of Barking and Dagenham. In addition, a new bridge to carry Crossrail would have to be built over a local road on the south side of the line after the underpass. Again, that would cause major disruption, with road levels perhaps needing to be altered. The lengthening of the walkway due to the additional bridge will have negative effects for pedestrians, a high proportion of whom are schoolchildren of both primary and secondary school age.

Yet another public worry is the loss of public recreation ground as a result of disruption in an area known as Jutsums park. A major gas main is being rerouted. Moreover, there will be a loss of established trees and plants whose planting was paid for and carried out by the local community. Crossrail itself admits that users of Jutsums park will be "subject to significant noise impact"

during construction, which will make it very unpleasant to use. The disruption of the parkland is in addition to the permanent loss of Oldchurch park playing fields, less than a mile away.

Continual erosion of those facilities will leave the youth of the area little recreational space that is free of charge. That means that we are in danger of seeing more gangs of youths congregating on street corners with nothing to do, especially in the town centre. As might be expected, my constituents and I are deeply concerned. We fear that the knock-on effect of Crossrail's proposals could be an increase in youth crime in Romford.

Crossrail has also proposed the building of a service road between Jutsums lane and the depot building towards the eastern end of the construction works. The road is to be built on the embankment and will run approximately 4 m from the ground. Vehicles will thus be level with the upstairs windows of people's homes. Inevitably, that will cause even more disturbance and invasion of privacy. The depot will take five or six years to build, which means at least six years of constant disruption, congestion, dirt, noise pollution and light pollution.

Those negative factors will affect residents, some of whose homes are about 100 m from the proposed depot site. The Higginses, with their small children, are an example. Not only will access to the road be less than 10 m from the side wall of their house but the proposed maintenance depot will be 100 m from the bottom of their garden. When they bought their home 20 years ago, Mr. and Mrs. Higgins were well aware of the existing railway line, but they did not expect to live next door to a 24-hour maintenance depot.

The plans affect my constituents throughout Romford. Local roads will become more congested, with a plethora of construction traffic. Vehicles travelling to service the depot, both during and after construction, will journey down residential roads, not only damaging roads but putting pedestrians at risk. The depot will also dramatically change the skyline of the area, dominating the view from many residential properties. It is to be built on land that has already been raised by between 3 and 4 m, to make it level with the existing railway line.

According to the requirements of the Greater London assembly biodiversity document, recognised by the Government as being in league with Agenda 21, brownfield land unused for human purposes that has reverted to its natural state can be classified as greenfield. The Crossrail action group and I believe that that applies to the Romford gasworks land that is to be used for the depot development. The depot itself will be 12 m high, which means an overall height of 15 to 16 m—around double the height of the average house in the area.

In answer to a written question from me, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Halton (Derek Twigg), confirmed that the depot would be operational 24 hours a day. With lighting conducive to worker safety and high-pressure commercial washing taking place throughout the night, residents are sadly unlikely to have a night's peace if the depot development proceeds. Moreover, a parcel of land next to the depot area and to the rear of the residential properties is to be used as a route control centre and a large car park. Although the facility itself may not be particularly noisy, residents fear that further disruption will accompany shift changes during the night. The facility does not form part of the depot and can be located anywhere along the route. The construction of the depot will necessitate the removal of a gas holder, which will leave residents exposed to associated contamination. I do not consider it justifiable for the lives of residents, some of whom have lived in their homes for more than 60 years, to be disrupted to such a dreadful extent.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Has not Crossrail shown complete disregard for the needs of my hon. Friend's constituents?

Andrew Rosindell: My hon. Friend's words echo the views of all my constituents. We originally thought that the development might benefit us, but over time we have realised that there will be very little benefit and it will wreck many people's lives. Many elderly people who live locally are in fear of what they may have to face in their twilight years.

Although it was asked for details of the elimination of the other depot sites considered as long ago as July 2004, Cross London Rail Links did not see fit to release the information to Havering council, Havering's Greater London assembly representative Roger Evans and the Crossrail action group until May this year, although the document is clearly dated December 2003. Having looked at the reasons for deselection of some of the alternative sites, I deduce that different criteria have been used from one site to the next. The Romford option is the most expensive and the most logistically difficult to build, yet it appears that the use of so-called brownfield land for the depot, although it is in a residential area, is being made to fit Crossrail's criteria. How can that possibly be? I hope that the Minister will tell us later.

Towns usually build up around industry of this kind, rather than the other way about. I ask for Cross London Rail Links to be directed back to the drawing board, and told to consider land that has already been used for this purpose at Ilford or North Pole. I also ask for all sites considered to be rated with the use of the same criteria, rather than differing criteria depending on location.

Mr. Pickles: My hon. Friend mentioned the North Pole depot, to which I also referred. Eurostar will lose it in 2007. Does it surprise my hon. Friend that Crossrail has not even considered it as an alternative?

Andrew Rosindell: I agree. I find that not just surprising but astonishing. If there is one message to be conveyed from our side of the debate, it is that the Minister should reconsider that aspect. The North Pole site would clearly be appropriate and would avoid much disruption in my constituency and elsewhere.

The most infuriating example of what I am describing is the fact that a site with only a handful of houses nearby uses "proximity to dwellings" as an adverse effect, while there has been no mention of that in the selection of Romford, although hundreds of homes will be affected. The depot at North Pole, just west of Paddington and on the proposed Crossrail route to Heathrow, is currently used by Eurostar, as my hon. Friend said. That new, modern depot, built to maintain the most modern trains, will be vacated in 2007 when Eurostar switches its maintenance to a new depot being built at Temple Mills with £400 million of taxpayers' money. If Crossrail used North Pole, it would probably save the taxpayer the £430 million construction costs of the Romford depot, and save my constituents in Romford from massive and unnecessary disruption. Crossrail has not been able to give a convincing reason for its inability to use the North Pole site.

Mr. Slaughter: I did not think that the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) mentioned North Pole. I believe that he mentioned a depot near Paddington. North Pole is relatively near Paddington, but is actually at Shepherd's Bush. If only from my earlier intervention, the hon. Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell) must know that Crossrail considered it as an option and rejected it, partly because it is in west London rather than east London and therefore logistically inappropriate, and partly because there may be other plans for the North Pole depot. He cannot hang his argument on that.

Andrew Rosindell: There may be other plans and Crossrail may have considered them, but it has not pursued that option. What I am asking today is for the Minister to revive that option and look further into the details. A decision has been taken, but not a fair decision, so other alternatives need to be considered. Will the Minister assure my constituents that he will investigate why this option has been decided and ensure that the North Pole alternative is given serious and urgent consideration?

Other effects of the work in Romford include the extension of an underpass widely used by residents ranging from children to the elderly. It will be extended from 43 to 75 m. Associated works at Romford station will cause considerable disruption with yet more work sites and more construction vehicles. The affected residents are effectively stuck in the area, because once Crossrail reaches planning stages and starts showing up a negative on searches, residents will be unable to sell their homes, causing blight to many home owners in my constituency. I feel that that is totally unfair to my constituents.

I turn now to the effects of Crossrail in the Gidea park area of my constituency, where railway sidings and an access route are being proposed. The residents of Cambridge avenue, Amery gardens and the surrounding area will have imposed on them a large area for the storage of Crossrail trains—yet more disturbance, noise and pollution. Gidea park is another quiet residential area and although the Liverpool Street line runs through the community, using the land at the rear of residential properties for that particular purpose is an entirely new development, to which most local people are completely opposed. There is also the access route for vehicles proposed via the Southend arterial road, where lorries will thunder past residential properties and around the sides of people's homes, causing no end of disturbance. As the local MP, I speak on behalf of all local residents from the area who feel that this plan is totally and utterly unacceptable.

It has also become increasingly apparent that affected residents in the area will have little to gain from the development or from the Crossrail service itself. As such, I believe that connecting the Great Eastern Shenfield line into the Crossrail scheme could prove a serious mistake—a view shared by my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar. From what I can see, the £1.5 billion that it will cost far outweighs the potential benefits to passengers from Romford. There will be only a slight increase in capacity and, by the time the whole scheme is commissioned, it will have been absorbed by the growth of towns along the eastern route. There is no real evidence that journey times for passengers on this branch will decrease substantially. Most commuters from Romford walk from Liverpool Street station to jobs in the City and there is also a good interchange at Stratford on to the Central line. Since the Crossrail scheme was revived by the central London rail study, the Jubilee line has been constructed, allowing passengers to travel directly to Canary Wharf and the west end, reducing the congestion on the Central line.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way and for giving the House so much information about the impact of this development on his constituency. Does he agree that any development of this kind will have the effect not only of increasing traffic and travel, but of enabling people to travel far further to work than they otherwise could—in other words, to live perhaps in Essex and work in Middlesex, which under other circumstances would be wholly irrational and likely to force people to relocate? We are not improving the environment, but merely enabling more and more people to travel further and further, damaging the environment as they do so.

Andrew Rosindell: I have great sympathy with my hon. Friend's point. We all want progress and greater access to travel, but there are many different ways of doing it. I am increasingly of the view that the important thing to focus on is smaller developments—localised, but clearly focused on what will be achieved. Huge developments may not necessarily improve the situation but most certainly have a big impact on the environment. The debate will become more detailed and complex as time goes on.

Crossrail has told Romford residents at meetings held by the Crossrail action group that they will be able to board direct trains to Heathrow airport. However, in answer to another of my written questions, the Minister confirmed that all trains to Heathrow will, in fact, start from Abbey Wood with no direct service from Shenfield. We have also learned that Crossrail trains are unlikely to run to Heathrow's new terminal 5 because of capacity conflicts. It appears that passengers from the Shenfield branch will need to change trains to get to Heathrow and then change again if they want to use flights from terminal 5. The case for incorporating the Shenfield line in the Crossrail scheme seems to depend on the assumption that it will, in turn, release capacity for more services from Stansted airport into Liverpool Street station. Yet rail industry experts have raised serious questions about whether Crossrail's operating strategies will actually work. If they are right, Crossrail's plans imply the utter waste of £1.5 billion, with the so-called investment going into making public transport worse.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): My hon. Friend is completing a powerful oration on behalf of his constituents. The situation is even worse than he suggests. BAA is aware of the problems for travellers to Heathrow that he described, but there is the additional point that we will be mixing densely packed commuters with travellers carrying a lot of luggage. As a result, the premium service to Heathrow—the Heathrow Express—is at risk.

Andrew Rosindell: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. The deeper and more detailed our analysis of these problems, the clearer it becomes that there are great flaws in what is proposed.

If Crossrail is intended to serve the London borough of Havering, I suggest that it has been wrongly routed. To serve its remit of opening up communities, it should serve the area further south where the bulk of regeneration of the Thames Gateway will take place.

Finally, Crossrail is described as an east-west rail link, but why not think of it as a west-east rail link? It could make more sense to build it that way round now that we have secured our bid to host the 2012 Olympic games. As Lord Coe has said in many of his presentations, the Olympic site is already served by nine railways, and the Olympic Javelin will provide a fast shuttle to Kings Cross. Rather than disrupt rail services in the critical period before the Olympics, why do we not concentrate on getting the Heathrow and Abbey Wood branches up and running? That will reduce the initial costs of the scheme, while the Shenfield branch can be added later, if required.

On behalf of my constituents in Romford, I ask the Government and all right hon. and hon. Members to put themselves in the position of the residents who will suffer so much hardship from the construction work if the scheme goes ahead on their doorstep. That is not just nimbyism, but a collection of serious concerns about the quality of life of thousands of people.

The point of scrutinising legislation in this place is surely to modify Bills. What the constituents of Romford and the Crossrail action group are proposing is minor in the grand scheme of Crossrail, but in the lives of real people, due to be seriously undermined, it is vital. I urge the Government to request the Select Committee to review the proposals for the eastern section of the line, especially the depot in Romford and the sidings at Gidea Park, and more generally, whether it really makes sense to incorporate the Shenfield line in the Crossrail scheme. Why not simply use some of the money to upgrade the existing line to Liverpool Street?

I look forward to imparting more detailed evidence to members of the Committee, but if any Members want to learn more about the proposals that affect my constituency, they are welcome to access the Crossrail action group website at www.romfordcag.co.uk. I conclude by urging the Government to listen to the residents of Romford and to the Crossrail action group, who have worked tirelessly to ensure that their environment and community can be treasured for generations to come.

8.30 pm

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I am sure that the whole debate has been a delight for every last train spotter. It seems that almost every railway siding from Essex to Worcestershire has been mentioned; in particular, we have had a tour d'horizon of Romford, courtesy of my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell), who went into great detail in a passionate defence of the rights and interests of his constituents.

When, or perhaps if, Crossrail is built, our capital city—one of the great global cities—will have the beginnings of a railway system fit for the 21st century. Why then have the Government seen fit to impose a procedure more suited to the 19th century in proposing this hybrid Bill? What of democratic accountability, and consultation with the countless residents whose daily lives will be blighted and affected? We have heard about that from several contributors to the debate. Why is the ultimate decision about whether the project is funded, and thus can proceed, left to two men, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Transport, who do not represent anyone on transport issues in this House? It is a devolved matter for their constituents in Kirkcaldy and Cowdenbeath and in Edinburgh, South-West.

There is no doubt that London desperately needs proper investment in its infrastructure, because if London fails economically, the whole of the United Kingdom fails with it. Jobs, at least those outside the public sector, that fly from our capital city usually leave our shores entirely. Any Government action that diminishes the relative commercial importance of London is unlikely to benefit Glasgow, Leeds, Manchester or Birmingham; instead, it will be European or increasingly south-east Asian cities that will reap the benefits. It is in that context that we must ensure that investment in the transport infrastructure of our capital city is fit for purpose in an innovative, rapidly evolving world of commerce.

Crossrail is a plan that will integrate the mainline railways to the east and west of London, through the construction of two tunnels, directly beneath the centre of London, from Paddington to Liverpool Street. As the Secretary of State said in his opening comments, the project was agreed by the Government as long ago as 1990 but the necessary private Bill failed to get through the House of Commons four years later. Finally, on grounds of cost as much as anything else, the Conservative Government pulled the plug on that scheme in 1996. Many Members who have spoken in the debate may not be entirely aware that the proposal goes back as far as 1948, so surely few would dispute the fact that Crossrail is an idea whose time has genuinely come.

There are, however, some substantial issues that need to be properly addressed even on Second Reading. Later, I shall touch on some constituency issues; rightly, as constituency Members, we have particular concerns and they have been mentioned by all the Members who have made contributions so far. None the less there are some more fundamental issues, many of which concern the proposed funding for the entire project and the manner in which the promoters of the Bill, Cross London Rail Links Ltd.—a joint venture company formed by the Strategic Rail Authority and Transport for London—have gone about their public consultation obligations. I accept that many such issues will be discussed at far greater length in the protracted formal Committee stage, assuming that the Bill gets that far.

I am the Member of Parliament whose constituency is most obviously directly affected by the proposal, which is not to demean in any way the contributions made elsewhere. However, as the central part of Crossrail goes right through my constituency from Liverpool Street in the City of London to Paddington station, I wanted to list some of the concerns on the record in advance of petitions by residents associations, local businesses and individual members of the public. The funding of infrastructure projects here in our capital city has historically been highly contentious. Sadly, if anyone believed that adding a new layer of devolved government, as this Labour Government did in creating the Mayor and the Greater London assembly only five years ago, would make things easier, they were sadly mistaken.

Mr. Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that traditionally too much of London's money has been sent to the regions to fund infrastructure projects in the north of England and Scotland, and not enough retained in London to guarantee the future of this great city and its ability to bankroll this nation of ours?

Mr. Field: I thank my hon. Friend for that observation. I know that he is a serving councillor in the London borough of Wandsworth, so I expect he sees both sides of that argument, from the suburbs and from central London. I think he is absolutely right.

It is clear that the financing of this project remains entirely up in the air. I think we are the first to accept that businesses are willing, and have shown themselves willing, to make a contribution, but equally they want to see the colour of the Government's money. They want an idea of the likely funding structure. My greatest worry is that although we could spend months, perhaps years, talking about Crossrail, unless there is a fairly clear idea of the source of the financing, all that discussion will come to naught. It would be somewhat intellectually dishonest for any Government to advance such a scheme without having a strong idea about where the finance will come from. Without such clarity, the great worry is that many years could be spent in discussion, with the result that many lives and many properties and businesses could be blighted in the manner described by a number of Members across the House.

There is little doubt that the creation of Transport for London under the direct responsibility of the Mayor of London has at least provided a structure for transport decision making here in the capital, but the terms of the Greater London Authority Act 1999 were couched in such a way as to ensure that financial control remained firmly in the hands of central Government. I do not believe that can truly be a sensible way to proceed, although I accept that Crossrail has an importance that goes beyond the capital city. In view of Mayor Livingstone's record of financial profligacy, such control of finances might generate a collective sigh of relief from many London council tax payers who have already seen a whopping 105 per cent. increase in the mayoral precept on the London council tax over the last five years. Indeed, the prospect of Mayor Livingstone being issued a blank cheque for Crossrail is enough to make anyone shudder.

Nevertheless, the stark financial reality is that all too often this Labour Government have regarded London as a convenient cash cow. The creaking London infrastructure, especially but not exclusively that of transport, treats residents and wealth-creating businesses alike with some disdain. Most independent commentators would estimate that every year, some £12 billion of public funds is transferred from the capital to the rest of the UK and some £1.5 billion of that is from business rates alone. There is little doubt that this is beginning to have an electoral effect, and the Government should beware.

Issues of quality of life and the cost of living were increasingly important for my party in the capital during the general election campaign, and the swing from the Labour party to the Conservatives in London was greater than in any other region of the United Kingdom. I am proud that I have four hon. Friends—my hon. Friends the Members for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling), for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes), for Putney (Justine Greening) and for Wimbledon (Stephen Hammond)—in seats that would have remained in Labour hands had there been only an average national swing. On the grounds of electoral self-interest alone, I hope that the Government are now listening to the voice of London. I appreciate that the trend that I have articulated has been echoed by an increasingly worried cohort of London Labour Back Benchers.

We now seek an investment commitment to Crossrail at the earliest opportunity, although I accept that there is no clear pathway to its funding. I am the first to admit that it is a complicated situation. No one is suddenly going to produce £10 billion, £15 billion or £20 billion—I think we all realise that by the time Crossrail is built the cost is likely to be at the higher end of that range—but over the past year the Mayor has been given what he and his new friends in government have euphemistically called "prudential borrowing powers" to complete the east London link, which is of course a crucial part of our Olympic 2012 successful bid, and therefore the programme for the future. In essence, that is a financial sleight of hand because the Mayor is allowed to borrow some £2.9 billion from future council tax receipts to complete the east London link. Despite the national importance of that transport project, the money will still come from London's local taxpayers. Apparently, that will be the case for the whole Crossrail scheme.

In their desperation, London's largest businesses have tried to engage with the Government and offer some money on the table. As the Minister will be aware, the current proposal is for an additional 3 per cent. surcharge on the business rate over 50 years or, indeed, for some added-value capture scheme that reflects the projected long-term increase in property values as a result of the infrastructure being created. That is understandable—everyone can support it in principle—but the difficulty is, of course, how that bit of any increase in the value of a property is calculated.

Understandably, business has been reluctant to declare its hand fully, without a firm commitment in advance from the Government to put up the bulk of the project's costs. I hope that the Minister will give at least some indication today about where he envisages some of the project's funding will come from.

Inevitably, when the works start, there will be an immense amount of disruption to many London residents and businesses. As I mentioned in an earlier contribution, given the disruption in central London alone, I personally believe that it is very unlikely that we can go through the whole process of getting the Bill on to the statute book in enough time for work to begin before the Olympics. Nothing would be more disruptive than two or three years' upheaval in central London in the midst of the Olympics. In all honesty, I suspect that the Government already recognise that and therefore the timetable is being postponed to the middle of the next decade.

I hope that my hon. Friends from other parts of the capital and beyond will forgive me if I focus my comments on my constituency, which has some important aspects to mention. I am assured that, although some of my constituents oppose Crossrail as a matter of principle, others, even those who face disruption in their lives, recognise many of its overall benefits. However, they are worried that, without a proper funding commitment and therefore a realistic timetable for how quickly work will commence and finish, their properties will be blighted. That has not been made any easier by the fact that the erstwhile chief executive of Crossrail, Norman Haste, quit it mid-May, before the necessary parliamentary approval process commenced. To a large extent, the Government had made his job increasingly impossible by dragging their feet on the funding required to make the whole Crossrail project viable.

It is now of key importance that a full public consultation exercise take place on Crossrail's precise route in central London. The initial proposal suggested three possible routes. I am alarmed by the current proposal for a route just south of Oxford street because it is certain to cause massive disruption to the residential population of Mayfair, as well as damage to a large number of listed buildings and other residential properties. Some Members—I say this perhaps for the benefit of Labour Members—may assume that Mayfair is somehow full of hugely wealthy investment bankers who live in large, multi-million pound houses. Nothing is further from the truth: the biggest number of complaints have come from two very large Peabody Trust buildings: one off Binney street and the other in Brown Hart Gardens in Mayfair. Indeed, the great bulk of the population of north Mayfair is made up of people who live in social housing, many of whom have done so for decades and their families may have done so for several generations.

My great concern is that, in reality, they have no choice about where they live. The same applies with many of the licensing changes that are taking place. People who live in Soho, Covent Garden or Mayfair who are well off enough can decide to move if they find that the disruption is too bad, but we always forget that a significant number of people, particularly in central London, live in social housing. They have absolutely no choice about where they live. They are the most vulnerable people in our society, and they need everyone—not just hon. Members, but those in the city council, the Greater London assembly and, indeed, a range of non-governmental bodies—to stand up for their interests. I am sure that my constituency neighbour, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck), as a former Westminster city councillor, would entirely endorse what I have had to say.

If we are to minimise the complications caused by both compulsory purchase and possible structural damage, it is of key importance to give serious consideration to other routes, especially the northern interchange route. I accept that the proper place for such consideration is not the Floor of the House because that will take place in Committee. However, it is worth at least talking about the matter in limited detail at this stage so that I can put it on record.

The housing association tenants in Mayfair often have no choice about where they live, as I have said, but they face the risk of severe disruption to their community. In Gilbert street in Mayfair, for example, the 1930s educational facility will be torn down to make way for a terminus to support the Crossrail link. The apartment blocks in the area will be subjected to a minimum of six years' building work—several hon. Members have cited that time scale. Trucks will go in for at least 12 hours a day to dispose of rubble and a great deal of underground drilling will take place day and night. A shaft measuring 30 ft wide and 25 ft deep will be sunk to expel all the stale air. The residents feel that they have been neither properly informed, nor consulted. The building work will seriously disrupt the quality of life for countless local people, yet many residents are already in poor health, with some elderly and others similarly vulnerable.

Mr. Walker: Does my hon. Friend think that Crossrail has given sufficient attention to the environmental impact of the work? His concerns have been expressed by many hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber, so they seem to run though most people's arguments.

Mr. Field: My hon. Friend hits the nail on the head. There is worry that insufficient emphasis has been given to a range of environmental issues throughout the consultation. Obviously, the green belt would not be affected in my constituency as it would be in those of many other hon. Members, but we still must consider environmental factors in my area.

I would have some sympathy with any Government on this matter because some persistent complainants will not be complaining about a lack of consultation, but the outcome. If we go ahead with Crossrail—such a scheme will have net benefits—some lives will inevitably be disrupted. The scheme will clearly cost an inordinate amount, which will have an effect on business and the council tax payers of London. I suspect that some of the cost will also be met by the general coffers. We can consult until the cows come home, but we must ultimately take a decision. That is the difficult side of being in government, so perhaps it is easier to be in opposition when considering such matters. I respect the fact that the Government must make decisions. However, we hear time and again the complaint from residents of not only central London, but the suburbs and places outside London, about a lack of consultation. I do not think that that represents average griping, but reflects a concern that I hope will be addressed in great detail in Committee.

Several interest groups, such as the Grosvenor Estate and the US embassy, which is based in Grosvenor square, have great concerns about security, which I fear have been highlighted by the terrible events of only 12 days ago, not least because some of them took place in two great pinch-points—one just by Edgware road and another by Aldgate East station. Both those places are not only right on the edge of my constituency, but very close to where much of the building work will take place at the Barbican and Paddington.

Hon. Members who have visited the Grosvenor square part of central London in the past four years will know how the change to traffic arrangements around the square has been highly disruptive to many residents in surrounding roads. The current route proposed for Crossrail, which would go south of Oxford street, is of great concern to the US embassy because it is not clear how we would be able to tackle the serious security implications of large numbers of workmen operating in the vicinity of the embassy at all hours of the day and night over several years. The Crossrail northern interchange route would link the Barbican, King's Cross and St. Pancras, and Baker Street here in central London, and connect with all airports and tube lines. It would adjoin business areas along the Marylebone road and wide areas of regeneration that would otherwise not be touched by Crossrail. Unlike the proposed Crossrail scheme, the CNIR requires only one new interchange station.

Normally, underground tunnels run under roads, parks and railways in order to reduce damage and the number of compensation claims. The authorised District and Metropolitan lines used cut and cover under roads as against narrow tube tunnels. The Jubilee line extension runs under railways for 2 km but even in that case there has been some evidence of ground subsidence. The twin Crossrail tunnels will be about 2.5 times the size, and it is clear that there will be substantial additional risk of subsidence.

In addition, construction savings are supposed to be made under the scheme by tunnelling under shallower foundations of listed buildings and conservation areas, but the Crossrail safeguarding zone has two outer areas of possible subsidence up to 400 m wide under Bayswater, Mayfair, Soho, the City, of which I shall say more in a minute or two, and Georgian Spitalfields. I could not speak with the eloquence of the hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Mr. Galloway), who defended the rights of his Spitalfields constituents but who is not present at the moment. I suspect that he was looking at the Crossrail cause célèbre in terms not just of next year's local elections but of future general elections. No doubt the issue will run and run, conveniently for him, over that period.

We are concerned that this hybrid Bill uses the Land Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 to calculate compensation for disruptive work, which is not only a denial of modern human rights law but reimburses property owners only for specific building repairs. Under EU legislation, other interested parties will inevitably qualify for full compensation, which goes directly to concerns about funding and the overall cost of the project.

I appreciate that one or two colleagues wish to speak and I am sorry to have detained the House for so long, but I want to end with some heartfelt comments from the dozens of letters that I have received from constituents in the Barbican about the likely impact to their estate. They are concerned about the effect on the structural integrity of the Barbican estate from the proposed tunnelling works and particularly from the proposed construction of the cross-over cavern under the estate. In the short term, their concerns include the environmental impact of the noise, dust, vibration and traffic congestion over the next three or four years, which are inevitable in any Crossrail development work. They are keen that the Bill should contain rules that will constrain construction activities to offer no less protection than those that apply to other contractors working in the City of London. I have continually heard concern expressed about the long-term consequences of the operation of Crossrail for the immediate environment, including the effects of noise and vibration from the operation of the railway, and that Crossrail should be designed, constructed and maintained in order to minimise the risk of such effects.

It has been a pleasure to have had an opportunity to put some of our concerns on the record. I appreciate that inevitably such debates become parochial—we are all describing the concerns that affect our constituents—but we should raise our sights a little, and in particular to the long-term benefits of Crossrail.

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): I thank the hon. Gentleman for the eloquent case that he has made for his constituents—not least for the huddled masses of the vast, echoing council estates of north Mayfair, whose denizens eke out a miserable existence. Does he accept that exactly the same was said at the time of the Jubilee line extension and the Victoria line works? Who remembers the inconvenience of that work and who nowadays ignores the great benefits and advantages that that has brought us? Does he not agree that, to use an infelicitous phrase, it is a price worth paying?

Mr. Field: That is entirely fair. I was coming to precisely that. We must raise our sights beyond some of the inevitable concerns expressed by our constituents. We should not ignore them and we want to do our best to mitigate them, but we must look at the long-term benefits—and we stand to experience some tremendous benefits from Crossrail. Much of my concern centres on the funding, because it is not clear where that will come from, but there is little doubt that the project will be of real benefit not only to all Londoners but to many from all parts of the country. If we are to maintain our strength and force as a global commercial city, without which this country would face grave problems, we desperately need to ensure that the project goes ahead.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman has made an excellent speech and he has put the case for his constituents—for example, in the Barbican—and the need for the quality of the work, and the sensitivity with which it is done, to be of a high standard. Does he agree that the best way to achieve that is for the construction labour force to be fully trade unionised? That would improve health and safety, as well as the quality of the work.

Mr. Field: We have had such a harmonious debate and I thought that it would end on a wonderful note. I will allow the hon. Gentleman to look after his own manor. He will, no doubt, wish to speak on Thursday when we discuss the Olympic bid, if he is not doing more sensible things such as going to the test match. He must be very proud that we won the 2012 Olympic bid and I am sure that he will ensure that all the workmen who will build our new Olympic stadium are highly unionised. I hope that he will allow a more free-market approach to what happens in my constituency when it comes to Crossrail.

I have now said more than enough. I thank the House for its indulgence and I hope that the Bill gets a Second Reading. However, the debate has raised some serious concerns and I hope that the Minister will take them on board not only when he winds up tonight, but—more importantly—in the months and years ahead.

8.56 pm

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): I am delighted to have this opportunity to speak in this debate, because I want to speak up for south-east London, which has long been forgotten in terms of transport infrastructure. As I have said on many occasions, we do not have direct access to the London underground. Much investment across London goes into the underground and much of the debate about London's transport is concerned with it. However, many parts of London are not served by it and we rely heavily on Network SouthEast and, where that fails, the only alternative for travel from my constituency to central London is the car. We also have over-congested roads.

Crossrail is essential to the future of London's transport network. If London is ever to make a significant attempt to meet the future needs of its commuters, the scheme is essential. However, it must be properly planned and the wider benefits for the entire community must be taken into account, not just for those in the Thames gateway or further along the Thames corridor. It has long been the experience of people from my constituency that they look on as developments take place along the riverfront. Such developments are welcome, but the planning for those schemes includes little thought about how the wider community can link into those schemes and benefit from them. London has been dogged for too long by such second-rate planning, with too often the cheapest option taken and the wider benefits unconsidered.

The population of London is projected to grow by 800,000 by 2016, and jobs in London will increase by 600,000 by that time. Along with that growth will come the demand for extra capacity on our transport network. It is estimated that Crossrail will provide some 40 per cent. of the extra capacity that London will need. It will more than double capacity through the central London corridor that is currently provided by the London underground and it will reduce journey times by up to 40 per cent. However, that does not mean that Crossrail should go ahead regardless of the wider concerns of many parts of London.

Most of the jobs that will be created over the next 10 or more years will be in the Thames gateway area, the Isle of Dogs, the City, the west end and around Heathrow. Crossrail will be vital for people who want to access these areas. Most of my constituents currently travel towards central London. In the past, London had a transport network that was rather like spokes of a wheel. People have been living in suburbs and have travelled in on rail networks. If they were lucky enough to live near the tube or "on the tube", they travelled by that means into central London. The development of the Thames Gateway and east London will change that fundamentally. I am already being approached by people who want to work on the reconstruction that is taking place in the Thames Gateway area. They want access to the Thames Gateway for training so that they can have the opportunity of taking the jobs that will be available.

The future travel patterns of people from my part of London will change completely as development gathers pace. The need to travel north across the river and possibly go east, rather than west into central London, will become more common. Crossrail needs to recognise the change that will take place.

The cost of introducing a station along the Crossrail route after it has been built would be extremely costly. That is why I want to draw attention to the amendment that was tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), although it was not selected. He asks in that amendment for a railway station at Woolwich to accommodate the future needs of people from south-east London who will need to have access to the Thames corridor and the Thames Gateway area, to travel to the wider areas to which Crossrail will offer connections. We need a station at Woolwich.

Woolwich is in a strategic position in south-east London, where it could become a transport hub for that area. It makes no sense to bypass a strategic centre. It would make a mockery of the transport policies that have been published over many years, which are full of well-meaning statements about integrated transport, if we did not take the opportunity to make Woolwich a transport hub. We have the opportunity for a major infrastructure development to do just that, to become an integrated transport hub for an area of London that for too long has been deprived.

The proposals are for Crossrail trains to travel past Woolwich, the first stop south of the river being Abbey Wood. I welcome the fact that there is to be a station at Abbey Wood. However, that cannot be considered to be a strategic location for a major station and a major development such as Crossrail. Woolwich is bypassed because it is cheaper to do so. Such second-rate planning has dogged us for too long.

Woolwich is served by 18 bus routes, plus two night buses. The docklands light railway will arrive in Woolwich in 2008–09. The Royal Arsenal is being rebuilt. It is already home to thousands of people who live in the new buildings, and there are thousands more to come.

For too long the needs of south-east London have been overlooked. Twelve of London's most socially deprived wards are in the area around Woolwich. The fact that the east Thames corridor has been overlooked for too long is recognised in the Thames Gateway development programme. We cannot overlook the level of deprivation that exists south of the river in areas such as the one that I represent. If my constituents cannot access Crossrail, they will suffer enormously as developments along the Thames Gateway take place. I have already mentioned that we do not have direct access to the London underground system. We also face the problem of a lack of planning for surface transport. For example, we have seen no major developments in bus networks.

Last week, I spoke to a group of young people who were hanging around in my constituency and asked them what they did with their time. Our local cinema is close to North Greenwich station, which is in the north of my borough. I asked, " Do you ever go down to the cinema? Do you ever make your way down to the new facility there?" They said, "It is too far. The bus takes too long." We have had the Jubilee line in my borough for more than five years, but there is no direct bus link. If those young people wanted to use our local bus network to travel to the cinema close to North Greenwich station, it would take two hours out of their day. No young person will consider that. A commuter travelling to London to work will not consider that transport as an option, so a heavy burden is placed on the south-east rail network, on which there is too much reliance. It is frequently overcrowded and that forces people on to our roads. Larger schemes such as Crossrail must meet the wider needs of existing communities as well as communities that will be developed along the Thames Gateway. Buses are not regarded as an alternative for travelling into central London, so access to Crossrail is essential if we are to provide a decent transport network for people in south-east London.

The Thames Gateway is one of the biggest regeneration areas in Europe. A total of 200,000 homes will be built there, and there is capacity to build 30,000 more homes than are envisaged in the Government's housing strategy. Some 150,000 jobs will be developed in the area. Inevitably, people focus on the Thames Gateway when they talk about Crossrail, but we must look at the wider community. According to the Thames Gateway partnerships, development will benefit south-east London, but that depends on how we define south-east London. History teaches us that if we do not pay attention to problems at the outset it is expensive to put them right after the development is complete. The docklands, for instance, were developed before the docklands light railway was built. The Jubilee line was built through the docklands much later. The lack of public transport infrastructure proved to be a major fault in the development of the royal docks and it was some time before people could experience the wider benefits of the area.

I can only demonstrate what we are planning to do with Crossrail by making a comparison with the opening of the Hammersmith and City line. Imagine the trains on that route failing to stop at Hammersmith broadway and the line ending at Ravenscourt Park. Such a proposal would be met with derision. Similarly, if trains on the Jubilee line did not stop at Canary Wharf, people would wonder about the benefits of such a transport link for the communities it was intended to serve. The failure of Crossrail trains to stop at Woolwich will have a similar effect on south-east London. The area has been a poor relation of public transport development in south-east London for far too long, and we will not countenance a failure to develop Crossrail there.

Woolwich is not included in the proposals because of cost—it is not because of a lack of demand. Crossrail's own briefing says:

"Crossrail will establish a brand new network of services linking areas across London and beyond. This will allow existing suburban rail services to run through London, reducing overcrowding on Underground lines and reducing congestion at a number of busy national rail stations."

We must make that statement come true. We cannot allow the development of Crossrail to bypass people in south-east London. I sincerely hope that the Select Committee will take on board the arguments in favour of a station at Woolwich on the Crossrail line, and that the Bill will be amended accordingly.

9.9 pm

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Con): London is a world city, and as we are competing against New York and Tokyo it is important to take note of the improvements that have been made to the connections between the mass transit system in New York and one New York airport and the augmentation of the coach system in Japan with a direct rail link into Tokyo station. Even Norway has built a rail system that runs from Gardamoen to Oslo and beyond.

I am an enthusiastic supporter of the Bill, as it provides the prospect of a direct link from Heathrow to the City of London. The City of London Corporation has long lobbied strongly on behalf of Crossrail.

Other benefits will come. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas) was right to point out that the potential benefits go beyond the dry language of regeneration. For example, the London Development Agency is promoting the Thames gateway, and Crossrail offers the prospect of significant development there. It will promote further growth along the corridor beside the Thames valley, even if my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) is concerned that the system will provide only 19th-century style parliamentary trains.

Mr. Scott: Does my hon. Friend agree that despite the many difficulties pointed out in the debate and questions about the remit of the Committee, the benefits of Crossrail for regeneration and jobs, and the difference that it could make to constituencies such as mine in Ilford, North can only be a good thing?

Mr. Pelling: Indeed. It is important not to forget the positive elements of the Bill, and I know that my hon. Friend is very positive about the impact that Crossrail would have on Ilford, North.

A substantial part of the Bill deals with the schedule of works and the number of shafts that will be driven down through London streets. That leaves the Government with the conundrum of when to proceed with the project, subject of course to financing. It is difficult to see it being a strong point for London if visitors to the London 2012 Olympics would be subject to such constraints. It is important to bear in mind that the proposals for Crossrail come forward at a time when Thameslink 2000 is still on the books as a project for London. The Thameslink project is further advanced in the planning approval process and the planning inspector has concluded that that scheme will be beneficial. His concerns relating to specific issues at Blackfriars, London Bridge and Borough market have been dealt with. Crossrail cannot be completed by 2012, but the Thameslink project could well be completed by then and provide beneficial links with the Olympic Javelin service to and from St. Pancras.

Improved passenger distribution from the King's Cross-St. Pancras hub would link in well with the cross-channel rail link domestic services coming in in 2009, as well as providing greater capacity for the north-south axis, which is important for London's transport. Greater capacity will also be provided on the heavily congested lines around London Bridge, a major pinch-point on the existing rail network. That is important to my constituents in Croydon.

It is good that the Bill reflects a strong intention to consult transport providers and Transport for London. In the name of joined-up government, there should also be consultation with the Olympic development authority and with transport users through the London Transport Users Committee. I listened carefully to the comments of the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) about proper compensation. I hope that within the lines of deviation that are provided for in the Bill, flexibility will be possible, bearing in mind the effects of the Croydon Tramlink Act 1994 and the fact that people outside the lines of deviation have yet to receive any compensation whatever, even though the tram system has been in place for some time.

Other hon. Members have referred to Crossrail falling within the ambit of the Greater London authority and the Mayor, and clauses 46 and 53 allow the Government to devolve that responsibility to the Mayor. Given the Mayor's ambition to have a London rail authority, will the Minister explain in his winding-up speech whether the Government want the Mayor's ambit to extend beyond Greater London, if the line runs from Shenfield to Maidstone or, indeed, Reading?

9.15 pm

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): I will not detain the House, but I want to make some general comments about the Bill before turning to some specific concerns about Crossrail's impact on my constituency, which contains Reading station. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) for their support for Reading as the western terminus, and I am also grateful to those hon. Members who signed my early-day motion to that effect.

Nobody doubts that the construction of an east-west railway across London will have powerful economic benefits for London, and I strongly support that element of Crossrail, but the project misses a once-in-a-generation opportunity to serve the needs of the wider south-east, to which it could bring substantial economic and environmental benefits.

I understand that Crossrail is a metro scheme, not a regional commuter scheme, which exists to support the Mayor's transport strategy, but I am not sure whether that should be the case. Its scope should be much more ambitious—I would prefer a regional service linked to major transport hubs, which would make economic and environmental sense. Crossrail will not serve new and growing population centres, so the projected additional revenues barely cover the projected additional operating costs. A potential nightmare scenario involves more traffic on regional roads outside London as freight is pushed off the tracks and passengers decide that they cannot and will not accept a slow stopping service.

I am also concerned whether the project is fundable. At the moment, it will succeed only with heavy taxation of both business and individuals. Crossrail's funding gap is about £6 billion or £7 billion, although it may be more than that—my hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) has suggested that it could be as large as £15 billion or £16 billion, which is possible, and it is unrealistic to expect either business or individuals to pay such a huge shortfall. We should not forget that Londoners will probably face a substantial bill for hosting the 2012 Olympics. Perhaps the Minister will provide us with an estimate of the cost burden of both Crossrail and the Olympics on Londoners in his winding-up speech.

I am puzzled why a railway that will serve so much of east London will not include a link to London City airport, which has poor transport links. Crossrail will not integrate with the south-east's airport network—both London City airport and Heathrow have poor transport services, and Crossrail will not serve Stansted at all. Is that really the integrated transport system that this Government promise us year after year?

I was offended by the view expressed by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Slaughter). The idea that national transport hubs should only be located in London fails to take account of the important role played by the regions. I am worried about the powers that the Bill confers. The chief executive of the BAA was right to express concerns that the Heathrow Express may find itself part of a compulsory purchase order under those powers. After what happened with Railtrack, that could further undermine economic confidence in the viability of big rail projects. The powers appear to require the rail regulator to favour Crossrail above all else. That could have an enormous impact on freight and commuter passenger services, which concerns First Great Western. I seek the Minister's assurance that freight and commuter services will have full equality with Crossrail's metro service.

I come to Crossrail's significance for my constituents in Reading, East. The project's slogan—"Crossing the capital, connecting the UK"—will certainly not be believed in my constituency. It is proposed that Crossrail should go through the relatively small communities of Iver, Burnham and Taplow, terminating at Maidenhead, while ignoring Reading, a town with a population of more than 130,000 that lies only a short distance to the west. If the project really were to connect the UK, surely the fact that Reading railway station is already served by no fewer than four different franchises—First Great Western, First Great Western Link, South West Trains and Virgin Trains—would make it an attractive candidate for inclusion. Outside London, only Birmingham New Street is a busier station than Reading. My predecessor in Reading, East clearly understood that, as do those of all shades of political opinion in Reading when calling for the scheme's extension.

As the Secretary of State said, the extension of the scheme to Reading comes with a price tag. For approximately £300 million, the line between Reading and Maidenhead could be electrified—a small additional expense on a project estimated at £10 billion, but one that would bring many more passengers, and therefore revenue, with it. However, that would not be the end of the story for Reading. In addition to the electrification of the line between Reading and Maidenhead, the station would require resignalling, rebuilding to cope with the extra capacity required, and remodelling of the east and west junctions. The cost would be significant. However, the money should be provided by Network Rail, whose duty should be to upgrade Reading's platforms, signalling and junctions because it is already a bottleneck. Severe constraints on the First Great Western main line are placing serious capacity constraints on current and future rail operations on the regional and national rail network. I hope that the Minister will commit to meet me and local authority officers to discuss the funding of the expansion of Reading station.

With the UK's version of silicon valley based around Reading, our local businesses strongly require a direct link to Heathrow airport in addition to our direct link to Gatwick. The lack of such a link is a barrier to the future development of our town and the wider economy. Those wishing to travel to Heathrow via the existing rail service are forced to endure a wasted trip travelling from Reading to Paddington and then westward again on the Heathrow Express. Given such a significant and diverse business presence in my constituency and the surrounding area, the failure to provide such a link is, frankly, unacceptable. I would appreciate the Minister's thoughts on that and on how, for the sake of the Thames valley regional economy, it could be addressed.

It is extremely important to the regional economy that an upgrade at Reading is included in an improved version of Crossrail, whether now or in future. I therefore ask the Minister that the route as far as Reading be subject to safeguarding. That would give some comfort that an improved scheme may be designed to improve Reading at some point in the future. I am advised that that would require private legislation, but it would help if he could confirm that Ministers would be minded to approve such legislation.

I noted the Secretary of State's incredible contortions earlier today regarding his instruction to the Select Committee on the termini. It appears that those contortions reflected genuine disarray rather than any attempt to mislead the House. However, I believe that, as matters stand, that precludes the constituents of Reading, East from petitioning the Select Committee to change the termini. I therefore ask the Secretary of State to withdraw the instruction because my constituents should have the right to petition for an improved project and an improved deal for them.

In summary, I am far from convinced by the Bill. The Secretary of State's chaotic response has not given me further reassurance. The measure represents a missed opportunity to bring south-east rail transport into the 21st century and provide a significantly improved service. However, its main benefit is that it is before us today. The question with which I must therefore wrestle on behalf of my constituents is whether an imperfect scheme is better than none.

9.25 pm

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): The debate has been interesting, with many important contributions. Those of Back Benchers contained rather more clarity than those of Government Front-Bench Members. Let me therefore first deal with the contentious matter of the instruction.

The Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary were confused about the instruction; let me be clear. The instruction's purpose is to interpret for the Committee the principle of the Bill. The Committee will not be permitted to accept petitions that do not deal with that principle. The custom of the House is clear: those who petition the Committee must have locus standi. In other words, they must have a special or direct interest in the concerns of the Bill or the instruction.

It is not, as the Secretary of State promised earlier, the case that anyone can petition the Committee. It is not the case, as the Secretary of State pretended earlier, that the Committee can consider any matter of its choice. The Committee is strictly guided by the instruction. Let any colleagues who were seduced by the Secretary of State's silky charms—I was not, but we Taliban Tories are hard to persuade—be clear: by voting for the instruction, they narrow the terms of the Committee's consideration so that it cannot consider some of the many important concerns that my hon. Friends and hon. Members in other parties raised today.

During our interesting debate, Hans Christian Andersen was mentioned twice and Monty Python was mentioned once. Let me raise the stakes and remind hon. Members that Leonardo da Vinci once remarked:

"Obstacles do not crush me. Every obstacle yields to stern resolve."

Benjamin Disraeli said:

"The secret of success is constancy of purpose."

Yet there has been no constancy of purpose about Crossrail on the Government's part. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) noted, the management of the project to date gives rise to great concern. Those concerns are not confined to the Opposition. Labour Members, businesses in London, commuters and the affected communities have raised anxieties about a wide range of issues.

Perhaps the most profound concern is the doubt about the funding of the project. As I said earlier, in a written question only a week ago, I asked the Under-Secretary for the latest estimated cost of the Crossrail scheme. He suggested that it was £10.29 billion. Yet today, the Secretary of State said that it was likely to be £15 billion or £16 billion. It has risen by between £5 billion and £6 billion in the space of a week.

Mr. Darling: The figure of £10.2 billion was at 2002 prices, as was made clear. The reply refers to the last assessment, which was made in 2004. The price that I cited earlier is in cash terms and reflects the fact that construction did not start in 2002 but would start, on the current plans, in 2007. The prices are consequently increased. I was therefore giving the House the up-to-date cash position. I reiterate that the figure of £10.2 billion was at 2002 prices.

Mr. Hayes: So we can take from that, given the rate of inflation between 2002 and today, that the prices have not simply gone up as one might expect, but spiralled.

Mr. Darling: No, the hon. Gentleman is wrong about that. The prices reflect the fact that the construction of Crossrail would, on any view, take place over many years. So some of the money would not actually be paid until the far end of the period. In order to get a cash figure, therefore, we needed to make a calculation as to how much would be involved. The price that I quoted simply reflects the fact that one set of prices was at 2002 prices, and what I was giving the House was the cash figure that we estimate today. That is the reason for the difference. This is a perfectly conventional way of doing it, but it is important that the House should get the right picture.

Mr. Hayes: That is true. Hon. Members will understand our scepticism on this point, given the earlier confusion in the Secretary of State's mind about the instruction. They will understand if we are rather doubtful about some of the figures that he is now presenting to us. I would say to him as kindly as I can that, had we had a better defined business plan and better defined budgets, and had potential investors had a clearer understanding of the vehicles that they might use to invest in the project, the Government would not be in the mess that they are in today.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: No, I must move on. I am going to mention the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) favourably in a moment. He might want to intervene on the back of those compliments, rather than in haste now.

Had the Government been more precise about some of the matters that I have just mentioned, much of the doubt and speculation that their uncertainty has inevitably fuelled would not have arisen. The Secretary of State may shake his head, but I have met many people associated with Crossrail—as he and the Minister will have done in the course of their business—both from the railway industry and from London business, who endorse the fact that there is a lack of clarity. The right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich made an important contribution earlier. He said that we must be careful about what he described as counterproductive cost-driven delays. He went on to say that elements of the project that were eliminated to save money might in the end deter investment. Those were profound points that the Government would do well to note. I have never understood why the right hon. Gentleman now finds himself on the Back Benches.

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I put it to him, however, that before he starts throwing stones at the Government over Crossrail, he might like to ponder his own party's record on the issue, and the uncertainty that was created in the 1990s when the Bill did not proceed because of administrative confusion and a lack of leadership from the party of which he is a member.

Mr. Hayes: The House would not want me to delve into the realms of ancient history when we have important matters before us to consider tonight.

There are real doubts about the funding of the project. There are even more profound doubts—I almost hesitate to say it—about when the Treasury really backs it. I have no doubt about the commitment of the Secretary of State and his ministerial team, but is the Treasury really behind the project? As Thomas the Tank Engine might have said, this is a case of "Hurry up, Gordon!"

There is also considerable concern about how the construction of the project could disrupt other services. The rail industry estimates that the construction will affect 2,200 freight, commuter, long-distance passenger and airport services per day, along two principal routes. In particular, freight terminals along both routes could suffer significant disruption. On the Great Western route, 12 terminals, mostly on slow lines, would be permanently affected. My hon. Friends the Members for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) and for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), and the hon. Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter) made the point that there is a real issue of disruption caused by displacement. We heard that that could even have an effect as far afield as Norwich and Oxford. The idea that this project should be considered solely as a metro service, and solely as the concern of London, when it has these wider implications, is way off beam.

In addition, a number of constituencies will be particularly affected. In the west, Crossrail will terminate in Maidenhead, which has an extremely busy commuter station served by fast and semi-fast trains at peak times. As my right hon. Fried the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) made clear, the introduction of Crossrail not only threatens to replace those with a slow stopping service, but might reduce the number of trains, and worst of all damage that aesthetic masterpiece, the Brunel bridge. Can we really ask the people of Maidenhead to endure this for five or six years for a worse service than they have at the moment?

Mrs. May: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reiterating the points that I made earlier about the impact of Crossrail on Maidenhead. The residents of Maidenhead will not only get a worse service and have to suffer the view of Brunel's bridge being destroyed by the electrification gantries, but the station at Maidenhead will have to be completely redeveloped. At the moment, there is no feeling that there is even the space available for the proposed depot. Is not that yet another reason why the line should go to Reading rather than stopping at Maidenhead?

Mr. Hayes: As the hon. Member for Reading, West and my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson) said, there is a case to be made for that, and the Select Committee should certainly consider it, which is precisely the argument of a variety of Members in relation to its remit and terms of reference. When I heard the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead, I thought to myself, "With a determined and articulate representative like that, it is no wonder that she saw off the Liberals in Maidenhead and will always do so when the test comes."

Speaking of Liberals, there are a variety of local environmental concerns, and the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) pointed them out. There are also fears that far from being a regional railway, Crossrail is now a metro scheme—no longer part of an integral railway network. Some say that the project is increasingly being driven by the Mayor of London—hardly the best person to deliver a train service to the people of Berkshire, Essex, Kent or elsewhere.

There is much local opposition to the proposed 24-hour maintenance depot at Rush Green. The petition had 2,302 signatories, and what a feisty campaigner they have in my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell). I tell him, the people of Romford and the House that when we are returned to office, which will be before the project starts if this Government have anything to do with it, we will reprieve the people of Romford and consider seriously the alternative highlighted tonight by my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles)—the North Pole depot west of Paddington. When the Eurotunnel rail link is complete, that depot will become vacant, and it seems to be a suitable alternative to blighting the lives of the people of Romford, as has been properly drawn to the House's attention.

In an intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) expressed concerns about Heathrow. The BAA has expressed its concern:

"The Bill as drafted, combined with Crossrail's projected services, would decrease the proportion of rail passengers travelling to Heathrow."

According to a preliminary study by an independent transport consultant commissioned by the BAA, the replacement of the dedicated non-stop Heathrow Express services with stopping Crossrail services could result in the loss of 3 to 4 per cent. of Heathrow airport's public transport share. Such a result would mean that the objective increase in public transport access to the airport as required by the Government's White Paper, 2The Future of Air Transport", would not be realised. The current proposals will take over paths and platform space already safeguarded by BAA for the Airtrack project which would link Heathrow with Waterloo for the first time. Moreover, terminal 5 does not have the capacity to accommodate the Heathrow Express and Crossrail. Crossrail's proposal therefore implies that either Airtrack or Heathrow Express to terminal 5 is no longer possible. Surely it is not too much to ask that we maintain good public transport access to Heathrow airport.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton said, the Bill as currently drafted threatens fundamental principles of independent regulation—another point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead and others. The powers under the Bill, if exercised, could negatively affect Network Rail's ability to deliver services and challenge the wider principles of independent regulation. That would threaten business confidence, with wider implications for future private sector investment.

The Crossrail Bill also creates a potential conflict. It instructs the Office of Rail Regulation to give priority to Crossrail. Clause 15 of the Olympics Bill, however, would place the ORR under an obligation to assist in the development of the Olympics, with a clear implication that it should give priority to the Olympics. Which is to come first? We heard nothing about that from the Secretary of State. Will the Minister clarify the matter, as I would have expected the Government to be absolutely clear about how Crossrail and the Olympics interact and overlap?

The Bill also threatens the expropriation of private property rights. It gives the Secretary of State power to take over, without compensation, Heathrow Express, in which BAA has invested around £750 million over the past decade.

The Select Committee must be allowed to satisfy itself in regard to: concerns about Crossrail's construction; powers taken under the Bill; and railway planning in the context of the Olympics. That is why we tabled our instruction to the Committee. The Government must address other important questions. What potential is there for capacity growth? Have the Government affirmed tonight that Reading remains the objective beyond Maidenhead, or have they merely confused the House because of their own confusion? Does the increasing involvement of the Mayor of London mean that Crossrail will remain a metro service, or will it eventually serve regional needs?

It is claimed that Crossrail will provide indirect benefits by releasing capacity at Liverpool Street station so that more trains can run from the Lee valley to Stansted. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire pointed out, train operators have said that that will not work because the route is already at the limit of its capacity elsewhere. Is there potential for capacity to expand to services to Stansted and other growth areas?

In his opening statement, the Secretary of State said very little that could remove the uncertainty surrounding the funding of the project. In public, business leaders say they are behind the project, and indeed they and we remain behind it in principle. In private, however, they tell me of their grave concerns about their contribution. It is not simply a question of size; they are also concerned about whether they will have a meaningful say in the project's management. If business is expected to make a major contribution, it will expect to have some say in the governance of Crossrail. I do not think that that is unreasonable, but the Government and Crossrail have only just addressed the issue.

We must get this project right. If Crossrail does not happen, that will undermine business confidence and the Government's ability to deliver part-funded infrastructure projects in the future. We know that the Government have committed themselves in a very significant way. An investigation of Crossrail in 2004 revealed that 265 staff members were involved in planning the project. According to another investigation, rents on prestige offices in St James's park for Cross London Rail Links, the parent company, were costing £745,000 a year. In answer to a question that I tabled recently, the Minister said that in the last financial year those office costs had trebled to

[Mr. Hayes]

£1,907,000. He also revealed that his Department had spent £1,937,000 on consultancy in the last financial year, in answer to a question that I tabled on 12 July.

Peter Luff: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hayes: I happily give way to my hon. Friend, very briefly.

Peter Luff: I know that Superlink is controversial in this place, but can my hon. Friend tell me how much public money has been dedicated to it?

Mr. Hayes: I understand that the Superlink project is privately funded and I have met representatives. I do not necessarily share my hon. Friend's unbridled enthusiasm for the project, but it is important for the Select Committee to consider all the issues in our instruction, with its broader remit—as opposed to the narrow, blinkered approach recommended to the Committee by the Secretary of State and his colleagues.

Crossrail has been spending £1 million a week for the last three years, and now it wants even more money so that it can do the same for the next three years. Yet we do not know whether digging will ever begin on either of the two tunnels, or whether a single piece of track will ever be laid. There is still no clarity, there is still no business plan, there is still no well-defined vehicle for investment, and there is still no certainty about the budget. Perhaps it is the Treasury's doubts about the scheme that threaten to undermine it. Those doubts will surely grow in the light of the successful Olympic bid.

We will vote with the Government tonight because—like the hon. Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas), the hon. Member for Eltham (Clive Efford), my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire and most other Members who have spoken—we believe that an east-west link for London is vital to Londoners' quality of life and the economy of London. Londoners, however, deserve better than the mixture of muddle and delay that has characterised the Government's approach to this project—and throughout that time, millions of pounds of taxpayers' money has been spent. I suspect that under the present Government Crossrail will remain a ghost train on a phantom line.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): I am grateful to hon. Members for this valuable debate. There have been a number of contributions and I shall attempt briefly to deal with them. Our debate is not the end, but the beginning of the process. We have had a good debate and seen wide support throughout the House for the Bill. Members brought up issues that concerned them either in their own constituencies or in a wider context.

When the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) opened for the Opposition, he seemed very supportive of the Bill, but the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) seemed unable in his wind-up speech to enumerate any reasons why the Conservatives were supporting the Bill. He advanced reasons for being against the Bill and then said that the Opposition were going to vote in favour of it in principle. It was strange that he spent so much time doing that. I do not know whether he wants to provide any reasons for supporting the Bill now.

The concerns expressed by hon. Members and their constituents will be given a fair hearing before the Select Committee, which will consider all the material put to it in its quasi-judicial role. Those directly affected by the Bill will be able to petition against it and, if successful, their case will heard by a Select Committee both in the House and in the other place.

I want to respond to points made in the debate about the petitions and the instructions. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, it is for the Select Committee to consider the petitions that come before it. The Government have tabled an instruction that sets out the specific proposition of running a railway between Maidenhead in the west and Shenfield and Abbey Wood in the east, with intermediate stations. The purpose of the instruction is to give the Committee a clear sense of the shape and form of Crossrail. The Secretary of State made it clear on several occasions that he expects the Select Committee to be able to consider representations about and objections to the route. If the Select Committee believes that the objections have merit, it can report them to the House. The Secretary of State spelled out that the Government have chosen to take a light-touch approach to the instructions, so I expect the Committee to consider any representations that it receives. I want to make it clear that, if the Committee thinks that it cannot consider any matters that it judges have merit, the Government will be prepared to consider the terms of the instruction so that the House has every opportunity properly to discuss the Bill.

Mr. Duncan: That is very confusing. What the House says does not depend on what Ministers then say can happen but on what this House says Ministers and Committees can do. Has the Minister confirmed with the Clerks of the House that what the Secretary of State says is right—that those who petition to say that the route should be extended to Reading can be entertained? Can that happen or not?

Derek Twigg: Let me repeat what I said so that the hon. Gentleman understands it. I am making it clear that, if the Select Committee thinks that it cannot consider any matters that it judges to have merit, the Government are prepared to consider the terms of the instruction so that the House will have every opportunity properly to discuss the Bill. The Select Committee can do that.

Peter Luff: That is a wholly inadequate assurance. What the Government are saying is that they might find parliamentary time if the Select Committee objects to the nature of the instruction before it, but what the House needs tonight is an assurance that the Committee can look at the Reading option. That is what the Secretary of State said in his opening speech, but the Minister is falling woefully short of that now.

Derek Twigg: We have given a clear undertaking that we believe that it can.

I would like to deal with the contributions of hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) made a point about the constituency benefits. He acknowledged difficulties around construction, but felt that the benefits outweighed them. He was glad to support the Bill, although he was aware that some petitions might come from his constituency. Despite the instruction, he felt that there were clear benefits from the Bill. He specifically mentioned the overcrowding of the Central line and stressed the importance of it being part of an integrated network.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) made a powerful speech about several issues in his constituency, particularly about the need for a Woolwich station. As he knows, there has been considerable discussion about that. Concerns have been expressed in his constituency—my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Clive Efford) also made the point in his speech—about the affordability of the development and the number of passengers who would want to use the station. It would be deep underground and the depth would obviously add to the cost. I have said, and have written to my right hon. Friend, that we shall reconsider whether the proposal is possible but, at this stage, the case has not been made.

Mr. Duncan: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. To avoid the potential for judicial review on an enormous infrastructure project, may I confirm that the advice of the Clerks given to you and Mr. Speaker matches the interpretation offered to the House tonight by the Secretary of State and the Minister?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): It is not for the Chair to give advice on the interpretation of motions.

Derek Twigg rose—

Clive Efford rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the Minister reply to the point of order?

Derek Twigg: I do not think that I can add to the comments that I made to the House a few moments ago.

Clive Efford: It is far more expensive to introduce a station after a line has been opened than while it is being constructed. We must take on board the fact that it will be too late to make a decision about the station after the line is completed. On what basis has my hon. Friend made the decision that the case has not been made for a station at Woolwich?

Derek Twigg: As I said when I was referring to the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich, we do not think that passenger numbers would justify a new station, as there are alternatives; nor would the cost, owing to the depth at which the tunnel would have to be built. However, I reassure my hon. Friend that, although we do not think that a case has been made, we shall look at the situation again, but I can give no guarantees at this stage.

Mrs. May: I am sorry that the Minister is getting so many interventions on this point, but I want to make a final attempt at clarification. It seems to me that the situation is this: the motion that we shall be asked to consider this evening states that the Select Committee cannot consider Reading as a terminus for the line; the Secretary of State, in his speech, said that the Select Committee can consider Reading as a terminus for the line; the legal advice from Officers of the House is that the Select Committee cannot consider Reading as the terminus for the line; the Minister has just said that the Select Committee can consider Reading, but it might not think that it can consider Reading in which case it can ask the Government if it may consider Reading. Will the Minister please clarify the situation?

Derek Twigg: We believe that it could. If the Committee comes back to us, we shall consider its recommendations.

Mr. Duncan: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. We are receiving conflicting advice and the House is very confused. I think it needs guidance from the Chair on what the motion actually means. Ministers are saying one thing, but we believe that the advice we are receiving from Clerks may say something else. It is therefore, I suggest, a matter for the Chair to give guidance to the House about what we are actually voting on and what it will mean in practice. May I seek guidance from the Chair about whether we can or cannot consider Reading under the motion before us?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Government laid the motion before the House and it will be the responsibility of the Committee to interpret it, with advice, if necessary, from the Clerks of the House.

Derek Twigg: I shall continue to reply to the constituency issues that hon. Members have raised.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) raised several issues about the role of Network Rail, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear earlier. My hon. Friend also referred to the effects on services and freight. That again was made clear earlier: we do not expect major effects on freight. There will be issues to consider during the construction phase, but we shall be talking to all partners and all bodies to move the process forward and come to agreement through negotiation. The compensation levels that he mentioned will be set as per the standard compensation arrangements.

The right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) mentioned the Reading issue, so let me make it clear why we have not included Reading. Obviously, we shall consult on that process, but we believe that the case is not made because of the passenger numbers and because we do not believe that passengers from Reading would use that service when they can use a non-stopping service to Paddington.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas) made a powerful point about economic development and regeneration and one of the many benefits of Crossrail is that it will contribute to the regeneration of large parts of London, particularly the east of London. He made the point about capacity and population movements and the importance of transport in that respect.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): I have listened intently and patiently to the debate and understand why most hon. Members have spoken about how this project affects their constituencies. However, I would like to ask about the national benefits. How many jobs would be created over the lifetime of the project and would the Government be able to legislate to ensure that UK companies are looked upon favourably in the tendering process?

Derek Twigg: No, we cannot legislate, but my hon. Friend raises an important point. Obviously, the chief beneficiaries are London and the south-east, but Crossrail has national benefits in terms of access to London, which hundreds of thousands of commuters use each day coming from different parts of the United Kingdom. Jobs will be created in construction and people will be employed in and around London and elsewhere as a result of the awarding of contracts, so there are national benefits that provide employment around the country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Slaughter) asked about airport access and BAA. There are issues there and we are talking to BAA. In fact, I recently wrote to the chief executive to discuss the concerns that BAA had.

The hon. Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell) mentioned the potential loss of playing fields in his constituency. There will be discussions with the London borough of Havering about how those effects might be mitigated. I understand the environmental issues that he raised that affect his constituents and I am sure that he will petition strongly during the Select Committee process.

It is important to remind the House of the benefits that Crossrail will bring. I have touched on some briefly but I want to continue to outline some of those that contribute to the Bill's importance. First, Crossrail will support the development of London as a world city and its role as the financial centre of the UK and Europe. Secondly, it will support the economic growth of London and its key regeneration areas by tackling congestion and the lack of capacity on the rail network. Thirdly, it will improve rail access to and across London, reducing existing journey times.

But Crossrail is a project of national significance.

Mr. Duncan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way one more time?

Derek Twigg: No.

Mr. Duncan rose—

Derek Twigg: No. I am not giving way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. It is becoming clear that the Minister does not intend to give way at the moment.

Mr. Duncan: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is a serious point. We are in a very grey area between what the Minister is saying and what the House believes it may be voting on. All I am saying is, may I, through you, invite the Minister to make it absolutely clear that petitions can include Reading, so that there is no doubt in the eyes of tonight's proceedings or potential judicial review about what we are voting for?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is making but that is rather more a matter of debate at this stage than a point of order. But perhaps the Minister would like to respond.

Derek Twigg: No, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have made the position very clear. [HON. MEMBERS: "No, you have not."] I am not going to go over the ground again. In terms of the transport benefits, Crossrail will enable better access to the capital for the hundreds of thousands of workers who commute into London every day and provide strategic interchanges for local, national and international business and leisure activities. I commend the Bill to the House.

CROSSRAIL BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Crossrail Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenditure incurred by the Secretary of State in consequence of the Act, and

(b) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other enactment.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

CROSSRAIL BILL [WAYS AND MEANS]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Crossrail Bill, it is expedient to authorise the making of provision about income tax, corporation tax, capital gains tax, stamp duty, stamp duty land tax and stamp duty reserve tax.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

CROSSRAIL BILL [SELECT COMMITTEE]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Order [this day],

That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of 10 Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection.

That there shall stand referred to the Select Committee—

(a) any Petition against the Bill presented by being deposited in the Private Bill Office at any time not later than 16th September 2005, and

(b) any Petition which has been presented by being deposited in the Private Bill Office and in which the Petitioners complain of any amendment as proposed in the filled-up Bill or of any matter which has arisen during the progress of the Bill before the Select Committee, being a Petition in which the Petitioners pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel or Agents.

That, notwithstanding the practice of the House that appearances on Petitions against an opposed Private Bill be required to be entered at the first meeting of the Select Committee on the Bill, in the case of any such Petitions as are mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) above on which appearances are not entered at that meeting, the Select Committee shall appoint a later day on which it will require appearances on those Petitions to be entered.

That any Petitioner whose Petition stands referred to the Select Committee shall, subject to the Rules and Orders of the House and to the Prayer of his Petition, be entitled to be heard by himself, his Counsel or Agents upon his Petition provided that it is prepared and signed in conformity with the Rules and Orders of the House, and the Member in charge of the Bill shall be entitled to be heard by his Counsel or Agents in favour of the Bill against that Petition.

That the Select Committee have power to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House, to adjourn from place to place and to report from day to day the Minutes of Evidence taken before it.

That three be the Quorum of the Select Committee—[Mr. Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

CROSSRAIL BILL [INSTRUCTION]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Order [this day],

That it be an instruction to the Select Committee to which the Crossrail Bill is committed—

(a) that the Select Committee, without comment, report to the House for its consideration any issue relating to the environmental impact of the railway transport system for which the Bill provides that is raised in a petition against the Bill, but which the Select Committee is prevented from considering by the practice of the House; and

(b) that, in applying the practice of the House, the Select Committee treat the principle of the Bill as including—

(i) the termini of the railway transport system for which the Bill provides, and

(ii) the provision of intermediate stations at Paddington, Bond Street, Tottenham Court Road, Farringdon, Liverpool Street, Whitechapel, the Isle of Dogs and Custom House.—[Mr. Darling.]

That Adam Afriyie, Mr Robert Flello, Dr Ian Gibson, Dr Evan Harris, Dr Brian Iddon, Margaret Moran, Mr Brooks Newmark, Anne Snelgrove, Bob Spink, Dr Desmond Turner and Mr Phil Willis be members of the Science and Technology Committee.—[Rosemary McKenna, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I ask whether you have had a request from the Secretary of State for Defence to make a statement to the House on the future of the Saxaford RAF station in Unst in Shetland? It has been reported to me today that it is the intention of the Ministry of Defence to make a statement on the future of Saxaford on Thursday, which would be the last sitting day of this Session. I am reminded of the comments of Mr. Speaker in relation to the conduct of the Ministry of Defence in dealing with the future of the RAF bases at Lossiemouth and Leuchars. The RAF station at Saxaford has been an integral and valued part of Unst's community for many years. Unst is one of the remotest—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have got the drift of the hon. Gentleman's point of order. I have no knowledge of a Minister coming to make a statement on the matter that he raises, but he has made his point and his comments are firmly on the record.

PETITIONS

Community Halls

10.32 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): This petition stems from a general concern across Castle Point about the future of community halls, a concern that I share. I am therefore delighted to present the petition tonight. Residents rightly believe that such halls belong to the people, not to the council. The council simply holds them in trust for the community, and particularly for the vulnerable groups that use them most. The council has a duty to ensure that the halls are kept in a state of good repair and can be used at reasonable cost by the community.

The petition is promoted by George Hogbin, chairman of the Triangle club, Mr. Evers, Paul Noonan and others. It reflects deeply and widely held concerns about community halls in Castle Point. It states:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of Castle Point Triangle Club for blind and partially sighted people and others,

Declares that the Petitioners are deeply concerned that Castle Point Borough Council is considering closing Swans Green Hall. The Petitioners further declare that the Hall is of great importance to them and to many other user groups.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to take steps to ensure that Swans Green Hall and other community halls in Castle Point are kept open and fully available for the groups which use them.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Rhuddlan Borough (Debt)

10.33 pm

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): In 1999, as a member of the Welsh Affairs Committee, I asked the Committee to consider the issue of Rhuddlan borough debt—a financial scandal in my constituency involving millions of pounds of European funding. The petition relates to that inquiry.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of the people of Prestatyn and Meliden and others

Declares the significance of the work undertaken by the Welsh Affairs Committee of the House of Commons in 1999 on the issue of Rhuddlan Borough debt. The Petitioners further declare that they agree with the conclusion of the report which states that "Rhuddlan did not just leave a legacy of debt, but a legacy of innovative developments. It is now up to Denbighshire County Council to promote these projects positively."

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge Denbighshire County Council to re-open the Ffrith Festival Gardens and fully utilise this public investment in accordance with the wishes of the people of Prestatyn and Meliden.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Antisocial Behaviour (Micro Bikes)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Coaker.]

10.35 pm

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise an issue that seriously concerns many of my constituents, the police and other organisations. The debate is particularly relevant as we approach the school summer holidays.

What are micfo bikes or mini motos? They are small—the diameter of the tyres is typically between 4 and 6 in. They have two-stroke engines, which means that they are capable of speeds up to 35 mph, although fitting a supercharger allows speeds up to 40 mph. That is much faster than, for example, the speed limit in home zones, which is 20 mph. They can be bought from shops, second hand or on the internet.

Micro bikes can be used on the road if the driver has the proper equipment and if they are taxed, insured and MOT-ed. I sought clarification, because a number of local people were unclear about that point, and the Department for Transport wrote to me on 15 June:

"It has always been our opinion that vehicles powered by a motor (whether combustion or electric) are mechanically propelled and therefore are defined as motor vehicles . . . This means that, in our opinion, to be used on the road mini motorcycles . . . would be required to meet all the attendant requirements under the Road Traffic Act 1988, such as compliance with stringent construction regulations, registration, road tax, insurance and MOT testing. The rider would be required to hold an appropriate driving licence"—

we will return to that point—

"and wear a suitable motorcycle helmet."

That is not happening in Plymouth.

When parents buy those bikes for their children, I am sure that most of them intend the bikes to be used legally, but unfortunately they are not. A number of parents think that the bikes are toys, but they are toys capable of 40 mph. How are the bikes marketed? In Plymouth, people tell me that retailers are responsible and provide appropriate advice when they sell those machines. At last weekend's successful Plymouth motor show, I overheard a vendor tell a potential customer that the bikes should not be used on the roads, but that advice is either not being listened to or simply being ignored.

I saw the danger posed by those bikes when I visited a park in Barne Barton in my constituency with Councillor Williams and Councillor Blackburn. It was a lovely sunny April day and the park was full of toddlers, when two mini bikes suddenly raced down the hill and through the park. They were piloted by a 10-year-old and a 14-year-old, who were completely oblivious to the fact that two-year-olds and three-year-olds have no sense of danger and would not leap out of their paths. Parents frantically pulled away their children as the bikes scooted through the park, out of the park, along a public road and back to the top of the park, where two new riders took over and did exactly the same thing.

The police were called and attended very quickly, but as soon as they arrived, the motor cyclists disappeared. One of the police officers, who was very experienced, said that he is frustrated that he cannot chase those youngsters on to the public road for obvious safety reasons—the bikes are very small and can barely be seen above a car bonnet, so the danger is all too apparent. To their credit, the police returned to the park later in the day and apprehended one of the bike users, which was a positive outcome.

The problem is extremely widespread, and I gather from colleagues that they have similar problems. In Ernesettle, I saw a father and son on public land. The son, who was six or seven years old, was admittedly fully kitted out with helmet and leathers and riding on the grass, but the father had none of those things—he had bare legs, nothing on his head, and a bike without a registration plate, and was on the public road riding alongside the child. They left as I approached.

The problem gets worse in woodland areas such as Whitleigh and Ham woods, where it starts to approach serious antisocial behaviour whereby local residents are being harassed and threatened by people using these small bikes. I shall read from a letter that was sent to me by someone who lives in the Whitleigh woods area and wrote anonymously because they were afraid of reprisals. They say:

"There is no pleasure in walking through the woods or sitting or working in the garden anymore. In fact I dread any nice weather. To invite friends round for a barbecue is totally out of the question as the motorcyclists can descend at any time and I get so frustrated and angry that there is no point in arranging anything."

The writer goes on:

"I have tried to speak to these youngsters to appeal to their good nature but they will not even speak to me but race off".

That person says that their life is being made an absolute misery. Sadly, that letter is not unique—I have had letters, phone calls and petitions on the same subject.

What should be done? There are several areas of possible action, and perhaps information that could be beefed up, and I should like the Minister to consider them. I admit that some may require interdepartmental discussions. First, although it is probably too late now, there should be an information campaign in schools, perhaps with posters. In areas where there are particular problems, letters should go home to parents explaining exactly who can use these bikes, how they should be used, and where they can be used legally, as well as the penalties for breaking the law, which can be quite severe.

Secondly, when the law is broken and the culprit is caught and convicted, of course the penalty should be paid. However, the courts need to be clear about the status of these bikes. Anecdotally, there are comments that some magistrates see them as being in a different category from full-size bikes, yet they are just as dangerous and potentially lethal. The police already have powers to confiscate them, and there is a view locally that if they have been used illegally, they should not only be confiscated but crushed and taken out of the market so that the young people who are buying them might begin to focus on just how serious offence they may have committed.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important Adjournment debate. The citizens of Coventry share many of the frustrations and inconveniences of those of Plymouth. Does she agree, and can the Minister confirm, that the police do have powers to impound bikes if fines, which can be £200, £120, £80 and £15 per day, are not paid within seven days? The bikes are being responsibly retailed, but police and magistrates are too unsure of their powers to give effect to them.

Alison Seabeck: I thank my hon. Friend for reinforcing the points that I have made. I wholly agree with him.

We have new legislation that relates specifically to antisocial behaviour and gives the police new powers in other areas over and above those specific to these machines, but they seem mainly to deal with larger groups of youths, and the bikes are often used singly or in pairs. Could riders be the subject of on-the-spot fines for using them in an antisocial, if not an illegal way? I welcome the powers that allow the police to establish dispersal zones. It may be possible for the woodlands area to become a dispersal zone but if that happened, could the behaviour within it be proscribed? Could the use of motor bikes in that area be specified or would innocent young people, who might be gathering in the woods for harmless purposes, be caught? That is the last thing I want. I would therefore welcome clarification on that.

Thirdly, I have seen no registration numbers on the bikes. I assume that, if they are to be used on public roads, they should be registered. To be honest, I have doubts about whether they should be allowed on public roads because they are invisible to most car users. I would therefore welcome it if my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary discussed with his colleagues in the Department for Transport whether we could realistically consider banning them from public roads.

Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): My roving advice bureau on the roads around Woolmore road in Erdington on Friday was dominated partly by the complaints of householders about the bikes and partly by the noise of the bikes themselves. I have serious doubts about whether they can be used safely and reasonably anywhere. They are a menace, they make an appalling noise and they must be dangerous. The message has to go to the police, local authorities and parents to use all their powers fully to clamp down on them.

Alison Seabeck: My hon. Friend's description exactly applies to my local area.

My fourth point is about adverts and whether those placed in local papers and on the internet can be controlled. To give only one example, Shop.Com advertises the machines under the heading "Boys Stuff". The opening paragraph states:

"Experience the rush of motorbike racing in the park or the garden, with no licence required!"

That encourages illegal behaviour effortlessly. I do not know how many people have gardens that are large enough for riders to achieve a speed of 35 mph but there are not many in my part of Plymouth. Simply to excite people, the advert continues:

"Serious thrillseekers and hedonists should waste no time in climbing aboard one of these."

It tells people that they can achieve

"amazing speeds of approximately 37 mph, which feels mindblowing when you're a matter of inches from the ground."

[Alison Seabeck]

It may well be mind-blowing but the thought of a child going at such a speed is terrifying.

At the very end, the advert states that it is illegal to use the bikes on the public highway but only after it has stimulated people, misled them and encouraged illegal behaviour. I would therefore like measures to ensure that, wherever the bikes are sold—in shops, second hand or on the internet—they are accompanied by a clear health warning about how and where they should be used.

Fifthly, will the Home Office please discuss with other Departments the way in which we can encourage the establishment of areas for safe, off-road use of the bikes? I have evidence from around the country of police forces—to their credit, it is largely police forces—who are trying to find venues for off-roading. The police in Plymouth are trying but the site that they found was opposed by residents on the ground of noise, which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Simon) highlighted earlier. In Torbay, PC Chris Lancaster is fighting for the young people in his area and thinks that he has found a venue. In Portsmouth, PC Andy Burnham, who is no relation to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham)—I do not believe that he has a second career—is trying to set up a summer scheme, which provides helmets and a safe venue where young people can enjoy the micro and mini moto bikes. I am sure that, when used properly, they are great fun and we do not want to spoil anybody's fun.

As the summer holidays approach, I want to put on record my genuine anxiety that some extremely serious accidents could happen. The use of the bikes has increased significantly and there is a lack of public and especially parental awareness about how they should be used legally.

As a parent, I have to say that the thought of a 10-year-old going through a public park at 35 mph with no safety equipment is shocking and frightening. I hope that the Home Office will do all that it can through its agencies to distribute information, as well as considering how we can clamp down on the illegal use of these machines without spoiling the fun of the genuine rider.

10.50 pm

Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck) on securing this debate. This is certainly one of the biggest issues in my constituency, and every other Member I have spoken to has said that it is an issue on their patch as well.

I should like to quote from a response that I received to a complaint that I raised with a local police inspector. He wrote back to say that the problem was not just in my area. I shall give just one example from my patch. I was visited at my surgery a couple of weeks ago by residents living close to the Dundridge Farm playing fields in St. George in my constituency, where motor cyclists cause a nuisance in the fields, disturbing the peace of children playing there and of people walking their dogs. They also exit the field at speeds of up to 35 mph, racing across the pavement into the road, nearly knocking down pedestrians in the process and sometimes going into the path of passing cars. It is only a matter of time before a serious accident occurs. Indeed, in Warmley, not far from my constituency, at the end of June a six-year-old boy was knocked down by a mini-motor bike driven by a 16-year-old who rode off, leaving the little boy covered in blood.

"a growing menace across the whole of Bristol",

I am pleased that the police in my constituency have assured me that they are taking the issue very seriously, and that they are using their powers under the Police Reform Act 2002 to seize bikes that are being used in an antisocial manner. They also hope to make an early example of a few offenders, so that we can mount a publicity campaign. They have told me that they want to see this issue on the front page of the Bristol Evening Post, so that they can get the message across that the activity is not only illegal in some cases but incredibly dangerous. I want to do all that I can to support them in that.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck) concluded her remarks by saying that she wanted to place her concerns clearly and firmly on record. She has done that this evening, and I congratulate her on securing this important debate and on raising these issues.

It is clear that problems associated with mini motos are on the increase, and it was made clear by the contributions from my hon. Friends the Members for Bristol, East (Kerry McCarthy), for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) and for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Simon) that these issues are also a matter of concern for their constituents. There is a range of powers that can be used to deal with the illegal use of these vehicles, especially when they are being used in an antisocial manner. However, it is clear that these powers need to be used with some urgency in some of the areas that have been mentioned.

It might be helpful if I say a little more about the type of vehicle and bike to which we are referring in this debate. The term "mini motos" covers both petrol-driven mini-motor bikes, which are fast vehicles, as well as the slower go-peds, which is the common name for electric and petrol-driven scooters. Quad bikes are sometimes classed as mini motos, but there is a fundamental difference between them, which I will explain in a little more detail later in my speech.

Petrol-driven mini-motor bikes are small bikes that replicate racing bikes and off-road scrambler bikes. They stand only 23 in high, and my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport clearly illustrated the problems that that can cause. They have an engine size of about 50 cc, and some can travel at speeds up to 60 mph, which I know will be of concern to my hon. Friend. They can cost up to £500. Go-peds look similar to the old fashioned push-scooters that you and I might remember pushing around in our younger days, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but they have an engine block around the back wheel, and can travel at speeds around 20 mph. They can cost up to £1,000. However, there are now lower-cost models on sale for around £100, and there is a growing second-hand market in all types of mini motos.

The term "mini moto" and the problems associated with their irresponsible use are relatively new phenomena. It is probably fair to say that many members of the public, particularly parents, are generally unaware of the health and safety implications of these bikes, or of the legislation governing their use. These vehicles are being sold without any age restrictions and are becoming increasingly popular among young people. Prices continue to fall and the number of retailers selling them has also increased. Currently, the majority of such vehicles are bought over the internet, through mail order and from specialist shops, but some high street stores are beginning to sell lower-priced, lower-speed models.

There is a growing sport around mini motos, but in many instances, as my hon. Friends have described, they are being used illegally. Information on the number of incidents associated with mini motos is not collected centrally by the Government, but the Home Office has received some general information on their misuse, which suggests that the problem is increasingly widespread. Colleagues in the Department for Transport are also concerned about the implications for road safety, because the majority of users are riding illegally on roads and pavements without any safety equipment. Mini motos are sold as toys and are not manufactured, licensed, taxed or insured to be ridden on a road.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck) on securing this debate, on a subject that is a huge problem in Wellingborough. I will be brief. As such vehicles should not be used on the roads, is such use to be made clearly illegal? There seem to be some doubts within the police on this issue.

Paul Goggins: I was about to clarify that point. The advice given to my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport by the Department for Transport is accurate. It is possible for a mini moto to be ridden legally on a road, but for that to happen it would have to meet certain construction standards, such as the requirements demanded by European directive 2002/24/EC. It would be prohibitively expensive to convert such a vehicle to that standard. Quad bikes, however, are built to that standard, so it is possible for them to be properly licensed and used on the road. By and large, however, mini motos are bought, sold and used as toys, and are not built to the standard that would allow them to be taxed, licensed and used on the roads.

As far as the Department for Transport is concerned, there are no age restrictions on the purchase of any motor vehicle. The restrictions are placed instead on how and where vehicles can be used. Let me make it absolutely clear, bearing in mind that mini motos are unlikely to be used legally on the roads due to the excessive cost of conversion and raising the standards as I have described, that the only place where they could be used legally is on private land and with the owner's consent, which in many instances, particularly in constituencies such as that of my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport, would be land owned by the local authority. Steps could be taken by retailers, for example, who could make information much more readily available when the bikes are purchased about the legal position on the use and requirements of mini motos. While many such vehicles are purchased by adults who then give them to their children as gifts, the relevant Departments will examine the possibility of encouraging retailers to do more about this issue.

The most commonly used legal power for dealing with mini motos is under the Police Reform Act 2002. It allows a constable in uniform, after giving a warning to the rider, to stop and seize a motor vehicle if he or she has grounds for believing that it is being used in a careless and inconsiderate manner, that it is being used illegally off-road, or that it is being used, or is likely to be used, in an antisocial manner, causing harassment, alarm or distress. If the police confiscate vehicles using that power before the owner can take back the vehicle, a release fee of around £120 must be paid. Information coming back to the Home Office suggests that that is proving to be a successful tool for dealing with misuse, notwithstanding the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-West.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Precisely on that point, will the Minister confirm that the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency—which I know is not his immediate department responsibility, but there must be liaison between the two Departments—has taken legal advice, and that because such vehicles have no tax, they categorically cannot be driven on roads, and the police therefore have absolute authority to impound them and apply the fines? Whatever we do to encourage more responsible marketing and retailing, we cannot inhibit the internet trade. The only effective measure is therefore to make defying the law prohibitively expensive. Will he clarify that?

Paul Goggins: I can certainly confirm that to be used legally on the road, such a vehicle would have to meet a high standard. It would be prohibitively expensive to convert one for the purpose. It is clear that people do not buy these vehicles intending to use them legally on the road.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: What about the tax?

Paul Goggins: The question generally does not arise, for the reasons that I have given. It is clear, however, that when the vehicles are used illegally they can be impounded. The release fee has to be paid, and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport suggested earlier, if it is not paid, the vehicle can be crushed.

When one of these vehicles is ridden on the pavement, the police can treat that as an offence under the Highways Act 1835. The maximum penalty is £500. When the rider is a child, the police may choose instead to warn him and advise his parents as necessary. The police also have powers of arrest when there are reasonable grounds for believing that such action is necessary to prevent the rider of the mini moto, or motor cyclist, from causing physical injury to himself or to any other person.

When someone commits a driving offence but does not hold a current driving licence, for example by virtue of his or her age, a court can still order the endorsement of the offender's licence. The offender may not have a licence, but when he or she applies for one, the endorsement will automatically feature on it.

Local authorities also have powers to manage such problems. They can make byelaws under section 235 of the Local Government Act 1972, prohibiting the use of mini motos, or any other vehicle for that matter, in particular areas. While byelaws cannot duplicate general legislation, they can be used to prohibit the use of mini motos in shopping-centre car parks, pedestrianised areas and the like. Furthermore, local authorities are required under section 79 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to take reasonable steps to check their areas periodically for existing and potential statutory nuisances. My hon. Friend mentioned the noise made by some vehicles. If they are causing excessive noise, a local authority can serve a noise abatement notice and can seize the vehicle that is causing the nuisance. If a person uses mini motos repeatedly and causes excessive nuisance in the community, the local authority can apply for an antisocial behaviour order to prohibit him or her from using them.

I am pleased to be able to tell my hon. Friend that last week, in response to the increase in problems associated with mini moto misuse, officials from the antisocial behaviour unit at the Home Office held an action day on the issue. It was attended by more than 100 staff from all over the country, bringing together local authorities, police and others to share ideas and good practice. The purpose was to encourage staff to take action against the misuse of mini motos, and attention was drawn to a number of specific interventions.

It is important for us to do all that we can to raise awareness of the issues, as my hon. Friend has been able to do this evening. She made some very sensible suggestions about the use of leaflets, campaigning materials and information that can heighten awareness among members of the public who may not appreciate the dangers and the legal position. I want to encourage local authorities to work with trading standards authorities, and to ensure that local retailers are acting responsibly. That may involve the production of appropriate leaflets that retailers can distribute when vehicles are sold.

It is worth engaging the support of local petrol stations, especially in areas where misuse is recognised as a problem, to ensure that petrol is not sold to anyone under 16. If under-age sales are suspected, trading standards authorities can carry out test purchasing, which may result in the removal of a licence to sell petrol. Local authorities and police can also use their reporting systems to gather intelligence if they have antisocial behaviour hotlines, or information provided through neighbourhood and community wardens. That information can be used to target problem areas with high-visibility patrols or leaflet drops.

Local authorities can also help to discourage misuse by making physical improvements to public areas. My hon. Friend suggested designating certain areas safe for the use of mini motos, and I think that that would be a good idea.

There is a great deal of work going on. If more action days are required, the Home Office will be happy to sponsor them, but I think my hon. Friend has done a service to the House and her constituents tonight. I assure her that we will keep a close eye on what happens. I hope that in the coming months we shall see a far more responsible approach—

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Antisocial Behaviour

1. Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with ministerial colleagues and the First Minister on antisocial behaviour in Wales. [12326]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary recently published new guidance encouraging councils to use publicity to help to enforce individual antisocial behaviour orders.

Mrs. Moon: My local free paper, The Recorder, carries this dire warning on its front page: "Yobs will cause a death: RNLI warns 'someone will drown' in harbour". We have a problem—I have discussed it with Phil Missen, our local Royal National Lifeboat Institution organiser—with youngsters jumping 20 ft into Porthcawl harbour in front of the lifeboat as it is launched and physically and verbally abusing the lifeboat crew. What assistance can my hon. Friend offer the lifeboat crew to protect them given that my local authority is unable to confirm long-term commitment to funds for youth organisations, even the Scouts and the Guides?

Nick Ainger: I share my hon. Friend's concern about those incidents of antisocial behaviour; clearly, this case must be tackled quickly. We have given the police and local councils the tools to do that job. Between 2003 and 2006, the safer communities fund has allocated £8 million to community safety partnerships in Wales for locally determined projects aimed at tackling antisocial behaviour. Since 2003, Bridgend has received £352,000 from the fund. We have given the tools to the police and to the local councils; those powers should now be exercised and I urge Bridgend county borough council to do so.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): One of the recent findings of the Select Committee on Wales was that there is no agreed uniform definition of antisocial behaviour. That means that residents in my constituency who live close to rugby clubs can expect antisocial behaviour and rowdiness with no action taken against the perpetrators. What action can the Minister take on having an agreed definition of antisocial behaviour so that everybody living in Wales can expect the same service and treatment from police forces?

Nick Ainger: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point. I would argue that the Licensing Act 2003 gives local residents the opportunity to object to the way in which licensed premises are being run, because it deals not only with what happens in the licensed premises but what happens around them. The Act gives people the opportunity to take up that matter with local police and the local authority, which is now responsible for licensing. Irrespective of whether we give a clear definition of antisocial behaviour, people know when they are experiencing it, and they should always report it and expect the authorities to react accordingly.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): It is right to be tough on those who make the lives of people in our communities hell through antisocial behaviour, but does my hon. Friend agree that it is also important to reward people, particularly the young, for good social behaviour? Does he further agree that it is important that when community planning for facilities is going through, young people have an input so that they feel a sense of ownership in their own community?

Nick Ainger: Yes, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. We need to talk about the carrots as well as the sticks. Local authorities are recognising the need to provide improved youth services and improved facilities for young people as an alternative to hanging around on street corners and causing trouble for local residents.

Welsh Language Schemes

2. Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): What recent discussions he has had with Cabinet colleagues and Ministers of the National Assembly for Wales on formulating and implementing central Government Departments' Welsh language schemes. [12327]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The Government believe in the principle of delivering public services to people in Wales in the language of their choice. All Departments regularly review the way in which they meet this obligation.

Hywel Williams: Twelve years on from the Welsh Language Act 1993, at least five of the great Departments of State have not produced Welsh language schemes. Will the Secretary of State institute a review of the Act and show that, at least on that issue, he is not asleep?

Mr. Hain: I will happily look into the matter but the hon. Gentleman knows that the Labour Government have a proud record of promoting the Welsh language, which is now in a healthier state than it has been for generations, with the number of Welsh speakers increasing continuously. I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman welcomed that. If any Departments are slipping from that high standard, I shall look into the matter.

Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Labour party has shown itself to be the party of the Welsh language? We have record investment and more people learning Welsh. Is not it true that Members such as my hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Mrs. Williams) have actively promoted the language and highlighted the record investment and our commitment to that important issue?

Mr. Hain: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend, who is a proud Welsh speaker from the valleys of south Wales.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Da iawn.

Mr. Hain: Indeed, da iawn, as my Parliamentary Private Secretary says. My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mrs. James) can speak with genuine authority on the matter, as can my hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Mrs. Williams), who is a proud Welsh speaker from north Wales.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Will the Secretary of State say a big diolch yn fawr to all the people who go to Welsh language schools, especially those on the Llŷn peninsula? Will he remind people that not only those who are Welsh born learn Welsh but those who recognise the traditions of Wales?

Mr. Hain: Yes, I will say a big diolch yn fawr—as big as the hon. Gentleman likes—because the Wales Office and the Labour Government are proud of the advances that have been made in the Welsh language throughout Wales. We will continue to experience such progress as long as the Government remain in power.

Single Farm Payment

3. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with the National Assembly for Wales Government on the single farm payment. [12328]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): On 4 July, I met the Assembly Minister responsible for countryside matters, Carwyn Jones, and we discussed several issues, including the single payment scheme in Wales.

Mr. Robathan: I should declare that I am a farmer and in receipt of ridiculous subsidies through the common agricultural policy. As the Minister knows, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs tells us that the single farm payment is meant to make life simpler for farmers. I am not sure whether it does, but that is the way we are going. However, Wales intends to have a different scheme. How can that be right? If something is good for me if I farm in Herefordshire, surely it must also be good if I farm across the border in Monmouthshire. Will the Minister explain matters and what the scheme will do for Welsh hill farmers?

Nick Ainger: There is a difference in the single farm payment's calculation in England and in Wales. In England, the system ultimately depends on a single, flat-rate, area payment, starting with historic payments. In Wales, we are going to stick with historic payments because Wales has so many small farms, especially in the uplands. When the discussions were taking place, it was felt that a single farm payment based on historic payments would be the best way to continue the support for Wales's small rural farms.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): The Minister knows that, in an effort to remain financially viable, many farmers are diversifying into other activities, including motor cycle off-road sports. Will he confirm that farmers will not jeopardise their single farm payments by allowing those off-road activities on their land? Will he also confirm that the promised end-of-year review will consider the rights of motor sports enthusiasts, including motor cycle off-road enthusiasts, and the economic pressures that farmers face?

Nick Ainger: I think that I can help the hon. Gentleman on the issue. Under recently updated guidance, motor sports may take place on up to 28 days during the nominated 10-month period in addition to the remaining two months of the year. The updated guidance takes on board representations from motor sports interests and is an example of the Government listening to industry.

Mr. Speaker: I call Jerry Wiggin.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall answer for him.

Wales is using the historic method for determining single farm payments, so why cannot Welsh farmers have an interim payment until the Rural Payments Agency computers are made to work?

Nick Ainger: The payments system is on target and Welsh farmers will begin receiving their single farm payments at the beginning of the window, which is December 2005.

Tax and Benefits

4. Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with Cabinet colleagues on financial support through the tax and benefits systems to parents in Wales. [12329]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I regularly hold discussions with ministerial colleagues on a range of issues, including support to parents in Wales through the tax and benefits systems. Far more parents in Wales are benefiting from the financial support under the working tax credit and child tax credit than under any preceding income-related financial support system. In 2003–04, more than 220,000 in-work families with children in Wales were benefiting from tax credits, with an average award of £2,792.

Mrs. Williams: My hon. Friend will be aware that families in Wales have widely welcomed the tax credit system, which has definitely been a contributory factor in lifting families out of poverty. However, many families are still experiencing hardship caused by errors made by Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs when calculating their entitlement. Will my hon. Friend undertake to have further discussions with his Treasury colleagues to ensure that a way is found to help those families out of their difficulties?

Nick Ainger: My hon. Friend is right to highlight the great benefit of the tax credit system to families in Wales. In her own constituency, 5,000 in-work families are in receipt of tax credits, and the average amount involved in her constituency is £3,080 per family. In relation to the problems caused by overpayment, the Government recognise the difficulties that have been caused by administrative problems in the tax credit system, but that should not detract from the fact that millions of families across Britain are much better off as a result of the system.

The Paymaster General has announced a series of measures to build on the reforms that we have already introduced, including measures to streamline the procedures for recipients to inform Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs of changes in their income, and to simplify the information provided to families. She has also announced a review of changes to the procedures for dealing with disputed awards, and I am sure that she will respond to the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Mrs. Williams), which I shall draw to her attention.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Following what the Minister has just said, does he agree that, although there have been problems in the tax credit system, we have to keep things in perspective? We need to recognise that the tax credit system is probably the most effective means that we have of tackling child poverty.

Nick Ainger: Indeed. Before 1997, when this Government first came to power, one in every three babies in Britain was born into poverty. Under the previous Conservative Government, the number of children growing up in households in which no one had a job rose to almost 20 per cent. We have not only had great economic success in creating 2 million jobs since 1997; we have also made work pay, and taken more than 1 million children out of poverty. That is a success.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): Wales has the highest rate of child poverty in the UK, affecting one in every three children. Yet Citizens Advice has recently condemned the tax credit system for being subject to "completely unacceptable errors". One in three recipients have been overpaid and pushed into deeper poverty when forced to repay the money. What will the Minister do to stop the failures of the tax credit system putting even more pressure on struggling Welsh families?

Nick Ainger: As I have already said in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Mrs. Williams), the Government are already tackling those administrative problems. Moreover, it is worth noting what Citizens Advice said in its report:

> "We firmly support tax credits as a vehicle for directing substantial extra money towards lower income families, and we want the system to work effectively for all who are entitled to the extra help."

That is something that those families are getting now, and that they never did when the hon. Gentleman's party was in power.

Bill Wiggin: A man from Bridgend reported that he had received a bill for £4,000 following overpayment of child tax credits, despite the fact that that tax credit agency admitted that he had provided the correct information at every point. Another man, from Abergele, was paid £400 too much each month, despite making numerous phone calls to query the amount that the family were being paid. Nearly 2 billion of the tax credits paid out over the past year were overpayments, and the Government are hounding people into a financial nightmare. How can the Minister expect to improve the standard of living for children in Wales if this continues?

Nick Ainger: As I said in response to an earlier question, it is clear that substantial errors have been made, and the Government do not deny that fact. The parliamentary ombudsman's report and the Citizens Advice report identified serious errors. The Government have a duty, however, to try to reclaim overpayments where it is reasonable to do so. Anyone who disputes whether they should repay such an overpayment has a procedure to follow. The Paymaster General has given assurances that she is considering those disputes procedures.

National Assembly (List Members)

5. Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): What plans he has to introduce legislation affecting the position of list Members in the National Assembly for Wales. [12330]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The White Paper "Better Governance for Wales", promises to prevent constituency candidates standing as list Members in line with our manifesto commitments.

Mark Tami: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. I am sure that he has seen the Leanne Wood guide to being a good Assembly list Member in today's Western Mail, in which she advocates avoiding casework but using the considerable budgets to employ staff only two to three days a week so that they can spend the rest of the time on political activity, and of course Leanne's golden rule:

> "On receipt of every invitation, ask 'How can my attendance at this event further the aims of Plaid Cymru?' If the answer is 'very little' or 'not at all', then a pro forma letter of decline should be in order."

Is not it time that we had an urgent inquiry into the role of these list Members, who are unelected and unaccountable?

Mr. Hain: The answer is yes. Plaid Cymru list Members have now been caught red-handed abusing the system in the Assembly. The Presiding Officer should have a proper inquiry into the abuse of taxpayers' money by Plaid Cymru list Members. These instructions from Assembly Member Leanne Wood are a consistent abuse. I will read out another example—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Secretary of State can allow the Assembly to read about the matter.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): As we all know, politics—[HON. MEMBERS: "Apologise."] May I speak? Politics is a much-maligned profession, and it is usually other politicians who do the maligning. May I suggest to the Secretary of State that his constant disparaging remarks about Assembly Members will make it difficult for us to encourage people of calibre of all parties to put their names forward for the next Assembly elections? Is that what he wants?

Mr. Hain: I am absolutely astonished. The hon. Gentleman is defending the behaviour of Plaid Cymru list Assembly Members who have abused the system. I will read out another section from the advice:

"We need to be thinking much more creatively as to how we better use staff budgets for furthering the aims of the party."

Those are the equivalent of Commons staff budgets applied to the Assembly. I and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will be taking the Government of Wales Bill through the House in the next year or so, and if the Assembly does not to tighten the rules on the behaviour of list Members and the abuse of their allowances, I might have to take powers under the Bill to do so myself.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): Given the utter contempt that Leanne Wood is showing for constituents by describing casework that a Plaid Cymru regional Assembly Member did for 2,500 constituents as a waste of time, because canvassing returns showed that few of them were inclined to vote for Plaid Cymru, will the Secretary of State order a thorough investigation into the role of regional AMs, and seek to establish whether their offices and staff are a waste of public money?

Mr. Hain: I am tempted to read out even more damaging quotes, but I will spare the House. I agree very much with my hon. Friend that this is an abuse of the system. It vindicates exactly the Government's policy of banning list Members from standing in constituencies. They must make a choice. Taxpayers will want to know that list members are not abusing the Assembly's resources, because ultimately those resources are voted by the House of Commons. I think it is time that Plaid Cymru, Liberal Democrat and Conservative Members stopped defending this outrageous behaviour by Assembly list members.

Small Firms' Organisations

6. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): What recent representations he has received from small firms' organisations in Wales on central Government regulation. [12331]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I have regular discussions with small business organisations in Wales. The latest took place as recently as last Friday, when I attended a Cardiff chamber of commerce function. There was delight at the buoyant state of the economy under this Government.

Mr. Bellingham: Is the Secretary of State aware that all the small organisations representing firms in Wales are united in their opposition to the United Kingdom giving up its opt-out from the working time directive? They believe that if we give it up, many jobs will be put at risk. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Labour MEPs have voted to give up the opt-out? What is his view?

Mr. Hain: My view is the view of the Government, as the hon. Gentleman knows very well. Last year, when he asked me the very same question, I told him that we had seen 19 consecutive months of business growth in Wales I am delighted to tell him that we have now seen 27 consecutive months of business growth in Wales. Answering his questions is a real treat.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in towns such as Wrexham, small business is doing very well thanks to innovative and exciting projects such as the new e-business incubator. We are changing the face of employment in Wrexham, so that more people are self-employed and more people are doing well for themselves. Is that not welcome, and is it not about time we started talking Wales up rather than down?

Mr. Hain: Yes, Wales is now doing better than it has for generations as a result of the economic stability established by the Government. There is a record number of jobs, more than there have ever been in our history, and business start-ups are taking place all the time, in Wrexham as elsewhere. That will ensure that the growth that has continued for the last eight years of the Labour Government will continue in the future. That is the future of Wales, which is striving to be world-class—as opposed to its miserable state under the Tories.

Police (Misconduct Allegations)

7. David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): What discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Home Affairs on the handling of misconduct allegations in police authorities in Wales. [12332]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): My right hon. Friend and I have regular discussions with ministerial colleagues. Investigations of misconduct are internal matters for police authorities to determine according to their own procedures and protocols.

David T.C. Davies: The Minister will be well aware that 13 police officers remain suspended at a cost of around £300,000 a year. Other cases have collapsed owing to lack of evidence. The clerk to the North Wales police authority has been cleared of misconduct by the courts, but has still not been reinstated. Does the Minister agree that the situation is wholly unsatisfactory, is costing large amounts of taxpayers' money and is reducing the number of police officers available to deal with the rise in crime for which his Government are responsible?

Nick Ainger: It would obviously be wrong for me to comment on any case that is currently under investigation, but the hon. Gentleman specifically mentioned the clerk to the North Wales police authority. Mr. Peter Bolton was offered reinstatement earlier this month, but is currently taking legal advice before deciding whether to accept. It is possible that the matter could be taken to court, and it would therefore be wholly inappropriate for me to comment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I call the next question, I must call for order in the Chamber. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am glad I have so much support.

Jobcentre Plus Offices

8. Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): What discussions he has had with colleagues in the Cabinet and in the National Assembly for Wales on the economic consequences of job losses in Wales caused by the closure of Jobcentre Plus offices; and if he will make a statement. [12333]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I have had regular discussions. In order to release resources to frontline services, Jobcentre Plus offices are being modernised in Wales to deliver more flexible services.

Mr. Llwyd: Is the Minister aware that 70 per cent. of jobcentre job cuts in Wales will fall within the objective 1 area? Is he aware that a few months ago my hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) and I went to see the then Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West and Hessle (Alan Johnson)? We had to produce a map of Wales to show him how the service would be decimated by the proposed cuts.

Those jobs are vital in the objective 1 areas. Time and again, the Minister says that he fights Wales's corner. When did he fight Wales's corner in this regard? Did he lie down like his supine colleagues in the National Assembly Government? When will he stand up for Wales?

Mr. Hain: I stand up for Wales every day of the week. That should be compared with Plaid Cymru, which wants to take Wales out of the United Kingdom and condemn it to misery. I should remind the hon. Gentleman that a new 300-plus-seat contact centre in Bangor—an objective 1 area near his constituency—will open next year. Staff numbers at the contact centre in Bridgend—another objective 1 area—are doubling from 150 to 300. The truth is that the picture that he paints is completely distorted, as is every other allegation that Plaid Cymru makes about Wales.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [13342] Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 20 July.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before listing my engagements, I know that the whole House will join me in sending our condolences to the families of the three British soldiers who lost their lives in Iraq over the weekend. They were doing a vital and heroic job in helping that country to democracy, and we can be very proud of them.

This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others, and in addition to my duties in the House I will have further such meetings later today.

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) raised with the Leader of the House at last week's business questions the disgracefully low pay and poor conditions endured by our parliamentary cleaners. This morning, my hon. Friend and I and other Members visited a picket line of our striking cleaners to show our solidarity with them. Will my right hon. Friend take time to ensure that representations are made to the House authorities to reach a fair and satisfactory conclusion to this dispute?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House raised this issue on colleagues' behalf at the meeting of the House of Commons Commission on Monday. Ultimately, this is a matter for the House authorities. The dispute is a commercial matter, but I understand that the House authorities continue to work with the contractors to seek a satisfactory outcome for everybody concerned.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I join the Prime Minister in the condolences that he expressed over the loss of our servicemen in Iraq. The thousands of men and women who daily risk their lives on our behalf are constantly in our minds, and we must never take what they do for granted.

May I ask the Prime Minister about the progress being made in the four areas of action in response to the tragedy of 7 July that he outlined a week ago? I welcome the meeting that we had with Muslim leaders yesterday. Can he now set out more details of the taskforce being established to take matters forward?

The Prime Minister: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for coming, with the leader of the Liberal Democrats, to yesterday's meeting. Over the next few days, those who were present at that meeting will work with the Home Secretary and the Foreign Secretary to establish a network of people who will go out into the community and take the very clear message about the mainstream Muslim community and its views throughout the country. They have also agreed to a meeting with the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, Sir Ian Blair, who raised at yesterday's meeting a very important point: the desire to make sure that sufficient numbers of people are recruited into the police from the Muslim community. He also expressed his very strong sense that, just as the police have considerably improved—I think that everyone will accept this—their community relations over the past few years, over the next few years we need to ensure that that finds its response and echo in people from the Muslim community joining the police force, and being willing to serve in it.

Mr. Howard: Last week, the Prime Minister also said that the Government would look urgently at strengthening procedures to exclude people from entering the UK who might incite hatred or act contrary to the public good, and at how those already here might be more easily deported. What progress has been made in that area and does he agree that there is room for greater use of existing powers to ban people whose presence here is not conducive to the public good?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I do agree with that. It is very important that people understand that we are a tolerant and decent country, but that the rights that we give to people here should not be abused. I am sure that that is the overwhelming sentiment of the country, so we do need to look at broadening the list of grounds for exclusion, and at using existing exclusion powers more broadly. The Home Secretary is going to make an oral statement on this issue shortly and we are also attempting to conclude memorandums of understanding with countries to which we want to return those whom we want to deport.

Part of the problem has been that, even if we wish to deport people, we have sometimes been stopped from doing so on the ground that the country to which they are to be deported may not pay sufficient regard to their human rights. However, we are trying to conclude a series of memorandums of understanding with those countries and I understand that one was concluded this morning with Jordan, which will help us in respect of certain cases.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister also referred a week ago to the need for international action, on which he has just touched. Since then, there has been a particular focus on Pakistan, where the Government and President Musharraf have pledged their full support in the fight against terrorism. Will the Prime Minister update the House on the work that is being carried out with the Government of Pakistan, including keeping the madrassahs under closer scrutiny?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I can. I have spoken to President Musharraf about it and there is a real willingness and desire on the part of the Pakistani Government to deal with the madrassahs that are preaching this type of extremism. I think that we all know that the roots go very deep and are not always to be found in our own country, but in other countries, too. We are also looking into the possibility of holding a conference that would bring together some of the main countries that are areas of concern and that have been closely involved in these issues in order to take concerted action across the world to try to root out this type of extremist teaching.

About 26 countries have suffered from al-Qaeda and its associated networks since 1993. Obviously, there is a huge well of support and understanding for the problems that we have recently faced in this country. We need to be very clear that, although the terrorists will use all sorts of issues to justify what they do, the roots of it go very deep and are often not to be found in this country alone, so international action is also necessary.

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to the Prime Minister for that answer and he will know that I entirely agree with the sentiments that he has just expressed. I also welcome the discussions that took place with the Home Secretary on Monday about counter-terrorism legislation and the Government's agreement to our suggestion that their new legislation should be considered separately from the issue of control orders. Will the Government also give further consideration to our proposals, which they have previously rejected, to allow the use of intercept evidence in court?

The Prime Minister: I am very happy to go back and consult the security services and the police about that. My own view has always been that if we can use intercept evidence, we should, because of the obvious value that it can provide in certain cases. The difficulty is that, up to now, we have been advised by the security services that the disadvantages outweigh the benefits. However, in the light of what has happened, it is obviously sensible to go back and consult them again. It is not an issue on which there is an objection of principle to using such evidence. On the contrary, as a matter of principle, I would prefer to use it rather than not use it, but we have to take account of our advice.

I understand that we are going to have a meeting next week about the new legislation. I am pleased at the progress that has been made in co-operation with the Opposition and we will have a further opportunity to run through some of these issues again. I will make sure that we can provide an update then. It is the right approach to try to take action in every single one of these related spheres: in respect of the legislation, we must ensure that it is tightened, where necessary; in respect of those who preach and incite hatred, we want enhanced ability to deport them where they are not British citizens; in respect of international action; and in respect also of our own Muslim community. We are now moving forward in the right direction on a series of fronts. Once again, I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his support, as it has been very important to send out a unified signal to the country.

Mr. Howard: I look forward to our discussions next week. The Prime Minister will know that, just two years ago, the Newton report pointed out that the Republic of Ireland is the only country with a ban as extensive as ours on the use of intercept evidence and I look forward to discussing those matters with him further next week.

Yesterday, The New York Times reported that, less than a month before 7 July, the joint terrorism analysis centre had concluded that "at present there is not a group with both the current intent and the capability to attack the UK".

Is there anything that the Prime Minister can say to put that report in context and, in the light of that report, is there any action that he intends to take to reassure people?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, JTAC staff have to make up their minds according to the information that they have at any particular time. It is important to recognise that, partly through JTAC, our security services and police do an enormous amount of work in gathering information, from our own country and from all around the world. Inevitably, they have to base their judgments on the information that they receive, but I am satisfied that they do everything possible to protect our country. Although it is terrible that the terrorist attacks in London took place, it is none the less worth pointing out that, over the past few years, our security services and police have done an immense amount to protect this country. It is important to recognise that, but of course those services are looking the whole time at ways to improve their systems.

When I visited last week, I saw for myself what an extraordinarily motivated and committed group the JTAC people are. They work literally around the clock to do their best to protect our country. Obviously, they have to make their assessments on the information that they have at the time, but it is important to make one other point as well. I shall not comment on intelligence material that is sometimes discussed in the newspapers, but I point out that JTAC staff all the time have to strike a balance in any judgment about an individual that they make. One thing is for sure: if they make a wrong assessment, they can become embroiled in arguments about interfering with people's rights, and so on, but they do everything that they can to try to protect our country. I assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the House that, from the work that I have seen, the benefit of the doubt each time is given to the protection of this country above all else.

Q2. [13343] Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab): The Healthcare Commission published its "The State of Healthcare 2005" report on Monday. The report shows that there has been a dramatic reduction in hospital waiting times and an improvement in the treatment and care of people suffering from cancer and coronary heart disease, but does my right hon. Friend agree that we need to do still more to improve health inequalities? On the Windmill Hill estate in my constituency, the Halton primary care trust has recently withdrawn GPs' surgeries. Will he join me in pressing Halton PCT to reinstate GP services, so that better health facilities can be enjoyed across the whole of my constituency? Will he also say something to encourage people to use NHS Direct?

The Prime Minister: I certainly agree that we must carry on with the improvements that are taking place. Although the Healthcare Commission report said that certain services still had a long way to go and needed to be improved, its main point is worth noting. The report states:

> "This year's report identifies much that should be celebrated. People are now able to gain access to many healthcare services more quickly and easily than in the past . . . Other improvements, such as better access to drugs and operations, are helping to produce better outcomes for people with cancer and coronary heart disease."

We are only halfway through the NHS plan that we published in 2000, so it is bound to be the case that we still have a distance to go. However, the overall picture is that the NHS is getting better all the time.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Lochaber) (LD): May I also extend my party's tributes to the families of the three British service personnel so tragically killed in Iraq as they courageously carried out their duties? Specifically on Iraq, has the Prime Minister seen or heard the rather devastating report compiled by the BBC's John Simpson about the escalating violence there? Did he hear the assertion made yesterday by Crown Prince Hassan of Jordan that he considered Iraq to be heading for civil war, and does he agree with that assessment?

The Prime Minister: No, I do not agree with that assessment, but, obviously, there is a very serious situation, particularly when, for example, one of the Sunni representatives on the constitutional committee was assassinated yesterday, simply for trying to play his part in bringing about a democratic Iraq. But the issue that I come back to the whole time is, if that terrorism is happening in Iraq and it is aimed at destroying the possibility of that country becoming a democracy, what should our response be. My response is to stand firm and see it through because, in the end, if Iraq becomes the country that Iraqis want it to be—namely, a democracy—that will send a hugely powerful signal out not just to Iraq and the region, but against that type of terrorism the world over.

Mr. Kennedy: Specifically, in response to the considered response that the Prime Minister has given and as this is the last time that we can question him before 10 October—who knows what might develop in Iraq during that coming period—will he therefore give us an estimate today, before we head into recess, about how long he believes a substantial British force must continue to be deployed in Iraq?

The Prime Minister: I cannot give a specific date. What I can say is that the strategy that is being pursued is, first, to build the democratic process in Iraq. That democratic process is supported by the 8 million Iraqis who came to vote, by the United Nations and by anyone who wants Iraq to become the country that it could be. That constitutional process will continue with the drafting of the constitution and then with the parliamentary elections in December. The second thing is to build up the capability of the Iraqi security forces themselves. That capability is being built the entire time. Indeed, the Iraqi forces are actually taking on many of the patrols down in the south now. Even around Baghdad, there are now joint multinational forces and Iraqi operations.

Those are the two key things, but as President Karzai of Afghanistan said yesterday, the same perverted ideology that is trying to kill people in whatever country it can is trying to prevent Afghanistan and Iraq from becoming democracies. What is important sometimes, when people talk about their concern for Iraq or Afghanistan, is to let the legitimate voices of those people who have supported democracy in those countries be heard and to let them be the people who represent the true voice of Iraq and Afghanistan—not the representatives of the ideology that is trying to kill decent folk in both countries.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): May I praise my right hon. Friend for his great courage and conviction in tackling terrorism and the way that he has championed the cause of multiculturalism and kept that spirit alive, given the difficult circumstances? But may I also make him aware that the attacks, these difficult times and the bombings that have taken place affect not only the Muslim community, but the wider Asian community and in particular, the Hindu and Sikh communities? In the spirit that he has opened up dialogue with the Muslim community, will he open up the same dialogue with the Hindu and Sikh communities, so that we can work with them in the greater interests of community relations to keep the spirit of multiculturalism alive?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes a very fair point. We will obviously try to do more to ensure that we keep in touch with the Hindu and Sikh communities, and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had a meeting with them a short time ago.

Q3. [13344] Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Does the Prime Minister recall visiting the Queen Elizabeth hospital in King's Lynn during the 2001 election, when he came up to support the then sitting Labour MP? Does he recall saying to my constituents that the Norfolk health economy would be properly funded under Labour? Is he aware that the Norfolk health economy is now £22 million in the red, that the chairman and chief executive of our local hospital—the Queen Elizabeth—have both resigned and that, last week, two wards were closed? What message does he have for those hard-working consultants and staff who are battling on in very difficult circumstances?

The Prime Minister: My message is that I hope that those people and the hon. Gentleman would support the extra funding that is going into the health service in Norfolk and elsewhere. I hope that he points out to his constituents and those in the neighbouring constituency that, if the Conservative party had had its way, that money would never have gone into the national health service. If we read the Healthcare Commission report and see the improvements made, they show the wisdom of investment, not cuts, as the policy.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): May I ask the Prime Minister to take the good wishes of this House back to the good people of Sedgefield, who have had the common sense to vote to retain their council housing in-house? Will he have a word in the ear of the Deputy Prime Minister and say that that is another reason why we should support the fourth option for council housing, which is, after all, Labour party policy?

The Prime Minister: No, but I think that the case—even if I do not agree with the decision—shows the benefits of choice.

Q4. [13345] Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): The 3,000 people who crowded into Evesham market square for the protest rally on Sunday and the 20,000 who have signed the petition to save the town's hospital would be surprised to learn that, only two years ago, in "Keeping the NHS Local", the Government advocated "sustainable solutions for smaller hospitals to secure their valued role at the heart of local communities."

Given the substantial extra funding that is going to the South Worcestershire primary care trust, why is it proposed to close wards and sharply reduce services at Evesham community hospital, in direct contradiction of Government policy?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman at least concedes that there has been substantial extra funding. Decision making on the configuration of local services must be a matter for the PCT—that is the procedure with which I think we all agree. I understand that the proposals for Evesham community hospital are at an early stage and I expect that the PCT will take into account all representations, including the hon. Gentleman's, before taking any decisions. However, it is worth highlighting something that he implied, which is that there has been a substantial increase in funding—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is it going?"] I shall say where. The funding is going into the £87 million private finance initiative Worcestershire royal hospital, which is now completed and operational, and into the 1,800 more nurses, 240 more consultants and 140 more doctors. In other words, it is going into improving health care services.

Mr. Khalid Mahmood (Birmingham, Perry Barr) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary for taking time yesterday and today to meet representatives of the Muslim community. I also thank my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for the announcement made earlier on dealing with people who incite racial and religious hatred in this country. Will he go further and deal with the organisations that must be proscribed to stop them inciting religious hatred?

The Prime Minister: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend, who has shown immense courage in difficult circumstances. He is right to draw attention to organisations that try to incite hatred or glorify terrorism. That is what the new legislation is, in part, designed to tackle.

Q5. [13346] Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The Prime Minister may be aware that the university of Central Lancashire runs one of the most successful programmes for Chinese students: some 600 have already graduated in engineering. However, the 300 students who are to start the academic year in September are facing new and burdensome requirements in applying for their visas. Although it is important to sort out legitimate students from illegitimate ones, will the right hon. Gentleman use his good offices to ensure that students who qualify to come here can do so and that we do not damage that valuable contribution to Sino-British relations?

The Prime Minister: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman about the importance of international students, who add £5 billion to the UK economy, and of not making procedures over-burdensome, but he knows why we have introduced tougher requirements. We needed to make sure that people who come to this country as students are coming to take bona fide courses at bona fide places and that they will not switch from a student visa and claim asylum as some have done over the years, or do other things. That is why we have had to tighten our procedures. We are trying to strike the right balance and I shall certainly consider the points made by the right hon. Gentleman, but it is important that we send a strong signal. Yes, the overwhelming majority of students come here for bona fide reasons—to study—but the system has been open to certain abuses and it is important that we close the opportunities for abuse.

Q6. [13347] Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): The commitment that was made at the G8 to aim for universal access to drugs treatment for HIV by 2010 was enormously important. I am sure that the Prime Minister accepts that we need substantial and sustained increases in aid from developed countries beyond anything that has been agreed so far if we are to have any chance of achieving that aim. With that in mind, what are his objectives for the conference that will be held here in September on the replenishment of the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria? Does he accept that, if that fund is not replenished, that will send a signal that the G8 is not serious about the commitments that it made?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend will understand that part of the purpose of the conference in September is to replenish the funding. It is important that we do that, but I emphasise that it is not only the global fund that will help in tackling AIDS. It is also bilateral relationships, not least those that this country has with African countries that are suffering from AIDS, a huge pandemic that is causing misery across the whole continent and reducing life expectancy. If we secure the commitments that we envisaged at the G8, that will get us as close as possible to universal access to HIV/AIDS treatment by 2010, which would be a huge achievement.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): The list of conditions exempted from prescription charges was drawn up in the 1960s, as the Prime Minister knows. At that time, cystic fibrosis sufferers mainly died in childhood, so they did not pay prescription charges. Many now live to adulthood. The Prime Minister will recall pledging to deal with this matter before the 1997 election, again in 1999 and again in 2001. Indeed, at the Dispatch Box earlier this year, he once again promised to review the situation. Is he going to honour his pledge, or is he going to let these vulnerable people suffer and pay?

The Prime Minister: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. It is true that we keep that under constant review, but it is important to point out— [Interruption.] If we change the list for one condition it has implications for other conditions as well. It is true that we keep it under review, but it also true that we give a substantial amount of help to sufferers of cystic fibrosis and other such conditions. While I agree that the hon. Gentleman has a point in relation to prescriptions it would be wrong to imply that we do nothing to help those sufferers, because we do.

Q7. [13348] Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Prime Minister agree that there can be no excuse, no rationalisation and no justification for criminals who bomb, maim and murder on buses, in tubes, in offices, in restaurants, in shops and in schools, whether in Beslan, Madrid, London, New York, Tunis or in Tel Aviv, and that the best defence therefore is to stand firm on our resolute democratic values and international co-operation?

The Prime Minister: I totally agree—there is no justification for it here or elsewhere.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): Is the Prime Minister aware of the incidents of violence in Northern Ireland in recent weeks? Is he aware of the atrocious attacks by republicans on the police and attacks by republicans on loyalist areas of north Belfast and Cluan place in my east Belfast constituency? Is he aware of what appears to be a loyalist feud in which there are attacks by loyalists on other loyalists? Will he take it from me that my colleagues and I condemn that completely and without any mental reservation? Is he disappointed that the leadership of Sinn Fein does not condemn the attacks by republicans on loyalists and the police?

The Prime Minister: I completely condemn those attacks, whether they come from republicans or whether they are attacks that loyalists are committing on one another. There is no justification for any of it, and people must realise that if we want to make progress in Northern Ireland the violence, from whatever quarter, has to stop.

Q8. [13349] Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Now that the summer recess is almost upon us, will my right hon. Friend have time to do what millions of people did this weekend and read the new Harry Potter novel by Scotland's most successful writer? What would he say to people who have been critical of those books, especially as they have done more to improve literacy and children's enjoyment of reading than even this Government's excellent education policies and everything that I did in 19 years as an English teacher?

The Prime Minister: The Harry Potter brief in my file is somewhat thin, which only shows that my officials' sense of importance is not what it should be. I was told by someone, however, that in the first chapter of the new book the Minister of Magic comes out of a picture to confront the Prime Minister. I am still searching for the Minister.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): The Prime Minister knows that we can raise individual cases, as well as major international issues. Before 1997, many members of his Administration signed the petition to the Florida supreme court concerning Krishna Maharaj, who has spent nearly 18 years in jail. Will the Prime Minister please consider taking advice and communicating with both President Bush and Governor Bush to see whether it is possible to get the state to stop opposing the application for a new trial, which ought to have been granted in the United States?

The Prime Minister: I confess that I am not familiar with the particular case, but the Foreign Secretary tells me that he is taking the matter up.

London Terror Attack Update

12.30 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring the House up to date with developments since my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made his statement to the House on Monday 11 July.

A total of 56 people are now known to have died as a result of the explosions. The identities of all of these have now been formally confirmed through the relevant procedures. Support and advice continue to be given to the families affected as requested, in what remain very difficult and traumatic circumstances. It is possible that this total may rise as the police investigation of the very difficult scenes continues. Twenty-seven people remain in hospital undergoing treatment at present.

Until this week all four explosion sites have remained crime scenes, and at this point three still are. As the police have made clear, it is vital to their work that no clues or evidence are overlooked or destroyed. However, Transport for London is optimistic that Aldgate station, which has been handed back to London Underground by the police, may be returned to service by next Monday, 25 July. The train has now been removed from the Edgware Road site, although police remain at the scene. Subject to completion of the forensic work and a fuller inspection of the tracks at Edgware Road, it is hoped that a full Circle line service may be restored in a couple of weeks. It is not possible at present to say how long restoration of the Russell Square site may take. Roads around Upper Woburn place remain closed at present, pending conclusion of the police forensic investigation of the site.

There has been a great deal of speculation about the ongoing investigation. The police will continue to give regular updates, but I do not intend to make detailed comments, since to do so could be damaging and might impede any resulting prosecutions.

The House will, however, be aware that there has been rapid progress on identifying productive lines of inquiry. A very large volume of information, including witness statements, CCTV footage, and evidence from the scenes and recovered from searched addresses, is already being analysed. The police and security services are to be congratulated on their work in this complex and fast-moving investigation. We are all determined to take whatever steps are needed to identify, track down and bring to justice all those involved in instigating, planning, and supporting these terrible crimes.

I turn to the forthcoming counter-terrorism legislation. As the House will know, I wrote to the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) and the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) on Friday setting out our initial proposals for inclusion in the Bill. Copies of my letter were placed in the Libraries of both Houses. On Monday I met the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen to discuss the matter, and I should like to place on record my appreciation of the helpful and constructive tone that they both adopted.

My letter set out the main items which the Government believe should be included in the counter-terrorism Bill. I should stress that these proposals were drawn up before 7 July. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister indicated in his statement last week, we are discussing with the police and intelligence agencies whether there might be further powers that they need in the light of those events and the subsequent investigation.

The heart of the Bill is the creation of three new offences. The first of these criminalises acts preparatory to terrorism in order to ensure that early intervention does not mean that those responsible, who may be planning very serious terrorist crimes, should escape prosecution. The new offence will capture those planning serious acts of terrorism.

The second proposed new offence focuses on indirect incitement to terrorism. Direct incitement to commit acts of violence is already a criminal offence. The proposal targets those who, although not directly inciting, glorify and condone terrorist acts, knowing full well that the effect on their listeners will be to encourage them to turn to terrorism. So indirect incitement, when it is done with the intention of inciting others to commit acts of terrorism—that is an important qualification—will become a criminal offence.

Thirdly, the Bill will deal with the giving and receiving of terrorist training. Our existing law already criminalises much activity that could fall within that description, but we want to close the gaps to make sure that anyone who gives or receives training in terrorist techniques is covered. Legislating for those last two offences will enable the UK to ratify the Council of Europe convention on the prevention of terrorism, which I very much welcome. The Bill will also make a number of other amendments to existing legislation, which are set out in the letter that I have placed in the Library of the House.

I am very pleased to say that when we met on Monday, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden and the hon. Member for Winchester indicated that they were, in principle, prepared to support all these measures. Of course they will want to see, and contribute to, the detail as it emerges, and I have undertaken to keep them informed of developments during the summer. I am grateful to them for their support and hope that we can continue to proceed by means of consensus. In that spirit, both of them indicated to me on Monday that they were in favour of the Government decoupling this legislation from the further parliamentary consideration of control orders, to which I gave a commitment during the passage of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, and bringing it forward for introduction in October. They further indicated to me that they were in favour of proceeding straight to introduction, without pre-legislative scrutiny, provided that they could have early sight of the draft legislation and that the normal parliamentary procedures and timetable were followed in both Houses.

On that basis, we are proposing to bring forward the legislation as soon as practicable when the House returns. We propose to return to the issue of control orders in the spring after we have the report from the independent reviewer, Lord Carlile. He is not only the reviewer of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, because he performs a similar function in respect of the Terrorism Act 2000. He published his most recent report on the operation of that Act on 26 May and I am grateful to him for a typically thorough and thoughtful report. Of course his report was published before the terrible events of 7 July, but he has since confirmed that his overall conclusions remain. I have today published the Government's response to his report and placed copies in the Library. We have given effect to several of his recommendations and are giving active consideration to others.

In the days and weeks since 7 July, many have raised concerns about extremists who seek to come to this country to foment terrorism, or to provoke others to commit terrorist acts. I have reviewed the Government's powers to exclude such people. The Home Secretary has powers to exclude individuals on the grounds that their presence in the UK is not conducive to the public interest. There is no statutory right of appeal against the exclusion decision, but of course it can be challenged through judicial review. In addition, immigration and entry clearance officers have similar powers. Any exclusion by them would generate a right of appeal. This power is currently informed by the operation of a warnings index of named individuals. I have concluded that these powers need to be applied more widely and systematically both to people before they come to the UK and when they are here.

In recent decades, for all Home Secretaries, the criteria for exercising these powers have generally been grounds of national security, public order or risk to the UK's good relations with a third country. In going beyond these grounds, we rightly need to tread very carefully indeed in areas that relate to free speech. However, in the circumstances that we now face, I have decided that it is right to broaden the use of these powers to deal with those who foment terrorism, or seek to provoke others to commit terrorist acts. To that end, I intend to draw up a list of unacceptable behaviours that fall within those powers—for example, preaching, running websites or writing articles that are intended to foment or provoke terrorism. The list will be indicative rather than exhaustive and we will consult on it, because it is important that we work with communities.

Where there are grounds for considering that a person has been engaged in such activities, or will do so in the UK, exclusion will be considered. I have asked my officials together with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the intelligence agencies to establish a full database of individuals around the world who have demonstrated the relevant behaviours. That database will be available to entry clearance and immigration officers and will be added to the current warnings index. I should make it clear that entry on that index does not necessarily mean exclusion, but in all cases it will trigger the possibility of a decision to exclude by Ministers.

In addition to using that list to ensure that those non-conducive powers are applied more widely and systematically at the point of entry, the specified unacceptable behaviours will not be permitted for individuals who have leave to enter or remain in this country. That power arises in various categories: for those here temporarily, for example, as visitors, students or workers, or their dependants and for those with indefinite leave to remain, any breach will lead to termination of their leave or deportation; for asylum seekers, we will, as a general rule, look to detain them and fast-track their claims; and for refugees, we will consider whether the behaviours described fall within one of the categories for exclusion from protection under the 1951 refugee convention.

We have already made it clear in the changes announced on refugee status earlier this week that any breach by a refugee of the categories for exclusion will trigger an immediate review of their status. We are already consulting on changes to the conditions for leave to enter and remain for ministers of religion, and we will consider with the faith communities whether further measures are needed.

I am also urgently seeking agreement with EU and other countries on the mutual exchange of information on exclusion decisions. The power of exclusion is necessarily targeted at those outside the UK. When people who are already in the UK engage in the kind of behaviour that I have identified and described, it may well be appropriate to deport them under statutory powers. I will ensure that a consistent stance is taken in relation to both deportation and exclusions. In the past, there have been some successful challenges to proposed deportations under article 3 of the European convention on human rights. For that reason, we have actively been seeking memorandums of understanding with a number of Governments to address those legal concerns.

I am pleased to announce today that the Governments of the United Kingdom and the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan have reached agreement in principle on the provisions of such a memorandum of understanding, regulating the arrangements by which assurances regarding the treatment of particular individuals can be sought prior to their deportation. The formal signing of the memorandum of understanding will be arranged shortly, and a copy of the text will be placed in the Library once the signing ceremony has taken place.

I do not in general intend to comment on the position of particular individuals. In the light of recent public comments, however, the House may be interested to know that I understand that Sheikh Yusuf Al Qaradawi is not now planning to visit the UK in the near future. If he were to seek to do so, I would of course have to consider whether his presence would be conducive to the public good. I will follow the approach that I have set out today in the case of Sheikh Omar Bakri Mohammed and other individuals whose names are in the public domain.

I want to conclude by applauding the efforts that the leaders of the Muslim communities are now making to improve their capacity to fight extremism and protect young people. Positive proposals are emerging from a series of meetings between my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, myself and others on strengthening our capacity to fight the destructive and nihilist philosophy of those who promoted the London bombings.

As I hope that I have demonstrated, there is unity of purpose. The Government want to work with other parties to ensure that we have the most effective anti-terrorism legislation on our statute book. Similarly, we want to work with the Muslim community to isolate and weaken dangerous extremists. I am grateful to all engaged in that important work, which I hope commands Parliament's support.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): I thank the Home Secretary for bringing the House up to date and for his courtesy in keeping Opposition parties informed privately about developments during the past two weeks, when Britain has shown that it can and will come together to fight the new breed of terrorism that stalks our land.

The new breed of terrorism is extraordinarily calculating—al-Qaeda and its foot soldiers know precisely what they are trying to achieve by their wicked and despicable actions. The overarching aim of the 9/11 atrocity was publicly to destroy symbols of American economic and military power, in the twin towers and the Pentagon. The Madrid attack was designed to interfere in the domestic politics and foreign policies of Spain. The King's Cross atrocity, with its calculated trail of evidence leading deliberately back to the cities of northern England, was designed to demoralise and divide our communities and to set Muslim and non-Muslim against one another.

It is to this country's enormous credit that, in large part, that has not been allowed to happen. British people of all religions and none have stood together in the face of this appalling evil. As a result, almost two weeks on from that terrible Thursday morning in London, the terrorists and all who harbour and support them know that they simply have not won.

Our united response to terrorism stems from three separate sources; the Home Secretary referred to some of them. First, there are the police and the security services. I pay tribute to them at this time. They have come under considerable scrutiny in the days since 7 July, but we must never forget that when a terrorist gets through it is inevitably public, but when a terrorist is thwarted, it often remains secret. The services have acted with tremendous speed to identify those responsible, and continue to display the utmost professionalism in tracking down those behind them. In doing so, some of them have had to work in hideously unpleasant conditions, and I know that the whole House will want to join the Home Secretary in putting our gratitude on the record.

The second source is the Government and Parliament. I pay tribute to the calm and measured way in which the Government have conducted themselves in the last two weeks. They have been quick to make effective proposals to update our anti-terrorism laws, and I commend the Home Secretary for accepting our proposals to accelerate the process, without eroding proper parliamentary scrutiny.

The first new offence that the Home Secretary proposes, covering acts preparatory to terrorism, we have called for for some time. For the benefit of the House, will the Home Secretary describe the difference between that offence and simple conspiracy, or attempting to commit terrorist acts? I know that there are differences, and I would like him to outline them a little more, for the benefit of the House.

I also welcome the new law on the indirect incitement of terrorism. It is much better focused than the alternative proposals that have been suggested in the past. As so much of the effectiveness of such a law depends on the drafting, will the Home Secretary ensure that early drafts are available as soon as possible in September, so that interested parties—not just the Opposition parties, but bodies such as the Law Society—can pass judgment and therefore help to improve the law?

I also reiterate the point made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition during Prime Minister's questions—that we continue to believe that allowing the use of phone tapping evidence in court will help even further.

As for practical actions, will the Home Secretary re-examine the security of Britain's ports? Reports have suggested that an individual connected with the attack may have entered the country through one of our ports and been seen, or missed, by the security services. I do not expect the right hon. Gentleman to comment directly on that, but will he tell the House what action he is taking to ensure that all British airports and ports have the proper establishment levels, the special branch officers and the other staff to ensure that that sort of thing does not happen?

Finally, the attacks demand an active response from the community itself, particularly from prominent members of the Muslim community in Britain. They have already shown leadership over the past two weeks, and Muslims in communities across Britain have responded quickly and openly to requests for help from the security services and the police. The Home Secretary and I met senior members of all the faiths and community groups this morning, and they fully understand that the best way to fight home-grown terrorism is to root it out at its source. They have a clear responsibility to act, but there are several things that the Government can do to help.

There are good imams and bad imams, and it is no help to the good imams if we do not deal with the bad ones. Accordingly, I greatly welcome the Home Secretary's announcement today about strengthening his powers of exclusion, and his implicit reference to dealing with Sheikh Al Qaradawi and Sheikh Omar Bakri Mohammed. I hope that the Government will also consider going further, by looking to train, or to encourage the training of, more imams here in Britain, so that their teachings will be consistent with the society in which they preach.

I also hope that the Government will think about what they can do to deal with the issue of disaffected young people who travel to madrassahs, particularly in Pakistan, where some madrassahs appear to indoctrinate rather than educate. Action on that issue would be greatly welcomed.

Many words have been expended over the past two weeks as people from all areas of British society and beyond have united to condemn the attacks. As time goes on, those words will increasingly turn unto demands for action. With the proposals that the Government have set out this week, they have shown themselves ready to meet that demand, and I am happy to say that we continue to stand ready with them.

Ultimately, tackling terrorism in Britain will be a combined effort, with politicians, the police, the security services and the community working together. That is what we have seen in the past two weeks, and that is why we have been able to make such swift progress in identifying those who committed the atrocity, tracking those who supported and abetted them, and learning lessons to improve our defences in future.

If the House will allow me to indulge in a personal comment, I may say that I have known and been a friend of the Home Secretary for 30 years. The last two weeks have probably produced the worst events and the most important decisions that he has had to take. If I may say so, I commend how he, personally, has responded to and risen to the occasion.

If in the days ahead we are able to carry forward that model, our society and our country really will have come out of this ordeal stronger. That, I think, would be the finest tribute to all those who, sadly, were killed or injured in London nearly two weeks ago.

Mr. Clarke: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his personal remarks, which I very much appreciate, and for the political support that he and his party have given to the whole of our approach. It is very important that we should work in the way that he has described, and I certainly can confirm my absolute determination to continue working in that way over the coming period.

The right hon. Gentleman raised several specific points. The offence relating to acts preparatory to an act of terrorism is intended to facilitate the prosecution of individuals known to have instigated an act of terrorism or to have been planning, preparing or conspiring to commit an act of terrorism. That is because there is a requirement to protect the public, which means that the police and security agencies may have to intervene early when they become aware of a terrorist cell, with the consequence that it may not be possible to know what precise atrocity was being planned. Indeed, the terrorists themselves might not have concluded on what form of action they would follow. That is the issue that we are trying to address with that offence.

I can commit the Government to making early drafts available in September and to doing so more widely than simply to the Opposition parties. That will allow us to look at where we are and see where we are going.

On interceptors evidence, the right hon. Gentleman will know that I still do not agree with the point that he is putting. However, as the Prime Minister made clear at Question Time, there is no issue of principle here; there is a practical issue of how to deal with it in a proper way. We shall continue discussing that point.

On ports, we shall continue to keep the situation very much under review. We shall look consistently at the security arrangements on ports, but I have to say that the co-operation in the way that the various agencies are working together is extremely good at this point.

Finally, the points that the right hon. Gentleman made about the community are absolutely true. I want to address two dimensions. From the very beginning, from Thursday 7 July, we have brought together faith leaders of different faiths who are already working strongly together and who need to continue to do so. They have been exemplary in the way in which they have operated, and we need to continue to develop that.

The second strand, as the right hon. Gentleman implied, is to work with the Muslim community in particular to strengthen those forces within that community who want to develop their relationship with the wider society in a strong and constructive way. There are interesting issues about the training of imams that need to be addressed. I note that the Church of England and the Catholic Church have, through their teacher training colleges, which are now university colleges, found a range of ways of looking at some of the issues. It may well be worth exploring whether work could be taken forward in that way for the Muslim community and other faith communities. I hope that that will arise out of the conversations that we will hold.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): I thank the Home Secretary for notice of his statement and for the approach that he has taken over the past couple of weeks. In particular, I thank him for the constructive meeting held on Monday. As he knows, the Liberal Democrats have offered our support for the three measures that he has outlined. We believe that they could contribute towards security in this country.

The measures on indirect incitement to terrorism will be difficult to define, and I welcome the Home Secretary's constructive approach in working with all parties on the wording. Does he agree that the key to the law will be to produce a wording that can stand up in court but which is not so wide in scope that it could ever be misused in future?

The Home Secretary knows that we still have differences on control orders. I welcome the idea of raising those differences and working with the Government when they are debated in the spring. When will he next report on the number of control orders issued, and does he agree that that report cannot wait until Parliament returns in mid-October?

The Home Secretary has stressed in the past that he believes that the intelligence services have the resources that they require. However, it is local police who are in the front line and who often provide essential back-up for the intelligence services. Is he satisfied that the Met and local police forces that have major cities in their area have the resources to be able to provide that essential back-up?

On deporting, which the Home Secretary mentioned in his statement, he said that he would seek memorandums of understanding with other countries on human rights. What system will be put in place to check that countries stick to the commitments in the memorandums, and would he favour some form of independent assessment to see that that is being done?

Finally, it is our firm view that good legislation needs good debate and scrutiny by parliamentarians. The Liberal Democrats will play our part in that process, but we do so from the firm belief that all parties should work together on these measures to send the terrorists the strongest possible signal that parties committed to democracy in this country are determined to join together to defeat them.

Mr. Clarke: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments, which I appreciate and accept entirely. I appreciate, too, the way in which he and his colleagues have worked on these matters in the past days. We shall continue to work in that spirit.

[Mr. Clarke]

The hon. Gentleman asked about the wording standing up in court, and that is precisely the point. He is also right to say that the drafting issues on the inciting offence are by no means straightforward, which is why we shall discuss them in the way that he suggested. He is quite right that the offence will have a value only if it can stand up to the scrutiny of courts at a later stage, and that will be a central principle in what we do.

On control orders, we are committed to reporting every three months on the operation of the regime. We reported after the first three months a few weeks ago and will next report at the next three-month point, which is in, I think, the second week of September. We will, I hope, report via the parliamentary process at that time, although it is yet to be resolved exactly how. Certainly, under all circumstances, we will report as we have committed to.

On resources for policing, I do believe that extra resources for policing have made a difference, particularly the extra resources for the intelligence services, which, I have been told, have made a significant difference already to their work over the recent period. I accept the point that we will need to review how resourcing has been over the period. I have had initial discussions with the Commissioner on one or two aspects of that, and we will keep it under close review.

On the memorandums of understanding, the hon. Gentleman is quite right to say that they must be capable of including a monitoring process that will be seen to be acceptable. The question of the independence or otherwise of the assessment will be dealt with on a country by country basis. We have been active in pursuing the agreements, and I am delighted by the announcement I have been able to make today about Jordan. The memorandums will themselves have to stand up in court when courts come to consider how article 3 operates.

Finally, I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's commitment to a healthy debate on those matters. I, too, will try to give as good as I get.

Ann Keen (Brentford and Isleworth) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the way in which the process has been conducted, particularly in my borough, Hounslow, which is a well established multicultural community. My right hon. Friend mentioned recruitment to the police in his statement, particularly from the Muslim community. The borough commander in Hounslow, Dr. Diziea, is from that community, and I would welcome any opportunity to discuss with my right hon. Friend his role in helping in any way.

Mr. Clarke: I thank my hon. Friend for her comments. I know the borough commander and his work, and I share her assessment of him. I spoke earlier today with the Commissioner about precisely these matters. He sees two major areas that he will seek to develop in conversations he will have next week. The first is the recruitment of Muslim police officers, which my hon. Friend referred to, including at senior level. The second is how to develop work on counter-terrorism in a strong way that ensures nationally, and not just in London, that there is a strong relationship with the Muslim community that can help to detect any proposed terrorist acts.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): Will the Home Secretary thank the chief constable of Thames Valley for the professionalism with which his officers and the Met carried out their operation in Aylesbury last week? Will he welcome the denunciation of terror and the strong support for the police expressed by the imam and the leaders of the mosque in Aylesbury? Does he agree that alongside the counter-terrorist measures that he is rightly bringing forward, we as a country need to address why a minority of young men from our Muslim communities feel so disaffected, not only from mainstream white society but from the older generations of their own communities, that they have, in a minority of cases, wanted to listen to those who were urging extremism and hatred?

Mr. Clarke: I am happy to reinforce the hon. Gentleman's praise for the chief constable of Thames Valley police. The police in general have done an outstanding job, particularly in areas such as Aylesbury, Leeds and London, where there have been particular challenges.

I was delighted to read of the denunciation by leaders of the Muslim community in Aylesbury of these terrible atrocities. It is particularly important, if I may say so, that the communities directly involved make explicit, strong and courageous statements in the way that the hon. Gentleman describes. It is critical to twin that with the determination to root out the causes of this behaviour.

On disaffected young people, that is an issue of the ages that we have to address. This morning we had a good discussion—the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) was present—with several people from different communities about what we can do. I can confirm that following those discussions the process will continue, with some specific propositions over the summer. I do not want to imply that it is an easy issue, because it is not—it is quite fundamental.

John Battle (Leeds, West) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for his calm and measured leadership in the past two weeks. Will he join me in offering a word of tribute to people in the Burley Lodge area in Leeds? I rushed home on Tuesday because they were evacuated from their homes while the whole area was searched for a bomb factory. When I got to the community centre, I found that only 34 people from the 470 homes that had been evacuated were there because the rest had been taken into the homes of families, friends and neighbours, cutting across racial, religious and cultural divides. That quietly demonstrates the forbearance and tolerance that could be a hope for the future in our communities.

I thank my right hon. Friend for the way in which the police and the security services worked with the local community at the tape barrier during the crisis; it was a model of police and community relations. Does he agree, however, that while we work on the taskforce initiative and on building a consensus for necessary new legislation, it will be crucial in the next few weeks that all sections of the community, including peoples of different faiths and none, work together to ensure that we are vigilant—watching out for each other—without turning into vigilantes? Life could be difficult in our neighbourhoods unless we develop a deep respect and calm in our neighbourhoods while we work to address the complex challenges that this has thrown up.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's remarks, particularly his references to vigilance and respect. Those are key words for us all in the way that we operate, and he is right to highlight them.

I join my right hon. Friend in paying tribute to the police and community leaders in Leeds. In the immediate aftermath of the events, I was particularly glad to have his advice on how to deal with them. I pay tribute to the role that he played in seeking to lead his community in the direction that he describes, which has been very important.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Will the Home Secretary take account of the need to review the Human Rights Act 1998 in the context of these terror attacks? I am sure that he appreciates that severe difficulties arise if that Act gives judges the right to make decisions that should properly be taken by him and through legislation in this House. Does he agree that were he to provide for a "notwithstanding" clause—as in "notwithstanding the Human Rights Act 1998"—before legislating, he would be able to overcome many of the difficulties on control orders, as I indicated in a Bill that I introduced a few months ago?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is a long-standing campaigner on the European convention on human rights; I am not sure whether that is simply because it comes from Europe or because he does not like human rights. Nevertheless, these are important issues. The right way to proceed is not by withdrawing from the convention, but by respecting human rights and trying to ensure that we can carry that through in an effective way.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend share my concern that some of those who have sought to understand and explain what happens have sometimes been accused of justifying what happens, and that in the current circumstances it is important that there is an open debate that recognises the causes of the London bombing?

On the legislation, the House is in recess for three months, but Select Committees are not necessarily so. Will my right hon. Friend consider publishing the draft Bill in sufficient time for the Home Affairs Committee to consider it before the House comes back?

Mr. Clarke: On my right hon. Friend's last point, I will certainly consider doing that. I appreciate the implicit offer in his readiness to see whether the Select Committee might meet although the House is not sitting. I will consider in conversation with him whether that might be a device to help further positive consideration.

On the more general point, I agree that care has to be taken. Some voices are immoderate in the way in which they address these questions, although immoderacy can perhaps be understood in the circumstances with which we are dealing. In general, although there are exceptions, the response of even the most extreme elements of the media has been positive rather than negative, and all parts of society have been trying to respond in a positive way.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): As much as the Home Secretary has said, I thoroughly support. However, why do we have to depend on The New York Times to find out that the joint terrorist analysis centre, working from MI5 headquarters, concluded in June:

"Events in Iraq are continuing to act as motivation and a focus of a range of terrorist related activity in the U.K."?

Why have the Government been so adamant that Iraq is not a factor—not a reason or an excuse, still less a justification, for atrocity, but a factor—in terrorist capability within the United Kingdom? We have had academic opinion in the Chatham House report and public opinion in yesterday's poll in The Guardian, and now we find that that was the view of the joint terrorist analysis centre in June. Has the Home Secretary seen that report and how does he reconcile it with the views expressed by the Government over the past two weeks?

Mr. Clarke: On the JTAC report, I will commit myself simply to the remarks made by the Prime Minister during Prime Minister's questions.

On the more general point, there is a serious intellectual flabbiness on the part of those who argue that Iraq was the cause of this issue. If one looks back over the past 10 years at the appalling atrocities that have taken place across the world, including 9/11 and other events, one realises that many of them took place in different circumstances before the Iraq war was engaged upon.

It is very important to say that large numbers of perfectly reasonable people think that the Government's position on Iraq was wrong, but that does not mean that they are on the edge of being terrorists. It is perfectly okay to disagree with the Government. The Government had to come to a decision; I think that it was the right one. People can have their different opinions—that is perfectly legitimate and part of the debate that can take place. However, it is completely mistaken to imply—I am not suggesting that the hon. Gentleman implied it in quite this sense—that if one says that the Government's position on Iraq was wrong, that takes one to the edge of moving towards a terrorist attack.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): I very much welcome the Home Secretary's statement and the proposals in it. Does he accept that the root cause of the terrorist problem facing us is a global ideology that fuels hatred and that cannot be dealt with other than by facing it head on and accepting it for the evil that it is? Does he also agree that it is unacceptable for people to excuse or support suicide bombings outside this country, yet claim to be against the same sort of action within our shores?

Mr. Clarke: I strongly agree with both my hon. Friend's points. I believe that her explanation is much nearer the problem with which we have to wrestle in trying to understand why the appalling events took place. We have to contend with a quasi-ideological set of issues. Not only all of us here, as Members of Parliament, in Government and in Opposition, but the communities—especially the Muslim community in the case that we are considering—must contend with it. We have to be engaged in the argument. It is our job, especially mine, to do whatever we can with the Muslim community to help it to address the matter. However, my hon. Friend has put her finger on precisely the sort of issues that we must address when thinking our way through the problem.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): May I join my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) in congratulating the Home Secretary on the way in which he has handled matters since the atrocities were committed? Will the Home Secretary join me in congratulating the people of London and elsewhere on their refusal to be intimidated by the brutal acts and murders? Will he also assure hon. Members that any legislation relating to the terrorist acts that he intends to introduce will not be burdened—if I may use that word—by an unnecessarily harsh programme motion? I believe that adequate opportunity for all hon. Members to contribute positively is vital. Does he accept that if he excluded fanatical clerics, such as Abu Hamza, it would suggest to the people of this country that the Government and Parliament are serious about eradicating fanaticism?

Mr. Clarke: I hope that my statement will help to address the last point. On the second point, it is not for me to prejudge the usual channels—I have always sought to avoid that in my political life. However, I reaffirm the commitment that I gave in the statement, which was agreed with the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) and the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), that there will be time for proper parliamentary scrutiny of the issues in both Houses and that that should form the context of the discussion between the usual channels.

Of course, I agree with the hon. Gentleman's comments about London, but I want to add one point. The response was due to the quality of our emergency services and the police, and the confidence that they—no one else—gave the people of London that the situation was being handled and was under control. It was also due to the absolute determination of all faiths to maintain the strength and reassurance that was part of the approach. That has re-established the importance of all faiths in our national life. I believe that that was one of the things that allowed the people of London to respond as strongly as they did.

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating Bedfordshire police and the emergency services on dealing with the difficult situation of the bomb scare in Luton and on the positive community relations that they have maintained? Will he clarify whether his proposals on indirect incitement would deal with the activities of al-Muhajiroun-related groups, which distributed inflammatory literature on the day after the terrorist attack in London? How can we deal with that issue without creating more so-called martyrs?

Mr. Clarke: I absolutely associate myself with my hon. Friend's congratulations to Bedfordshire police and the communities in Luton. There were difficult problems there and they were handled extremely well. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's efforts to try to move matters forward.

I shall not say what the relationship will be between the legislation and the group that she mentioned. However, I stress that the measure will cover the issue that she raised. I do not draw any specific conclusion for the particular group to which my hon. Friend referred, but the issue will be addressed. We have to do that by getting maximum support throughout all communities for dealing with incitement. We cannot simply let it all go on without taking a stance against it. We must address it and we call on all communities to work with us. I commit myself and the Home Office to working as closely as we can with communities in Luton and elsewhere to tackle those matters.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): Any measure that undermines terrorism is welcome. However, I remind the Home Secretary that in 1998, after the Omagh atrocity, the House was recalled to introduce special legislation to combat terrorism, yet no one has ever been prosecuted under that measure. In proposing to criminalise acts preparatory to terrorism—I welcome that—is not intelligence gathering as important as evidential information in securing prosecutions? Is not the use of phone tap evidence to secure convictions for acts preparatory to terrorism crucial? Drawing on our experience in Northern Ireland, is it not time that the Home Secretary accepted the need to use phone tap evidence to secure prosecutions against terrorists, who are adept at avoiding leaving a trail of evidence?

Mr. Clarke: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. It is one of the issues that we considered in the review that the Prime Minister commissioned on the use of intercept as evidence and on which I reported to the House earlier this year. As I have said, we have to discuss the matter further—I am sure that we will do that in Committee—to ascertain how we deal with it. However, the hon. Gentleman is fundamentally correct in saying that intelligence is our key weapon. That includes communications evidence. We must analyse how we ensure that we maintain the ability to collect intelligence and do not jeopardise our capacity to do that while getting the evidential basis for successful prosecution.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Is it not a priority that we train imams here for the British Muslim population of 1.6 million? Until we reach that stage, will we make it a condition of settlement for imams to be able to speak and understand English? Will imams be quizzed on their views when they apply for settlement?

Mr. Clarke: Language is a requirement in the new proposals, which we sent out for consultation early this week, just as my hon. Friend suggests. Quizzing on ideological or philosophical views is not yet part of our proposals, but I shall listen to my hon. Friend's comments in the consultation that is currently taking place. On training imams, several senior community leaders made that precise proposal in the meeting that I held with them this morning. I committed myself to considering it carefully for the reasons that my hon. Friend implies. One of the under-appreciated points is that Muslim communities differ according to which part of the world they are in. That is why my hon. Friend's point has force and we are obliged to ascertain how it can be taken forward constructively.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): While I welcome the creation of the new offence of indirect incitement to terrorism, I point out to the Home Secretary that some of us, including the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), have been warning about the activities of fanatics for the past 10 years, yet the Government have taken no action. I sent the Home Secretary's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), a letter in 1998 about Omar Bakri Mohammad. In it, I stated that unless the British Government made it clear that we would not tolerate incitement here, we would find that other fanatics would be encouraged to follow Bakri's line and that our institutions would be subject to attack. It is important to tell the House whether the previous pronouncements of people such as Omar Bakri Mohammad will be called as evidence and taken into account. He openly condoned the attacks on our ally, the United States. If only future incitement is taken into account and people's past pronouncements are ignored, we will do the people of this country a disservice.

Mr. Clarke: I will not comment on individual cases, as I said in my statement, but I confirm that all aspects of conduct will be taken into consideration when deciding what action should be taken. The Home Secretary's powers in relation to acts that are not conducive to the public good are important in principle. Getting the balance right is important. I hide from no one the fact that the events of the past few weeks have changed my view to some extent about the direction that we should take. It is a difficult balance and judgments must be made, but I have made the statement today because I believe that we need to consider the situation in a slightly different way.

Chris McCafferty (Calder Valley) (Lab): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement and the police on their remarkable forensic work since the London bombings? Will my right hon. Friend comment on recent reports that, following the Madrid bombings, the police were able rapidly to identify the owners of the mobile phones that were used as detonators because, in Spain, an ID card is a prerequisite to purchasing a mobile phone? Does he agree that although ID cards are not a panacea, they may be a useful tool in the fight against terrorism?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend puts it entirely correctly. No particular proposal—for ID cards or anything else—is a panacea, but they can provide useful tools, and her account of the events following the Madrid bombings is correct. I am not making the argument that anyone should change their view about particular proposals for legislation—for example, ID cards—as a result of the events of 7 July. However, I do ask people to take all the issues into account in the round in the way that my hon. Friend has suggested. That is certainly the way in which we will approach this.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): My constituent, Shyanuja Parathasangary, perished in the bombings on 7 July. She was around my age and was travelling on the No. 30 bus, on her way to work, with many other Londoners. My thoughts—and, I am sure, those of the whole House—are with her family at this time as they struggle to come to terms with their enormous loss. Her family are from Sri Lanka, like many residents of Brent. All nations and all faiths are represented there, and people live alongside one another in remarkable harmony. Does the Home Secretary agree that great care must be taken over the language that we use to describe these atrocities, to ensure that community relations are not inflamed? Good community relations are hard won, but very easily lost.

Mr. Clarke: I certainly agree with the hon. Lady, and I have tried to behave and to use care in the way that she suggests. I, too, had a constituent who died on 7 July in those events, and I am acutely aware of the sensitivities that the hon. Lady describes. The most important duty that we have towards the friends and families of those who perished is to learn our lessons and to show how we can build in the future a society that has increased strengths. That is certainly what I will seek to do.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): Among the fatalities were four people from my constituency. They were four people from four different ethnic community backgrounds, so the tragedy has seriously affected the whole of my constituency and been a great source of distress to us all. I welcome my right hon. Friend's comments regarding the extremist clerics but, as the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) said, this is not a new issue. Since 1998, I have consistently raised in the House the activities of Omar Bakri Mohammad and others. My right hon. Friend already has the power to remove indefinite leave to remain, which is the basis on which Omar Bakri Mohammad is in the UK. Will my right hon. Friend give urgent consideration to removing his indefinite leave to remain under those powers, so that we can take steps to remove him from this country?

Mr. Clarke: As I said, I am not going to comment on individual cases, beyond the general discussions that I have had. However, I shall certainly listen to any representations made by hon. Members after they have had a chance to study my statement today. I accept my hon. Friend's deep concern following the deaths of his constituents.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): If an individual were totally to condemn suicide bombings in Britain but to condone or applaud them in Baghdad, Ankara or Tel Aviv, would he or she be caught by the new offence of indirect incitement, however it is finally defined?

Mr. Clarke: I am not going to prejudge the debate that we shall have in the House and the other place on that legislation. However, I will say that suicide bombing and the killing of civilians—wherever it occurs, anywhere in the world—is simply unacceptable, full stop. It is terrorism of whatever description. I do not think that there is a difference between British people who are killed in terrorist outrages such as that in London on 7 July, and people who are killed in terrorist outrages in the places that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. That has to be the motivating spirit behind the way in which we address these questions.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): May I join others in the universal praise for the Home Secretary and Sir Ian Blair for the exceptional way in which they have conducted themselves over the past few weeks, and for the dialogue that the Home Secretary has personally established with the Muslim community in Britain? One of his proposed measures, however, will put greater pressure on the entry clearance operation. Will he ensure that more resources will be given to the posts abroad that have to deal with these applications, particularly Islamabad and Karachi, where the situation sometimes seems chaotic? Will he give me an assurance that the extra attention that will be paid to these cases will not in any way affect the genuine people who wish to come here as visitors, and who might face the prospect of more refusals because entry clearance officers will obviously have to be very careful? Will he also put these measures to the community groups when he meets them?

Mr. Clarke: I appreciate my hon. Friend's remarks, which are genuinely well meant. Yes, I will give the assurance that he seeks that existing procedures will not be slowed up by the process that he has described. I will also give the assurance that I will look into the precise resources implications that will arise. I know that my hon. Friend will agree that the best way to secure strong community relations in this country is to have good, effective, accurate decision making on visa and other applications from other countries throughout the world. That is what we are trying to achieve.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): The Home Secretary will know that firefighters are in the front line of emergency rescue operations. Tributes have been paid today to the splendid response of our emergency services in the aftermath of the London bombings. He will know that firefighters are often first on the scene, and are therefore the most vulnerable to secondary devices. He will also know that most insurance policies have exclusion clauses for acts of terrorism. What discussions has he had, and what plans has he, to ensure that, should there be similar incidents, our splendid emergency services have proper protection?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Lady is right. The answer is that I have not yet had any discussions of the kind that she describes, but I am chairing a meeting tomorrow to get responses from a wide range of elements among those who are involved in this approach, to determine what lessons we have learned. I shall ensure that that point is considered at the meeting.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend recently re-read the excellent Home Affairs Committee report on terrorism and community relations? If he has, he will have seen that one of the recommendations made in March 2005 was that the Government should ensure that British Muslims were fully engaged in the formulation of any new anti-terror legislation. What steps is he taking to implement that recommendation? Does he agree that while the consensus between the political parties inside Parliament is welcome, it is even more important for there to be consensus between Parliament and our citizens? All the strands of our community signing up to the anti-terror legislation could—with a fair wind and God willing—result in there being no more terrorist attacks in the UK.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is completely correct. I have not recently re-read the Home Affairs Committee report but, prompted by his suggestion, I shall certainly take it to the beach this year and make sure that I get on top of it. My hon. Friend is entirely right: the serious point is that it is critical that everything that we do is widely understood and supported in the community. That is why I gave a commitment in my statement to consultation on a variety of the issues that we are talking about, and I can confirm that that will be our approach.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): I am sure that the Home Secretary will join me in welcoming the condemnation by Muslims in Birmingham—particularly in the Acocks Green ward of my constituency—of the attacks on London. Does he agree that to achieve a calm and peaceful world we need to stand on two legs: security and justice? We cannot have justice without security but, at the same time, we cannot have security without justice. We need to focus on ensuring that justice is done, nationally and internationally, and that it is seen to be done, for example, under international humanitarian law. The proposal for ID cards was mentioned earlier. Such cards might not be able to prevent attacks such as these, and there is an argument in regard to ID cards about whether one can do things ex-post facto. There is also an argument about whether closed circuit television would be more cost effective.

Mr. Clarke: These are serious issues. CCTV is an extraordinary case. Its utility in this investigation has been of particular importance. Where there are serious issues of human rights—which there are—there needs to be proportionality in dealing with them. That includes CCTV, ID cards and the retention of telecommunications data as evidence. I hope that all parties in the House—I look to the hon. Gentleman's Front-Bench colleagues—will look at all of these proposals in an appropriately proportionate way.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): In regard to port security, I was visited last Friday by a constituent who is a coach driver who regularly travels between here and the continent. He told me that security—for coach drivers, anyway—had deteriorated to the point of being almost non-existent in the past few years. Does my right hon. Friend have any plans to review the situation at ports, particularly in relation to coach drivers? My constituent says that someone trying to smuggle something in would only require an alliance with the coach driver, not the co-operation of passengers. He raises what I think is quite a serious issue, although I appreciate that these days most port security is intelligence led.

Mr. Clarke: The national co-ordinators of special branch and ports police are actively reviewing the situation that my hon. Friend describes. I do not know, but I assume that they are considering the coach issue specifically, along with other issues. He is right that it needs examining carefully, and we are doing just that.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): I very much welcome the Home Secretary's statement. May I focus on one specific point? He rightly identified the role of websites in inciting violence and said that he would control that. But he knows as well as I do that websites can be generated from outside the United Kingdom. What discussions has he had with internet service providers in the United Kingdom so that if websites are identified as inciters to violence and terrorism, ISPs based in the UK will block them?

Mr. Clarke: We have had two types of discussions. The first is with other countries. About a month ago, we had a specific session on this point at the G8 meeting of Interior Ministers in Sheffield, which is relevant to the hon. Gentleman's point, as one or two of the G8 members are places from which websites can be run. We agreed to increase significantly our work to address that point, which is also being addressed in the EU context. Secondly, I have had discussions about such developments with some ISPs, but in the context of child pornography rather than in this context. The hon. Gentleman is right, however, and we will move in both directions—through the industry and in relation to particular jurisdictions—to see how we can take matters forward.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The Home Secretary's forthcoming legislation deserves the most painstaking and sympathetic scrutiny. In making the case for it, notwithstanding what he has said about the broadly responsible media reporting of recent events, will he accept the need to underline constantly that we are seeking to upbraid and prevent acts by a tiny minority of people who want to destroy this country? He and all of us recognise that the overwhelming majority of people who seek to come to this country, whether to study, work or be granted asylum, have no ill designs on us and would deprecate terrorist atrocities as vociferously as all of us in the House.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman's attention to legislation is always painstaking, and I am sure that that will be equally true with this legislation.

I can give him the assurance that he seeks. We are talking about a tiny number of people, but the deep truth, as he well knows, is that it is possible for even a tiny number of people to do immense damage, so the challenge for us is how to get the right approach, and the legislation is focused on trying to do that.

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I am sure that the Home Secretary is aware of the activities of several organisations, some of which are banned in other countries, that prey principally on young male Muslims? What does he propose to do to monitor and deal with those, and more important, have the Government given some thought to what positive action we might take to engage some of these disaffected young people to turn them away from some of those organisations?

Mr. Clarke: First, I think the measures I announced in my statement will help with some of the issues that the hon. Gentleman describes. Secondly, through the process of the discussions to which I referred earlier today, a conscious and positive effort is taking place to consider how we deal with disaffected young people and communicate more effectively with them.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): The Chancellor's pledge of £10 million to support the survivors and the families of the victims of the London bombings is most welcome and appropriate. I hope that the Home Secretary will agree that had the event taken place abroad, not a penny of this money would be available, because it comes from the criminal injuries compensation scheme, and none of the money is available unless an incident takes place in the UK. Will the Secretary of State therefore reconsider and extend the scheme so that financial support is provided regardless of where the incident takes place? Sadly, the events of last week have shown that terrorism occurs all over the globe, and our support for Britons caught up in such horrific events should also have no boundaries.

Mr. Clarke: First, I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's very personal understanding of these issues, and I appreciate the way in which he put his point. I am ready to consider all these questions, but if we are being candid, there is a real problem. The regime under which compensation is dealt with, for people who die in a series of circumstances and in different ways, is complex and confused. As he rightly says, we have a criminal injuries compensation scheme that deals with issues in this country. There are particular schemes to deal with great natural disasters such as the tsunami, and a different set of issues arise particularly when there is strong public feeling, for example about a train accident. It is important to try to find a more equitable approach to tackling these problems, but to be frank I do not have a good solution to offer at the moment, although I will consider his point carefully.

Point of Order

1.35 pm

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Yesterday evening, there was some confusion in the House, and I am sorry to say that it was caused by the Secretary of State for Transport. In relation to the Select Committee being set up to deal with the Crossrail Bill, he may inadvertently have given the House inaccurate information when he said that

"if someone comes along with a petition on something different, such as varying the line of the route, no Government or, indeed, the House, would say that the Select Committee should not consider it."—[Official Report, 19 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 1129.]

An instruction to a Select Committee of this type is quite explicit, however. The custom of the House is that such a Select Committee can take petitions only from people with a direct or specific interest in the subject. I would therefore ask not that you make a judgment now, which would be unfair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but that Mr. Speaker makes a considered judgment so that before the matter is taken forward, everyone can be clear about what this Select Committee can or cannot be petitioned on, and what it can or cannot consider.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I understand the hon. Gentleman's point of order and it is certainly not a matter on which I could give a decision now. I am sure that the Select Committee will consider the matter in great detail when it starts its deliberations. As regards Mr. Speaker, he will have seen his comments and will no doubt consider them, too.

Vehicle Registration Marks

1.37 pm

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make further provision about the retention of vehicle registration marks pending transfer.

Registration numbers are not items of property in their own right, so it is not possible to acquire legal title to them. They are assigned to, and may be withdrawn from, vehicles rather than keepers, by the Secretary of State, as part of the basic registration and licensing process required by law. The registration number is a unique means of identifying a vehicle, primarily for taxation and law enforcement purposes. It is assigned to a vehicle, and it normally remains with that vehicle until it is broken up, destroyed or sent permanently abroad. To meet the widespread interest in personalised and cherished registration numbers, however, the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency provides special facilities to allow motorists to acquire and retain the use of particular registration numbers.

The current provisions stifle choice and flexibility for the individual and for business. Purchasers of marks on retention are understandably wary, as the keeper is currently unable to give away rights to the number at the point of sale by detailing a new third party as the grantee. That means that the purchaser of a retained number has no rights to it until he or she assigns that number to a vehicle, despite financial payment already having been passed to the vendor. In addition, the co-operation of the original grantee is required to effect assignment to the purchaser's vehicle. It is also the grantee who retains the right to purchase extensions to the 12-month period of entitlement for holding a number on certificate, even after the sale of a number to a third party. There is clearly potential for considerable loss to the purchaser of a number on certificate should entitlement to a number be lost through the non-co-operation of the grantee, or simply the practical difficulty of locating that person.

Attractive registration numbers can fetch large sums. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Minister would be interested in the registration number DT1—probably not, because he might then be assumed to be a Minister at the Department for Trade and Industry rather than a transport Minister. If his middle name were Oliver, he might want a DOT registration. I am sure that both would be extremely expensive. There is, however, a growing business out there. One company trading from an office just outside my Preston constituency, newreg.com, has been hugely successful in building up such a business in a legitimate fashion, but elsewhere there have been several cases of organised criminal activity aimed at acquiring valuable numbers by illegal means.

The transfer and retention facilities must therefore be carefully controlled to cut abuse and protect individuals' interests. Only vehicles that exist and are registered at the DVLA, currently licensed, subject to an annual test and available for inspection may participate. Vehicles that satisfy those requirements are generally easier to identify, so their entitlement to the numbers claimed can be more readily verified. Those measures have proved very effective in limiting the scope for abuse, and they are strongly supported by the police.

Only the registered keeper of a vehicle may apply to transfer or retain its registration mark. As I said earlier, when a vehicle's registration mark is placed on retention the registered keeper becomes the grantee. The Cherished Numbers Dealers Association has requested the addition of a facility to the retention arrangements, to ease the administrative burden on the companies that make up the association and to improve sales.

Regulations provide that entitlement to a number that is on retention may pass to a third party only on assignment of the number to that person's vehicle via nominee agreement. That arrangement precludes the disposal of a number to a third party who wishes to keep the number on retention. I propose the introduction of an option for third parties to be granted entitlement as soon as the number is placed on hold under the retention facility.

The Bill would aid the industry involved in buying, selling and transferring registration mark rights, with no additional costs to Government. It would amend the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994 to simplify the administrative process for selling cherished registration numbers, and would be warmly welcomed by many customers as well as cherished number dealers. The new facilities would allow an improved service at no extra cost to the DVLA or its customers, and would not endanger the accuracy of the record or lead to an increase in fraud. I understand that there has been informal consultation between the DVLA and the CNDA, and that both are strongly in favour of the proposed changes. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mark Hendrick, Tony Lloyd, Mr. Jamie Reed, Mr. David Drew, Mr. Greg Pope, Mr. Neil Turner, Mr. Mike Hall, Steve McCabe, Paul Farrelly and Derek Wyatt.

Vehicle Registration Marks

Mr. Mark Hendrick accordingly presented a Bill to make further provision abut the retention of vehicle registration marks pending transfer: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 11 November, and to be printed [Bill 48].

Council Tax/

1.44 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): I beg to move,

That the draft Council Tax Limitation (England) (Maximum Amounts) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 7th July, be approved.

The order will be made under section 52F(4) of the Local Government Finance Act 1992, which was inserted by the Local Government Act 1999. In my view, its provisions are compatible with the convention rights. It sets out maximum 2005–06 budget requirements for eight local authorities, which means that they are being capped in year. The eight authorities named in the order, all district councils, are Aylesbury Vale, Daventry, Hambleton, Huntingdonshire, Mid-Bedfordshire, North Dorset, Runnymede and South Cambridgeshire.

Subject to the House's approval, I will make the order and issue notices to the authorities about their maximum 2005–06 budget requirements—that is, their caps. They will then be required to recalculate budget requirements that are at or below the level of the caps. They will also have to send revised council tax bills for the current year.

On 23 March, my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) made a statement in the House about the capping action that the Government proposed to take in 2005–06. He pointed out that the Government had first used their reserve capping powers in 2004–05, and that we had made clear that we were prepared to take even tougher action this year if necessary. He said that he was pleased to see most authorities responding positively to the Government's strong message on council tax. Let me add some figures to those words. That means that 447 of the 456 authorities—98 per cent.—did not set excessive budget and council tax increases, which is a credit to those authorities individually and to local government as a whole.

Some authorities, however, did impose unreasonable increases on their council tax payers. My right hon. Friend therefore went on to say on 23 March that the Government were designating nine authorities with a view to capping them in year.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): Why did the Government recognise the position of low-taxing authorities last year by taking into account the absolute level of tax, and choose not to do so this year? Where is the consistency in that?

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Gentleman makes a point that he and his council have made before. It is true that the criteria applied this year were, in some instances, different from those applied in previous years. The Government are trying to avoid the second-guessing whereby councils try to set their tax and budgets at the level that they expect the capping regime to produce, which is a self-fulfilling prophecy. The hon. Gentleman's point has been noted. I hope that if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall be able to answer his question more fully later.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Woolas: I will take some interventions when I have set out the principles of the order.

As I was saying, my right hon. Friend announced that the Government were designating nine authorities. He proposed maximum budget requirements for them at levels that would not be defined as excessive according to principles determined by the Secretary of State. As I said in my written statement to the House on 7 July, when the order was laid, all nine designated authorities challenged the proposed maximum budgets.

The Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Jim Fitzpatrick), and I met representatives of all those authorities to listen to their cases. Having carefully considered the representations made by all nine of them—and, indeed, by Members present in the Chamber today—and having taken into account all relevant information, the Government have reached the following decisions. We have set a maximum budget for seven authorities—Aylesbury Vale, Daventry, Hambleton, Huntingdonshire, Mid-Bedfordshire, North Dorset and Runnymede—at the levels we proposed on 23 March. We have set a maximum budget for South Cambridgeshire that is £1 million higher than the originally proposed cap, in order to allow the authority time to reduce its over-reliance on reserves.

We have decided to cancel Sedgemoor's designation and to nominate the authority instead. [Interruption.] I am grateful for that acknowledgement. We propose a notional budget of £11,974,169 for 2005–06, which takes account of the fact that the authority made a genuine mistake in thinking that special expenses did not count against its budget for capping purposes. I should emphasise that in doing so we have not set a precedent for the treatment of special expenses in future capping rounds; authorities should be in no doubt that such expenses form part of their budget requirement. There is no parliamentary procedure involved in setting notional budgets for nominated authorities, so the draft order before us does not include Sedgemoor. But Sedgemoor has 21 days from receipt of the letter in which to challenge its proposed notional budget, should it choose to do so.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is laying this order before the House in order to protect council tax payers, but given that none of the capped authorities has a council tax greater than his own authority in Oldham, East, can he explain why he is not capping his own?

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Gentleman is talking about actual levels of council tax, but the capping order before us today relates to percentage increases. That is the regime and the policy being pursued. The legislative definition—by which the Secretary of State clearly has to abide—is concerned with what constitutes "excessive". I understand the point behind the hon. Gentleman's intervention, which other Members representing authorities affected by the measure have also made forcefully, although courteously and reasonably. They have asked whether this is a fair way to proceed, especially in cases where the council tax level is below the average for the type of authority in question. Of course, the counterpoint to that argument is the obvious, arithmetic one: ignoring the average level would simply bring about a self-fulfilling prophecy. We have to look at this issue from the point of view of the council tax payers in the affected areas.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): My hon. Friend mentioned the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), in which he laid down the criteria and said in conclusion:

"These principles have been applied to all authorities."—[Official Report, 23 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 884.]

Does my hon. Friend not accept, therefore, that the capping criteria are universal—and pretty crude?

Mr. Woolas: They are neither crude nor universal. The increases proposed by some of the councils that we are discussing today, even after the cap has been put in place, are still greater than the capped increases being made by other councils. Members present have doubtless prepared speeches pointing out the alleged inconsistency in this viewpoint, but both viewpoints cannot be true. My hon. Friend, who has dealt with these matters for many more years than I have, and who has been a champion of local devolution and local autonomy, suggests that we are going back on our policy. Of course, we have to take into account local authorities' statutory duties and their particular circumstances, so I reject the accusation that the capping criteria are crude and universal. However, I have no doubt that my hon. Friend will carry on his campaign against any form of capping regime.

Mr. Walter: The hon. Gentleman referred to "excessive" spending and said that spending must be in the context of the area in question. Perhaps he can therefore explain why in my authority, a band D council tax increase of £98 is considered excessive, whereas in the neighbouring constituency—it was retained by his colleague, the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight)—Weymouth and Portland borough council has set a council tax increase of £232 for band D properties. Most of my constituents would say that those authorities are in the same area.

Mr. Woolas: Of course, different authorities of the same nature in similar geographical areas often have different budgets and apply different council tax increases. I remember following closely debates in this House that compared Lambeth and Wandsworth boroughs. I do not suppose that the residents of Lambeth were satisfied with the outcome, either, but that is the nature of local authorities. One has to start from where one is, and from the point of view of the council tax payer. However, if the hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) is successful in catching your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, perhaps he can amplify his point.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend not accept that we will always be in this predicament until we sort out the banding system and the standard spending assessment?

Mr. Woolas: I take my hon. Friend's point, but it would be wise of me to exercise caution and to refrain from commenting on the banding process at the moment. As we know, the Lyons review is examining the future of local government finance, and the standard spending assessment has been replaced by the formula spending share. Members who have followed these debates closely will have noted that yesterday I laid before the House a written ministerial statement announcing the consultation document on the future of the formula. We are consulting on whether we should continue with what is referred to as the notional level of council tax, which often causes confusion and is used by parties across the political spectrum to attack their political opponents. I understand why that happens, but on the whole it does not benefit local government.

We believe that the action proposed in the draft order, and the separate action that we are taking in respect of Sedgemoor, represent a measured and proportionate response to excessive increases. As we have said on previous occasions, capping decisions are not taken lightly. Indeed, I should like to make it clear for the benefit of the record that capping is very much a last resort, and that 98 per cent. of councils avoided the capping regime. In the first instance, it is for local authorities to set their council tax levels and to justify them to their local electors. But the Government also have a duty to protect council tax payers from the small percentage of authorities that set excessive increases. Indeed, the House agreed to that principle when it discussed local government finance legislation.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Why is the Minister so hooked on percentages? Surely the bottom line for council tax payers such as me who live in Hambleton is that it has the third lowest council tax in the country. Why is he penalising prudent Conservative-run councils that are keeping a low council tax?

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Lady has made a very strong case on behalf of her area on this issue, and in respect of other difficulties that it has suffered in recent times. I should perhaps take advice from those hon. Gentlemen who are about to instruct Hansard to insert laughter, but I must say that there is no party political element in this matter—[Laughter.] There is no pre-ordained position and even the most cynical of Front-Bench Opposition spokesmen on local government could not contrive to imagine that I would be ingenious enough to predict that this would affect only Conservative councils. Indeed, some of the local authorities affected have independent, Labour and Liberal Democrat members, some of whom are opposed to the decision and some of whom are in favour.

I believe that I have already answered the substantial point made by the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), but let me cite two reasons for our decision. One is that we have to start from where we are. It is the excessiveness that is at issue, as specified under the legislation, and I am rightly obliged to follow up what that legislation specifies. It is the excessiveness involved in moving from A to B that matters. Secondly—[Interruption.] I am going to repeat this second point because the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) is looking either threatening or puzzled—and quite possibly both. If he can contain himself and listen to my argument first, he can then disagree, although he will doubtless disagree with me whatever I say. My second argument is that using percentages covers the point about step changes and differences. Percentages help to address the real problem faced by Governments of any colour—the danger of the self-fulfilling prophecy.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): I thank the Minister for his courtesy in giving way and for the way in which he is manifestly making the best of an unbelievably appalling job. Whatever the formulaic procedure, I put it to the Minister that what constituents demand of us and what the people demand of the Government is a judgment: sometimes something that is set out in black and white becomes patently ridiculous or nonsensical, at which stage the Government should take the decision not to proceed with it. If the Minister applied his personal judgment to what he is reading out, he would not be in the position that he has to defend this afternoon.

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Gentleman, who is among the most courteous Members of the House and a champion of his constituency. I recognise that what he says today is spoken on behalf of his constituency. The House will notice that no Member who has intervened so far, apart perhaps from my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts), has disagreed with the principle of capping—[Interruption.]

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Woolas: Well, my preparations for this debate have just proved to be accurate in this regard, because if we can have a statement from the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman to say that his party would rule out any form of capping—universal, crude, targeted or otherwise—that would be interesting to hear. [Interruption.] Already, I hear some qualifications, but I look forward to Conservative policy being put clearly on the record when the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) speaks. I am sure that the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) will want to put her party's position on the record, too. Very high local income tax rates would, of course, follow any such pronouncement.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): We were on the subject of excessive spending and the Minister implied that he was effectively constrained by the legislation, but he knows that that is not true. The intention behind the Government's changes of 1999 was precisely to allow discretion in respect of the circumstances in which capping is applied as an exceptional measure. As far as South Cambridgeshire is concerned, the Minister has demonstrated such discretion by raising the cap, but where in the local representations has anyone suggested to the Minister that reducing the spending of South Cambridgeshire district council by 13 per cent. in comparison with last year's budget is an appropriate use of discretion?

Mr. Woolas: There will inevitably—and, I suppose, quite rightly—be some hon. Members who will want to make specific points about the budgets of their own councils and the consequential council tax increases. I will attempt to answer all the points if we can proceed to debate the issues sensibly within the time allotted. I can tell the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire that the points that his council made have been listened to and its representations and correspondence have been answered, although not necessarily to its satisfaction.

I am confident, to answer the point raised by the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), that these decisions are consistent not just with the letter of the legislation, but with the general point that the Government have a duty to perform on behalf of council tax payers. In 98 per cent. of cases, the policy has been successful.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Woolas: I will give way one more time, but I am conscious that Mr. Speaker has had to apply limits to Back-Bench speakers and that every intervention I take limits the opportunities of hon. Members to contribute to the debate.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): I just want to put on record our party's opposition to capping in principle and remind the Minister that it was not so long ago that his party was also opposed to capping in principle. How far we have moved since!

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Lady for being clear about her party's policy—that there will be no capping regime of any sort whatever under a Liberal Democrat regime.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con) rose—

Mr. Woolas: I really must move on. As I have already said, the more interventions that I take, the fewer the opportunities for hon. Members to contribute to the debate.

The hon. Member for Brent, East made her point clearly. To be fair—something that I am always in favour of—my own party's manifesto, on which we fought the election, included the point that a limited capping regime was our policy. It is the case that, three years ago, council tax increased by 12.9 per cent. on average, before the capping regime, yet this year the average increase was 4.1 per cent. Those two statistics are not coincidental.

In laying this order, we are keeping our promise to act on excessive council tax increases. That promise was made in our manifesto. Opposition Members are too easily dismissive of another important point—the Government have provided all authorities with grant increases in line with or above inflation in all of the last three years. Overall, the funding that we have provided for local government has increased in real terms by 33 per cent. since 1997—a real terms increase of a third in the Government grant to local authorities. That compares favourably with what came before us, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although I do not want to say that all the evil was done under the last Conservative Government—just most of it. It compares with a cut in real terms of 7 per cent. in the four years before 1997. The financial regime and the financial climate for local authorities has changed substantially. In that context, local authorities have to look long and hard before proposing significant council tax increases. If central Government were to propose significant or, indeed, any increases in other taxation policy, Opposition Members would not be—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar says from a sedentary position that we have proposed other increases—

Mr. Pickles: Through the council tax.

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Gentleman may say that, but that is the very issue that I am addressing. People cannot have their cake and eat it—in that regard or any other.

Given the Government's substantial investment in local government, there is simply no justification for authorities setting excessive council tax increases. We have shown over the past two years that we will take action to deal with that. No authority should assume that it is somehow immune to or exempt from possible capping action in the future.

As I said, our general election manifesto reaffirmed our commitment to use these powers if necessary and as a last resort. It is up to authorities to take that message on board.

Those hon. Members minded to oppose this order must answer the following questions. Do they support percentage council tax increases that go well into double figures? Do they feel that the Government should take no action on increases of up to 100 per cent.? Will they go out and defend such increases to their constituents?

Mr. Philip Hammond: I will.

Mr. Woolas: Well, that is for each hon. Member to decide. We must not forget the public in this debate, and they have made their views clear. They are not prepared to accept excuses for excessive council tax increases—

Mr. Djanogly: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Gentleman is getting very excited, so I will give way to him.

Mr. Djanogly: The Minister says that he is responding to what residents and constituents have said, but that is not the case in Huntingdonshire. At the polls, people elected a Conservative administration based on the budget that he is now capping.

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention and I take it that, if he gets a chance to speak in the debate, he will make it clear that he—like the hon. Member for Brent, East—is opposed to any capping regime. I look forward to his contribution on that matter. I can assure the House that my folder is brimming with contrary reactions from people in respect of the council tax levels that have been set.

As I said, the public have made their views clear: they are not prepared to accept excuses for excessive council tax increases, either this year or in the future. The Government will not accept such excuses either. I therefore urge hon. Members to support the order.

2.11 pm

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): The Minister said that his folder is brimming with correspondence from people in the various capped authorities making it clear that they want the capping regime. He would do the House an enormous service by publishing those letters in the Library. I suspect that the folder must be very thin.

The Minister has my sympathy. I have responded to capping orders such as this for some years, and I have never seen a Minister more uncomfortable or embarrassed. He has been given a dreadful task for his first major appearance in this role, and he is diminished in his office as a result. Those above him have sent him to the Dispatch Box like Captain Ahab in search of the great white whale, but all he has done is harpoon a handful of minnows.

Residents in Labour authorities have seen their council tax go through the roof year after year, while the Government have stood idly by. Now, the Government have sprung into action to cap eight Conservative authorities, and the weekly savings of all eight in total amount to less than a packet of crisps per council tax payer. The Local Government Association, at its press conference of 7 July, rightly called the capping decision "stupid". It expressed its dismay at the decision and said that it would leave local people short changed.

The LGA's Labour group leader is Sir Jeremy Beecham, a man much respected in this House. He said:

"We are, and have always been, opposed to capping."

So let us be clear: the eight councils involved would not have been capped if they had imposed the same increases in council tax last year. I can go further, and say that no capping regime under any previous Labour or Conservative Government would have caught these eight councils. They have been capped only because, close to a general election, the Government devised a set of rules to catch Conservative authorities.

The decision is not an administrative one, but represents political vindictiveness at its most base. All the authorities being capped are low-tax authorities. Compared to neighbouring authorities, they all charge residents less in council tax, even after original proposed increases for this year have been taken into account. These eight authorities charge low council tax, and yet they deliver high-quality public services.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): That is debatable.

Mr. Pickles: The hon. Lady says that that is debatable, but that is what Government statistics show. Is she disagreeing with her own Government? The Government's comprehensive performance assessment regime rated three of the eight authorities—Hambleton, Huntingdonshire and Runnymede—as excellent. Aylesbury Vale was rated good, and only one of the eight was rated below fair. If the hon. Lady wants to engage in a debate about the performance of those authorities, she ought to know that Opposition Members would be very happy to oblige her. We recognise a good council when we see one.

When the Government introduced the CPA inspection regime they made it clear that councils rated as excellent or good would not be subject to capping. The order before us today shows that to be yet another broken promise. Nearly all the authorities being capped are rural based. It can cost to provide the same services in rural communities as are provided in towns and cities but, despite that, the authorities covered by the order provide good services for their residents at low cost.

Only one authority—Sedgemoor district council—has escaped capping this year. I wondered about that, and decided to have a close look. It has escaped because it did not impose much of an increase in the first place. However, a town council within Sedgemoor district council area is controlled by the Labour party. It was decided that that town council should put a significant amount into this year's increase, whereas the sensible thing to do would have been to spread that amount around. Perhaps the Minister could not bring himself to cap an authority whose increases were caused by fellow Labour party members. There is clearly one rule for the Conservative party, and another rule for Labour.

Mr. Betts: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pickles: After what he said about crude and universal capping, how could I refuse the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Betts: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has not refused me, but I want to be certain about where his party is coming from on this issue. Does he oppose the order because of a technical disagreement about the capping criteria, which he believes are wrong, or is the Conservative party now against any form of capping whatsoever?

Mr. Pickles: When I sat on the Government Benches, I made a robust defence of capping, as Hansard will show. I do not want to compare myself to the great English martyr Cranmer and pretend that making that speech was equivalent to putting my hand into the flame, but it is probable that a Conservative Government would retain capping as a reserve power. However, I am certain that we would not waste anyone's time targeting low-taxation and high-efficiency councils that are little more than minnows. I can give a clear commitment on that.

I shall offer a few examples. After the cost of re-billing is taken into account, the saving accruing from capping Aylesbury Vale amounts to 1p a week for each member of the local population. I had the opportunity to listen to the Minister of Communities and Local Government address the LGA conference at Harrogate, when he said that he wanted a partnership with local government. He claimed to have no desire to micro-manage local government, but this order represents micro-management of local government right down to a single penny. It is a very bad start for the right hon. Gentleman and an even worse one for the Minister.

Daventry charges the second lowest council tax in Northamptonshire. Its band D charge amounts to £125.65, which is some £20 lower than Labour-run Corby. Daventry is being capped and Corby is not. Daventry district council has lost out significantly on housing revenue subsidies, which the Government abolished. The process of building up its balances has caused the increase, 10 per cent. of which simply results from the change in housing revenue subsidies. If the figure for Aylesbury Vale is 1p a week per resident, what is it for Daventry? It is 2.5p, when rounded up.

Hambleton district council set a band D council tax of £68, which compares with £131.76 in Selby, next door; £139.86 in Richmondshire; £152.43 in Ryedale; £172.59 in Scarborough; and £177.72 in Harrogate. Even with this year's increase, the council tax set in Hambleton remains the lowest in the area and one of the lowest in the country. When the cost of re-billing is taken into account, the saving is thruppence a week. I know that the people of Yorkshire recognise value, but I suspect that thruppence a week tries their patience a little.

Huntingdonshire district council is rated as an excellent council under the CPA regime. Its council tax remains one the lowest in the country and, even after this year's increase, moves from being the second lowest in Cambridgeshire to the lowest. After the cost of re-billing is taken into account, the saving is tuppence a week. In Mid-Bedfordshire, after taking account of the same cost, the saving is reduced to thruppence a week.

As has been said, compared to other authorities in the area, North Dorset district council charges one of the lowest council taxes. East Dorset has set a band D council tax of £154.34. The figure for West Dorset is £110.70. Labour-controlled Weymouth and Portland has set a tax of a staggering £222.11. After the cost of re-billing is taken into account, the amount saved is 8p a week per resident.

Runnymede borough council set the lowest council tax in Surrey and is one of the lowest council tax charging authorities in the country. Let us compare those figures with Liberal Democrat-controlled Waverley borough council's band D council tax of £138.78. Lib-Lab run Woking has set a tax of £174.11; and the figure in independent-run Epsom and Ewell is £133.34. When Runnymede's "excellent" CPA rating is added to that, it is clear that Runnymede borough council is a low-taxing, high-delivery local authority. The cost of re-billing is 5p a week per resident.

The figures for South Cambridgeshire district council seem high, but they must be set against the fact that South Cambridgeshire has for years consistently charged a lot less than its neighbours. In 2004–05, South Cambridgeshire charged a band D council tax of £70. Other authorities in Cambridgeshire charged as follows: Cambridge city, £131.65; East Cambridgeshire district council, £149.00; and Fenland, £195.51. Even with the doubling of the council tax, South Cambridgeshire district council moved from being the lowest charging council tax authority in Cambridgeshire to the second lowest. After the cost of re-billing is taken into account, we are talking about a saving of 36p a week per resident.

After the whole process, most councillors in this country are Conservatives. We are the largest party in local government, and we produce the lowest figures. If people vote Labour, they are likely to pay £74 a year more tax at band D. If they vote Liberal Democrat, they are likely to pay £83 a year more.

The final bill on the doorstep for each of those capped authorities will be significantly lower than the price paid by council tax payers in the Prime Minister's constituency and considerably lower than in the Minister's constituency. The increase in those taxes is virtually indistinguishable from the figures for Sedgefield district council, South Tyneside council and Oldham council. There is something deeply wrong with the assessment. I suspect that, if we count up all the savings and the costs of the Minister's time, this debate and the order, the Minister, by his foolishness, has almost certainly cost the taxpayer of this country a far greater amount than he has saved. He should look discomfited. This is a disgrace. This dreadful decision sends out the worst kind of message to local government. It tells local government, "Do as you're told, or we'll have you."

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I remind the House that Mr. Speaker has placed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches, which applies from now on.

2.25 pm

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): I want to make it clear from the beginning that, unfortunately, I will not be able to support the Government on this issue today, just as I was unable to do so last year. I am against capping in principle—I always have been, and I suspect that I probably always will be, despite the arguments that my hon. Friends use today and that will probably be used at the end of the debate. Equally, I will not go into the Lobby with the Conservative party because its argument is about the technicalities of how capping has been used and which councils have been caught. That is not a fundamental opposition to capping. Indeed, many Conservative Members were responsible for much more draconian capping regimes when they were in government, which particularly hit authorities such as mine in Sheffield.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): If the hon. Gentleman will not join the Conservative party in the Lobby, will he join us? We are opposed, as he is, to capping in principle.

Mr. Betts: I appreciate the fact that the Liberal Democrats oppose capping in principle, but the main Opposition party clearly has a different reason for opposing the order on this occasion. I am stating my principles, and I shall abstain in any Division on the order as a result.

Fundamentally, I do not accept that there is any difference between Labour capping and Tory capping. I heard what my hon. Friend the Minister said earlier, but the universal criteria that have been laid down and applied to all councils are pretty crude. The criteria conflict with the commitments that we made before we came into government, and I will remind the House of them. It is probably appropriate that I quote the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my right hon. Friend and colleague the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), whom Hansard records as saying:

> "My answer to that is as simple as my answer to all questions about poll tax capping. It is our job to make democracy work better, not to abolish it."—[Official Report, 12 July 1990; Vol. 176, c. 499.]

I agree with my right hon. Friend on that point.

In 1997, when we came into government, we signed the European charter of local self-government, which gives councils rights to raise revenue locally. I accept that there are caveats: councils must work within statute and within the national economic policy in determining their spending. Again, I quote the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), who told the House:

"The Labour party is wholly and unequivocally opposed to the capping of a council's budget. It is an abuse of central power, it demeans democracy, it undermines the right of local people to decide what services they are ready and will to pay for, it is in breach of one promise after another from the Conservative party, it serves no economic purpose, and it has not worked in its own terms."—[Official Report, 9 June 1993; Vol. 226, c. 385.]

That is a fairly powerful argument against capping, and I support that view.

It is rather sad when parties in opposition become much stronger champions of local democracy than when in government. That applies in spades to the Conservative party, which is now revising what it is prepared to do in the name of local democracy in a way that is completely contrary to everything that it did when in government.

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman not think the same thing about the Labour party now that it is in office?

Mr. Betts: What I have to say very simply—I was going to come on to this point—is that the Government have done many things that have carried through from opposition to government the promises that they made in respect of local authority resources, borrowing, prudential guidelines and the right to trade. A number of rights and powers have been given to local authorities in contradiction to the policy of the Conservative party, which constantly took away rights and powers. I just happen to believe that the capping order today is not one of the good things that the Government have done.

Mr. Pickles: The hon. Gentleman stands before us a paragon of virtue, but I recall his period of distinguished service in the Whips Office during which he forced several of his colleagues to take some pretty anti-local government decisions. Does he regret that? Does he wish to recant now? He has a sympathetic audience; we will be kind to him.

Mr. Betts: I do not think that I ever forced anyone to do anything when I was a Whip. I might have used my powers of persuasion on occasion, but I am always open to persuasion myself.

I shall not engage in argument over whether the budgets and council tax set by any of the councils in question are right, because I do not know whether they are right or excessive, or whether the councils are efficient or inefficient, and I do not believe that it is my job or that of any Member of Parliament to second-guess decisions that are the responsibility and the role of locally elected councils, which should be accountable to their electorate. That is how such decisions should be made. I honestly believe that when they troop into the Lobby, most Members of this House will not have a clue what they are doing—what impact the order will have on local services in the areas affected by it. That is why it is important to leave those decisions to local councillors and the electorate to whom they are responsible.

In the 1980s, many Labour Members, I among them, stood in solidarity against the capping regimes of the then Conservative Government. We stood with local councillors, local councils, council workers and local voters. We were not arguing about the correctness or otherwise of the spending level that any of the councils had determined; we were supporting the basic principle of local democracy and local determination of levels of spending and tax. We did not call it subsidiarity back then, but that, in effect, was what we were championing.

The Government are rightly worried about voter turnout at both general and local elections, but capping is not only about central control of local councils; it is about removing the democratic rights of local residents, removing voter choice and devaluing local elections. In my view, capping is a fundamental challenge to the very basis of local democracy. To quote again:

"The capping system is patently undemocratic. It serves no wider economic purpose in the control of public expenditure."—[Official Report, 9 June 1993; Vol. 226, c. 387.]

That was my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn. His statement is just as true now as it was in 1993.

2.32 pm

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts), who so eloquently stated the case against capping and the principles behind this debate.

For me, the order is without doubt the most extraordinary, absurd and vindictive measure that I have seen since entering Parliament. Labour's historic third term has produced legislation—with all the civil service manpower that such legislation entails, with all the ministerial time and the meetings with councils—for what? It is to save taxpayers in eight authorities as little as 4p a week—£2 a year—enough to buy perhaps two packets of Polos. In the House of Commons Strangers Bar, it might just buy a pint of Guinness. I cannot help wondering whether the Minister should just save us all time and trouble by popping down to Aylesbury Vale and buying all the good voters a pint; then we could all go home. That would be a lot cheaper than going through the rigmarole of laying an order, voting on it and asking councils to re-bill. We seem to be engaged in the most ridiculous process that I have ever seen, and I hope that I do not see anything more ridiculous in my time as an MP. [HON. MEMBERS: "You'll be lucky."] Hon. Members should not get too excited.

As the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe said, capping is an affront to local democracy. It undermines local people's right to decide what services they want and what they are willing to pay for, and it completely undermines local government's authority to plan, prioritise and make decisions. As he so eloquently pointed out, not so long ago Labour Members who are now Ministers were making precisely the same point.

[Sarah Teather]

Surely the final arbiter of choice must always be the ballot box: it is for local electors to decide what they are willing to pay for and when it is time to get rid of a council that has set excessive council tax increases.

It is no good the Conservatives bleating on about whales and minnows, because it was they who 20 years ago invented rate capping; consequently, they have only themselves to blame. It seems that their policy is to oppose capping when it involves Conservative councils, but they need to oppose capping in principle if they want to be taken seriously.

Alistair Burt: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Sarah Teather: I shall do so willingly in the hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me in opposing capping in principle.

Alistair Burt: I shall ask the hon. Lady the question I wanted to ask rather than follow her lead. I am listening to her speech with great interest; as the rest of us intend to do, she is making a perfectly sensible case against rate capping. Before criticising the Conservatives, will she be good enough to send a copy of her wonderful speech to Councillor Neil Cliff, leader of the Liberal Democrats on Mid Bedfordshire district council, who has found a way to support the Government's decision to rate cap the council?

Sarah Teather: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will send a copy of my speech. I cannot comment on the details of his local council. I am not divinely all-knowing—at least not yet.

Even if we accepted the principle of capping, as some people do although my party does not, the execution of the exercise defies logic. As the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) pointed out, the proposed council tax increases are tiny in cash terms. The councils concerned are among the lowest-taxing councils in the country: Hambleton has the third lowest council tax of any district and all the councils are in the lower quartile of council taxes, with the exception of South Cambridgeshire district council, which is still in the bottom half of the council tax table. It is mathematically ludicrous and meaningless to cap on the basis of percentage increases in such small tax bases. The Minister claims that the low taxes have been taken into account, but that is patent nonsense. As the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman pointed out, Oldham will have a very large council tax increase—£53.75 on the band D rate has been proposed—compared with the increases of about £12 that have been set by the councils affected by the order. Capping them seems utterly ridiculous. Far be it from me to accuse the Minister of macho posturing when he is not much taller than me—[Laughter.] I simply cannot see the purpose of going though such a fuss and performance in the newspapers to secure such tiny savings for taxpayers.

Mr. Woolas: I shall not respond to the hon. Lady's sizeist comment, although my right hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) would have something to say if he were here.

Does the hon. Lady accept my point that the capping regime affects all councils and that the 98 per cent. of councils that did not impose excessive increases must also be taken into account?

Sarah Teather: I do not understand the Minister's point. The capping process is wholly arbitrary. I am entirely opposed to capping on principle and I see no reason to except the councils affected by the order.

Notwithstanding the taxpayers' money wasted debating the order in Parliament, the cost to the councils concerned will be enormous. Hambleton, which is proposing a £12 a year band D increase, estimates that re-billing will cost £50,000. The cost in Daventry will be twice that—about £100,000. In a final Kafka-esque twist, the councils must find savings to cover the cost of rebilling at the same time as they have to find the savings imposed by capping. That makes the whole situation even worse. The order is not about prudential financial planning; it is absurd centralisation gone completely mad.

It is worth considering the background to the increases. Many of the district councils in question had among the smallest percentage increases in grant five years in succession—indeed, Runnymede had the second-lowest increase in the country over that period. This mad order goes against all the warm and fluffy noises that the Government have been making about new localism and valuing local government. Where are the supposed freedoms and flexibilities for the three councils that have been judged excellent by the stringent standards of the Government's own comprehensive performance assessment?

This is not about whether or not a council is judged excellent or whether or not its grant rise is higher than another council's. It is about the principle of local democracy, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe pointed out. It is about local people being able to decide what should be spent on their services and being able to kick out a council if they are not happy with it, or vote it back in if they are happy with its priorities. If the Government seriously wish to tackle council tax rises, they must deal with the balance of funding crisis, and give more power to councils to raise more money themselves. They could start by relocalising business rates. If they seriously wish to end public angst about council tax rises they could scrap the tax, not cap the tax. They could introduce a tax based on people's ability to pay so that yearly rises would not fall so heavily on the elderly and the low-paid.

This is another piece of centralising nonsense from an uninterested Government who are antagonistic towards local democracy. I urge all hon. Members of sound mind to vote against the motion.

2.40 pm

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): As so often, it was my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) who hit the nail on head. He said that he could not accept that the Minister really believed in the case he was putting to the House. It is a tribute to the Minister that he put the best possible gloss on the argument for the order, but it is deeply worrying that, even after he had done so, it is still one of the weakest cases for a Government order that I have heard in the House for many years.

An innocent observer who came to the Chamber today might think that our debate was about excessive council taxes. They might expect us to focus on councils that charge a huge amount in taxation or whose council tax is higher than the average, leading to objections from local people and the need for Government intervention. They would be astonished to discover that the order is not about that at all, and deals with some of the most responsible councils in the country that set some of the lowest council taxes. They would be even more astonished to discover that councils such as Hambleton district council, which my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) and I have the privilege of representing, are affected. The council has the highest possible rating for financial management, according to the Government's audit assessment; it sets a council tax less than half the predicted figure under the Government's own formula spending share; for the past three years, its council tax increases have been less than a third of the national average; its 10-year financial strategy is financially robust and is supported locally; and this year it is proposing an increase at band D of £12.

Most people would give their eye teeth to live under such a council. The vast majority of people in this country would love to do so, so it is extraordinary that councils that fulfil all those criteria are among those whose budgetary freedom is to be taken away under the order. Hambleton district council has the third lowest council tax of any shire district, as my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) and the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) have pointed out. It proposes an £80 council tax at band D, compared with the £182 suggested by the FSS. The Minister knows the background that made that figure possible. The council transferred its housing stock in 1993, and achieved strong balances as a result. In the past 12 years, it has returned nearly £19 million to local taxpayers. For a time, it set its council tax at or near zero, but as its reserves fall it has planned a series of rises that are small in cash terms but which allow modest improvements in services while keeping within a low and disciplined budget.

That is a sensible approach to local government. The problem is blindingly obvious—the Government think only in percentage terms, never in cash terms. If a council starts at or near zero, the slightest increase is obviously a huge percentage. According to the Minister's own criteria, if a council set a council tax of £10 and raised it to £11 that would be regarded as an excessive increase. In his opening speech he asked whether we would be prepared to defend the council tax increases in our constituencies. My answer is yes. I am extremely happy to do so, because my council's policies, including its council tax levels, are very popular. Will the Minister therefore answer a question from me in his winding-up speech? Does he acknowledge that a £10 council tax raised to £11 would be deemed excessive and capped under his criteria? It defies all common sense to judge only by percentages at such levels. No Minister would believe that excessive taxation is being levied in Hambleton district council or most of the other councils that we are debating today. No Minister believes that it is a badly run council. Even more importantly, no local taxpayer or voter thinks that the increase is excessive. The council has received a total of five complaints about the level of council tax—I have received one—so the capping is bizarre and unjustified.

The capping powers that the House provided for the Government were not designed to be applied to the third-lowest taxing authority in the country. The Minister is sending a bad message to local government: if it is responsible, it will ultimately be penalised; if it has a 10-year strategy it will be forced to abandon it; and if it carries local voters with it that can nevertheless be disregarded by the Government. The bizarre and counterproductive nature of the proposals are demonstrated by what will happen in practice if Hambleton district council, for example, is capped under the order. First, it must deliver a refund to council tax payers. At band D, that will be £5.63. My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar has pointed out that each household will therefore only receive a few pennies a week. More than £50,000 will be spent on re-billing. At band A the refund will be only a couple of pounds for each household for the whole year, but the re-billing will cost nearly £1.50. That is the weighty and supposedly wise decision that the Deputy Prime Minister has made. It is the ultimate example of micro-management.

Secondly, the council will be less able to fund any improvements in local services for which local people have asked, particularly because since the capping decision it has incurred additional costs of £100,000 to clear up after the severe floods in North Yorkshire. My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York has often spoken to Ministers about the floods, because they affected her constituency even more seriously than mine. The Government have not made any allowance for that in their decisions.

Thirdly, and most alarmingly, if the same criteria were applied in future, either the council would have to use up its balances extremely quickly and cut spending by 28 per cent. in the next few years, leaving it with a budget below the statutory minimum or, having exhausted its balances on an accelerated timetable imposed by the Government, it would have to introduce a council tax increase of 91 per cent. in three years' time. I therefore have another question for the Minister. As the Government think that they know better than Hambleton district council and all the people who live in the area, and as they must have thought about the consequences of their capping policy if it continued for several years in a row, do they wish it to plan for a huge council tax rise in a few years' time or for a major reduction in services? It is no good the Minister saying that that is up to the council, because by their actions today the Government are implying that that is not the case. They must therefore take responsibility, whether there is a large council tax rise or a budget below even the statutory minimum in a few years' time.

It is hard to escape the conclusion, having examined all the arguments, that there was a political motivation before the general election behind the decisions on council tax. I hoped that with the appointment of a new Minister things would change after the election. I did not expect the Minister to say that the proposal was unfair and destructive, although we would have wanted him to do so, but I hoped that he would let it fall quietly to one side. There will be no thanks from local voters to the Government for making this decision, only anger that money is to be wasted on bureaucracy and local wishes overridden.

Last week at the Local Government Association conference, the Minister of Communities and Local Government said:

"We need to develop a deal for devolution . . .Your starting point should be that power is exercised at the lowest sensible level."

This week, only five days after he delivered that speech, we have seen how utterly worthless those words have already become. Whatever the motives of the Government, exercising power at the lowest sensible level is certainly not one of them, and it is sad that neither is local democracy or the good financial management of local government, both of which are being damaged today.

2.50 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): It gives me great pleasure to follow my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). The most pertinent point that he mentioned is the £50,000 cost of reissuing council tax bills. The alternative is to reduce services.

I repeat my declaration that my husband and I have chosen to live in Hambleton district because of the excellent services that the council provides and the modest council tax it charges for them. It is interesting to note that in the order the Government have not issued a regulatory impact assessment. That has not been prepared because the Secretary of State cannot make assumptions about which services and activities may be affected when authorities calculate lower budget requirements.

I follow my right hon. Friend's question to the Minister with a modest question of my own. The Secretary of State may not be prepared to say which services should be cut, but which services does the Minister think should be cut? I pay tribute to what Hambleton council has done. It is a prudent council that is known for its excellence, as my right hon. Friend said. It is also a listening council that has just conducted a consultation exercise, about which the Minister heard when my right hon. Friend and I made representations to him.

As a result of that consultation, the council has decided to commit an additional £500,000 to improve housing benefit performance; to improve development control performance; to introduce additional half-fare travel for young people, recognising that in a rural district there are distinct access problems; and to pay for patrol wardens to assist with a cleaner environment and the control of nuisance behaviour and fear of crime. That has been decided even before the council considers its obligations under the Clean Neighbourhood and Environment Act 2005. Having served for some two months on the Committee that considered the Bill, I know how onerous those duties will be. The council will also improve homeless support, recognising the increased number of homeless people. Top of the list, as my right hon. Friend said, is the council's response to the major flooding in the district, which we have experienced three times in the past five years—in Thirsk in Hambleton district within the Vale of York twice during that time, and in 2000, 2003 and 2005 in the whole of Hambleton district.

The Minister has not responded to my letter to him and my plea not to proceed with the order in the light of an application from Hambleton district council and North Yorkshire county council under the Bellwin formula. Why are the Department and the Minister not reading across to their responsibilities in that regard? The threshold is £1.5 million, which the council must first spend from its own funds. It has therefore rightly chosen to go in with North Yorkshire county council and Ryedale district council as well. The Minister must live up to his responsibilities. Against that background of three floods in five years, with an application to be submitted within a month of the floods of 19 June, it is irresponsible of the Minister to proceed with the order. My first question to him was which services he suggests Hambleton should cut. My second question is what are the implications of the capping scheme for the Bellwin formula?

My third question, which I put to the Minister in an earlier intervention, is will he please drop his obsession with percentages and reward councils such as Hambleton district council for the excellent services that they provide, for the prudence with which they seek to deliver those services, and for achieving the third lowest council tax in the country? I pay tribute to the council's performance and to the brilliance of its staff. It must be a kick in the teeth and a slap in the face for those staff, who often work in extremely difficult conditions. In the recent floods, staff from Hambleton district council were among the first, with the emergency services and North Yorkshire county council, to step into people's homes late in the evening of Sunday 19 June and put themselves in harm's way when everyone else was running away from the floods. It is insulting that the Minister does not recognise the services that council staff provide.

It is true that, technically, the order caps councils that breach a 5 per cent. threshold for council tax increases, yet the tax in Hambleton district council is among the lowest in the country. Will the Minister confirm that the rule setting the 5 per cent. threshold was published after the process for setting the council tax was in place for the current tax year? Is that fair? Is that due process? Could not that be challenged in law?

Rebilling will cost £50,000. How does the Minister envisage that that will take place? In its view, the council is being penalised for having an historically low council tax, a policy that it intends to maintain into the future. It intends to force a solution to deal with excessive taxation, as my right hon. Friend described. Any cash increase on a low council tax base is bound to be higher in percentage terms than in other authorities that have higher council tax bases than Hambleton. The Minister designated the lowest district council tax, including parishes, for 2004–05, and Hambleton district council is the third lowest in 2005–06. That position will not change after the capping order, but the effect of capping will be to destroy the prudent financial management that has delivered excellent services at low cost, resulting in a 40 per cent. cut in budget over 10 years. It will leave the council financially non-viable.

The Minister will create a situation that requires a massive council tax increase in future for the council to remain viable, rather than the sustainable increase set out in the council's financial plans. Like my right hon. Friend, I urge the Minister to consider the implications of the message going out from the House this afternoon. It is perverse to penalise a prudent council that is providing excellent services and that has the third lowest council tax in the country. It is even more perverse to cap it in a year in which it has suffered its third severe flooding in less than five years. With his decision he has burdened the council with the additional cost of £50,000 to reverse the council tax bills. His policy of capping is inconsistent with previous Government commitments that local taxes should be determined, as my right hon. Friend said, by local councils. I urge the Minister to withdraw the order or the House to reject it.

2.58 pm

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am glad to follow my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) and my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), who spoke on behalf of Hambleton district council. Their explanation of that council's circumstances illustrates the position of South Cambridegeshire. My right hon. Friend said that if the council proceeds in the way that the Government demands of it, in a few years it will have to choose between a large increase in council tax or a major reduction in services.

In recent years South Cambridgeshire district council, with large reserves, chose to subsidise its council tax and keep it low. In the current financial year it had to choose between a substantial increase in council tax or a substantial reduction in services. After 2,500 responses from people across the district, the council decided that there should be an increase from £70 on band D council tax to £140, which the Minister will say is an excessive increase because it has doubled. Of course, however, the increase was proposed from a low base and a below-average shire district council tax. It was proposed after years of subsidising the council tax out of reserves.

The only alternative, which the Government now seem set upon demanding of South Cambridgeshire district council, is a substantial reduction in services. As the Minister said, the Government proposed a £3.6 million reduction to the budget requirement. After receiving representations, they changed that to £2.6 million. However, we have the problem that the budget requirement, as the Government calculate it, is not a measure of a council's spending year to year, but a measure derived after the use of balances.

On the face of it, South Cambridgeshire's budget requirement went up from just over £9 million to nearly £14 million, but in reality the council proposed an £850,000 budget increase from £13.75 million, or a 6.2 per cent. increase. However, the order means that the Minister is effectively demanding that South Cambridgeshire's budget last year of £13.75 million should be reduced to £12 million this year. I cannot in my wildest imagination understand how a capping regime that is designed to reduce excessive spending can demand that a council reduces its expenditure year on year by 13 per cent.—from £13.75 million to £12 million. That is an utterly perverse effect.

The Minister knows that he has the discretion to change these things because he has already changed the proposal once. All my colleagues who are demanding that their councils should be permitted to make larger increases than 5.5 per cent. from their low council tax bases should take heart from the fact that the Minister has accepted that council tax in South Cambridgeshire should go up by a third, because that was the effect of the way in which the order was amended after the initial determination. I cannot take much comfort from that because although many arguments are made about the trivial nature of the Government's proposals for other authorities' budgets, the situation in South Cambridgeshire is not trivial. The order will lead to the existing service base being greatly reduced, so we are not talking about the ability to increase and improve services there, although we wish to do so.

The Minister knows what those reductions will be. As my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York said, the Government might not admit to making assumptions about the consequences of the order, but they know those consequences. Although I shall not go through the whole list, they know that arts development grants will disappear in South Cambridgeshire, as will sports development grants. Community development expenditure will have to be curtailed. Such development is occurring in places such as Cambourne, which is a new settlement in my constituency, to try to accommodate the tens of thousands of new homes that South Cambridgeshire must have because the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has demanded it of us. Emergency planning will stop. Travellers' caravan sites could not be refurbished and improved, or provided. Building control regulations will have to be curbed, as will community safety and crime and disorder partnership activities. A whole string of activities, including statutory functions, will be affected.

It is thus simply not true, as the Government claimed in the statement on 7 July, that the order is compatible with authorities being able to continue to maintain service levels and to deliver their statutory functions. If that were the case, it could be true in South Cambridgeshire only if there was a further substantial reduction in balances this year, meaning that there would be no room whatsoever for further council tax amelioration through transfers from balances next year. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks said, the Minister is proposing to throw the medium-term financial strategy of South Cambridgeshire district council out of the window, which is in complete contravention of the interests of my constituents and the residents of the council.

It is absurd for the Minister to say that the Government are increasing support to local government across the board. We are debating the circumstances of individual authorities such as mine, which is a relatively low-spending authority—it is in the lowest quartile of expenditure. My authority sets a below-average council tax and that set by some other authorities is very low. However, the total external support for South Cambridgeshire has gone down by a third in the past decade. The revenue support grant for South Cambridgeshire is only £18 a head—£12 a head less than even the grant for Huntingdonshire, which is a low-spending authority that receives little external support.

[Mr. Andrew Lansley]

The Minister regards the proposed increase to South Cambridgeshire's budget as excessive, but it represents only an £850,000 increase in expenditure. The largest component of the increase is more than £500,000 to deal with the consequences of enforcement and legal action relating to Travellers in South Cambridgeshire. I will not dwell on this matter because we have debated it separately. My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) and I have told the Minister's colleagues how necessary it is that South Cambridgeshire and other authorities have powers to ensure that planning laws relating to Travellers are upheld and that they receive the support of Government enforcement. However, that is simply not happening, which has the consequence of creating enormous additional cost. That was why two thirds of the proposed budget increase was precisely to meet enforcement costs relating to Travellers.

Despite failing to support South Cambridgeshire in that respect, however, and having demanded that tens of thousands of additional homes are built in South Cambridgeshire, having failed to use the revenue support grant to provide any additional significant support to the authority, and having demanded that it cuts its budget, the Minister comes to the House with the argument that he is protecting the council tax payers of South Cambridgeshire. However, that argument has no support from me or the residents of South Cambridgeshire. He is not protecting council tax payers, but proposing a complete absurdity. He knows that the proposal is completely arbitrary. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) was absolutely right to argue that we have ended up with crude, universal and arbitrary capping. Whatever the reserve powers on capping were intended to address, it was not these circumstances.

The Minister would be wise to bear it in mind that he had to amend his initial proposal because it was clearly arbitrary and unreasonable, which was how I described it to him in my correspondence. However, he continues to propose something that is arbitrary and unreasonable. At the very least he should just say that South Cambridgeshire should not be required to reduce its budget below last year's figure of £13.75 million. That budget was not excessive then. It is not unreasonable to request that the council does not increase its budget year on year, but the Minister's demand that the budget should go down by 13 per cent. is arbitrary, unreasonable and unacceptable.

3.8 pm

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): I shall put what I want to say in a little context. If my local authority, North Dorset district council, had been permitted to make its proposed council tax increase, it would have moved from being the local authority with the seventh lowest council tax in Britain to that with the 12th lowest.

Before the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) leaves the Chamber, let me say that I am grateful to her for the fact that her robust and measured speech contrasted with the response of her predecessor, the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey), to the original announcement on 23 March, which the hon. Gentleman used as an opportunity to take pot shots at Conservative local authorities' spending. He singled out my local authority, North Dorset—I think that he was briefed by the future Mrs. Davey, who unsuccessfully tried to unseat me for the second time on 5 May. I am delighted that the leader of the Liberal Democrat group on North Dorset district council, who also sits on Dorset county council, has tabled a motion, which Dorset county council will debate tomorrow, in his name and those of his Liberal Democrat colleagues:

"This Council condemns the capping of eight low-spending rural District Councils, all of which have existing levels of Council Tax at below the national average . . . In particular this Council condemns the capping of North Dorset District Council"— which is, of course, Conservative controlled—

"whose tax level is currently £98 p.a (Band D), the twelfth lowest in the country, and notes that the budget set by the Council currently provides the minimum revenue funding required to achieve the Government's own statutory targets, particularly in the areas of Waste Management and E-Government, and notes that the Government itself provides no revenue to meet these targets."

On 23 March, the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) invited hon. Members and local authorities to make representations to him, and all local authorities did so. If that was micro-management by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, and if the ODPM thinks it knows how local authorities should manage their budgets, then the encounter was disappointing—I note that the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Jim Fitzpatrick), who met us on that day, is now a Front Bencher.

At that meeting, we did not discuss what the Government feel North Dorset district council should do, which was unusual. When I asked the Leader of the House about that approach at business questions, he also found it most unusual:

"I am confident that detailed information will have been made available to the local authorities on the list, and there will be a number of opportunities for the hon. Gentleman to raise his concerns about overspending by particular local authorities . . . I am sure that when the hon. Gentleman has meetings with Ministers on this question, they are willing to engage in discussions with him, but he should bear in mind the fact that there is a difference between having a discussion whose conclusions he agrees with and simply having a discussion. I am confident that he will have had a discussion with Ministers, although he may not have liked what they said to him."—[Official Report, 7 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 458.]

I did not like what Ministers said, because they did not say anything. We made our presentation, for which we were politely thanked, but no discussion took place.

If the Government really believe that they know how North Dorset district council should raise and spend money, they should explain where it is going wrong. We must ask why a small local authority such as North Dorset has attracted special consideration. As I have said, band D council tax is £98, and although the percentage increase in council tax was large, it amounted to 36p a week. Even after the rise, the council tax was the 12th lowest in the country and the lowest in Dorset. As I have said, in neighbouring Weymouth and Portland, which is Labour controlled, band D council tax is £232.

For about 10 years, council tax has been kept low by the use of interest earned from capital, which was raised mainly from the sale of council houses. The Government want councils to use that capital to benefit their areas. As the capital programme is implemented, investment interest will fall because the investments themselves will fall. Furthermore, we live in a low interest rate environment. In essence, council tax has been subsidised for about 10 years, but it will be impossible to subsidise it in four or five years' time. North Dorset district council has publicised that point at roadshows, in newspapers and during consultations, and council tax payers have indicated that they would support rises in tax in order to maintain or improve council services. The council intends to raise tax levels smoothly over five years to reach a budget that no longer relies on interest from reserve capital.

North Dorset is not an overspending council—it spends less than its formula spending share. It is not profligate—its spending is average among its Audit Commission family of councils. It has given proper protection to taxpayers, who have benefited from a lower council tax because the council has been supported by interest earned from reserves for the past 10 years. It plans to increase tax gradually over five years to offset the reductions in its reserves, and it is also making substantial efficiency savings, which is reasonable and responsible. It is investing its capital in affordable housing, which is one of the greatest needs in the area. Its proposed tax rate would still be the 12th lowest in the country. At the end of its five-year plan, taxpayers would benefit from a rate close to the national average.

The Government's action will return about 12p a week to the taxpayer. The cost of rebilling is equivalent to nearly £6 on the council tax bill, which is not value for money, and the Government would give a fail judgment to any council that proposed such action. North Dorset is a low-tax council. Since the Government published their guidance last year, it has been penalised for having a low council tax over the past 10 years. Councils that start from a higher tax base have increased council tax by more in real terms than North Dorset district council.

Where is the natural justice in capping North Dorset district council? The Government's accusation of overspending is meaningless. If the council keeps to a 5 per cent. rise over the next five years, it will have to reduce its size by 25 per cent., which strikes at its very viability. It has slightly more than 200 staff to deliver more than 30 major services, the same number of services as is provided by much larger councils. It must be allowed to manage its own affairs, and my constituents, who pay the council tax, support it. It is being capped for increasing tax by the cost of one cigarette a week. How much public money has been spent on taking that action?

DEFERRED DIVISION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I now have to announce the result of a Division deferred from a previous day.

On the motion "Access to Justice", the Ayes were 224 and the Noes 184, so the motion was agreed to.

[The Division List is published at the end of today's debates.]

Council Tax

Question again proposed.

3.18 pm

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): It has been a pleasure to participate in this stupendous debate. The Minister for Local Government made his case, not like Captain Ahab, but like Horatio holding the bridge with a bent rapier. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) made a consistent case on rate capping, and, although I do not necessarily agree with him, it would help him and us if he were to join us in the Lobby tonight. The hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) made such a good speech that my wife paged me to say how impressed she was, although my wife agrees with me that she should send a copy of it to Councillor Neil Cliff, the Liberal Democrat leader on Mid Bedfordshire district council.

Since then, a succession of living legends have systematically taken apart the Minister's case. There is no case.

This has been a heady few weeks for the Government. First, confronting the dangers of global injustice, the Prime Minister took on the G8. Then, to put the European Union, which was going dangerously off-track, back on the rails, he took on the EU at the summit. Then, to prevent the danger of the Olympic games going to Paris, he took on the collective might of the International Olympic Committee, stepping in at the last moment. Yes, in the past few weeks, the Government have confronted the real dangers in modern life.

Now we come to the apex: to confront the dangers posed to democracy and economic stability by Mid-Beds district council, the Government are proposing the order before us. I feel that, in the manner of a Soviet show trial, I shall have to stand here and admit the crimes of Mid-Beds district council, for which it has been punished by the Minister and the Government. I do so, of course, in shame and degradation.

Led by Councillor Mrs. Tricia Turner, 53 local councillors attend to their work, working locally and diligently for local people. That is their first crime. Last year, the council had the audacity to offer the 10th lowest tax charged by any district council in England. Even after this year's increase, its local council tax would be the 16th lowest. It has also—this is a real horror to confess to the House—returned general fund balances to the council tax payer over the past two years. It has, I am ashamed to admit, identified £2.4 million in savings over the last three years, and a further £800,000 for next year, while making local decisions about the services required to respond to the needs of local citizens. I have to tell the Minister that there is a fifth column operating in his regional office, because the regional office of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister also thinks that Mid-Beds is a good council.

Now we come to the crime passionel. In setting a budget for this year, Mid-Beds recognised that returning reserves to its citizens and trying to provide services worth £120 for £102 last year necessitated a rise this year, so as to head towards a balanced budget. The crime that I have to report to the House is that Mid-Beds had to propose a £1 per month increase in local tax.

[Alistair Burt]

I understand how this must appear to officials and to the Treasury. Memos must have been winging their way across Whitehall stamped with the Churchillian mark, "Action this day", to prevent such a crime from being committed. Of course, I dissemble to a degree, because I have given only the actual figure. If I give the percentage, it is, of course, as the Minister said, about 13 per cent.—but in real life, that means about £1 a month.

What is it that really requires the Government to intervene? Is it Mid-Beds' desire to run local services locally and efficiently, and to take the inflation-busting decision to charge an extra £1 a week? And what is the impact? At first glance, the Government will require the council to reduce its budget by £341,000 to about £11,193,000, which would reduce band D council tax from the original £102 to £94.57—a saving to the taxpayer of £7.61 per annum, or 15p a week. Worked out on an individual basis for all the residents in Mid-Beds, it means 3.7p a week being saved.

However, the real effect will be greater. Councillor Max McMurdo sent me an e-mail yesterday. Max is an independent councillor representing Sandy. Indeed, he is a living legend in Sandy. If Max decided to stand for Parliament, I would have serious difficulties; he is a great man. His e-mail says:

"Having been a councillor for six years, I have voted for the 'Lean and Mean' approach that we have adopted, trickling reserves into the budget and looking for corporate savings wherever possible, to keep our Council Tax as low as possible. Last year we delivered our full range of services costing £120 at a Band D tax charge of only £102. We have now almost reduced our reserves to the prudent minimum and have been planning the future, to get back to a balanced budget, without the use of subsidy from reserves, by 2007. That is the very essence of prudent financial planning and is surely at the heart of good local government.

It does mean, of course, that as we remove the subsidy each year the percentage increase is above inflation. Indeed it is inflation plus the amount of the withdrawn subsidy and this year our proposed increase was to be 13.3%, but this would still have left us with the 16th lowest District Council tax charge in England.

To impose a cap, any cap, in percentage terms is a nonsense. Surely one must look at the actual tax charge to be levied. A percentage restriction can only be an attack on those Councils that have a low starting point, which surely points to the authority having a tight fiscal policy. If the explanation(s) for an increase above the Central Government target are sound, then, I suggest, good central government should gracefully accept them and approve the local decision.

Surely the Government's goal is to control profligate councils?! Or am I being politically naive?"

Well, Max, I think that, sadly, you probably are—because your arguments are absolutely right and fundamentally sound, and if the Government had the good grace they would listen, and do something about them.

The leader of the council and the chief executive have written a memo reminding local ratepayers that "More and more responsibilities have been placed on Mid-Beds by the Government, with insufficient funding to support them. The Government grant to us this year did not even meet our inflation costs of over £1 million. This enforced capping will lead to very considerable cuts."

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that the inspection and audit fees faced by local councils such as his have doubled since 1998? Is it not cruelly ironic that those fees imposed on councils are not subject to the capping about which he rightly complains?

Alistair Burt: My hon. Friend makes a very fair point. I have described in the House in the past the ludicrous situation whereby the Government impose all sorts of different charges on local ratepayers, as well as councils, yet no blame or control seems to be attached to them. For example, multiple sclerosis therapy centres face an increase of 300 per cent. in the charges for inspection until 2008, imposed by the Government, who tell the Healthcare Commission that such inspections have to be fully funded by the centres. So there is no capping for the 300 per cent. increase for people who collect voluntarily for multiple sclerosis sufferers, whereas when there is an increase of 3.7p a week for individual residents of Mid-Beds, the Government step in to cap. I do not think that my hon. Friend or I, or Patricia Turner or Max McMurdo, can explain that.

This is not what capping was designed to do—and here we come to the essence of the argument about capping. As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have been around for a long time—which is the basis of my leadership bid. I was there in the 1980s when capping was first introduced; I was Parliamentary Private Secretary to Ken Baker in the Department of the Environment. We faced challenges from the Greater London council led by Ken Livingstone and Liverpool city council with Derek Hatton, when there was a clear aim on the part of local government to use its power and strength to challenge the elected Government of the day. Derek Hatton firmly believed that if the Government were induced to send in commissioners, the people of Liverpool would go out on the streets and rise up. That was part of the plan.

I knew both Ken Livingstone and Liverpool city council. Councillor Mrs. Turner is no Ken Livingstone—and Mid-Beds district council is no Liverpool city council of the 1980s.

The cap is misused, out of proportion and demeaning to both central and local government. There is still time for the Minister to exercise his evident good sense, as well as good humour, and rip up his brief, turn to his officials and say, "I can't do this; I won't do this. Local democracy and justice must override what the Government are telling me to do."

3.28 pm

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): I have had three years as an Opposition spokesman on local government affairs, giving me plenty of opportunity to look at issues in their broader context alongside my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles). Today, I can indulge myself in looking at this motion simply from the point of view of Runnymede borough council, my local council.

This capping exercise defies common sense and smacks of political opportunism. Runnymede borough council is being capped in 2005-06 for imposing exactly the same percentage council tax increase as it imposed in 2004–05. Nobody looking objectively at how it runs its affairs could conclude other than that it is a well run, prudent council that sensibly responds to the Government's decisions about changes in grant distribution.

The truth is that, having set out policies for changing the distribution of local authority grants, the Government are now recoiling from the consequences of those policies in action. I shall set out some of the background to Runnymede's situation. Runnymede is historically a low-taxing authority. It is the lowest-taxing authority in Surrey and the eighth lowest in the country. At £117 this year, its band D council tax is 31 per cent. below the average for district councils.

This year's increase, which the Government found so offensive, amounted to 34p a week. Overall, including the county and police precepts, Runnymede council tax payers faced a total increase of 4.93 per cent. in their council tax bills. Like colleagues, I have had virtually no complaints—a handful—from taxpayers about the increases. The Minister has received letters from the leaders of the Labour group and the Independent group on the council urging him not to cap Runnymede. I am pleased to say that there is no Liberal Democrat group.

Runnymede council is an excellent authority, rated "excellent" in its financial management. It was credited with having "credible strategies to meet future challenges".

Its strategy now lies in tatters.

Runnymede is also a popular council: in 2001 and in 2004, it was in the top 10 of all councils in England in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's residents general satisfaction survey. Part of the reason for that level of satisfaction is the non-statutory services that the council operates—day centres for the elderly, the yellow school bus transport scheme that contributes to a reduction in congestion, the community safety closed circuit television scheme, and an extensive programme of voluntary sector grants. Those are precisely the non-statutory services that will face the brunt of the cuts that the Minister is, in effect, imposing.

In 2002, the then Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), announced a change in the way the grant system would operate. I remember going with other Members to a seminar that he held in Portcullis House, and he was quite open about what he was doing. He was redistributing local authority grant as delivered to councils, and he fully expected that some councils would have to raise their council tax in consequence. That accelerated an existing trend for Runnymede that had seen its formula grant drop 29 per cent. in real terms between 1995–96 and 2005–06. In per capita terms, Runnymede has had only a 0.4 per cent. money increase in formula grant since 1998–99. The Minister, of course, prefers to talk about individual years or the last three years, but what Runnymede and other prudent and sensible councils are doing is responding to a long-term trend of change in the way in which grant is distributed. After adjustment for changes in the benefit system, the real terms reduction from the 1995–96 figure in Runnymede's grant this year represents £2.18 million, and that is on a budget base of £8.5 million.

The council faces considerable cost pressures, as all councils do. As a council in transition to lower grant, it does not receive any effective grant recognition for the costs imposed by new legislation, particularly the cost of responding to waste recycling and environmental initiatives.

Despite reservations about what the Government were doing to the grant system, Runnymede reacted as a prudent, well managed council would. It responded rationally, as the Government intended, and set out a clear plan to increase, over five years, its council tax levels to something closer to the average. Our—overwhelmingly Conservative—councillors were willing to knuckle down and put into practice the agenda that the Government had dictated to councils that had had grant distributed from them: it increased the council tax. The problem that Runnymede now has is that the Government lost their nerve when they saw the inevitable results of their own policy.

Runnymede's strategy was to reduce revenue budgets by around £2 million over a period, to reduce its working balances to the minimum prudent level during the transitional phase, and to increase taxes to a level that would still be well below the district council average. Those were sensible, rational, medium-term responses to the changed environment in which it found itself. The ODPM was aware of that medium-term strategy, and Runnymede council believed that it had accepted it. Runnymede was not capped last year because the Government recognised explicitly—we have already heard the words of the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich—the position in which low-taxing authorities found themselves and the absurdity of applying a percentage limit to a very low-taxing authority. Unfortunately, the Government have applied no such absolute criterion this year, so low-taxing authorities are caught by the same percentage criteria that would be applied to higher-taxing authorities.

What is the point of extolling the virtues of medium-term financial planning by local authorities if the Government are going to move radically the goalposts from year to year so that a council with a medium-term strategy finds that it meets the ODPM's approval one year but falls outside the criteria that it has set down the following year? The Government are in an absurd position. They set out a policy of shifting grant away from certain types of local authorities in certain areas, which logically requires higher taxes. Now, they will not allow councils to increase their taxes to fill the void left by the shifting of grants, but there is no sign of their being prepared to change the grant formula back to return to councils such as Runnymede any of the grant support that they have lost.

The Minister and his colleagues know that major service cuts are inevitable, yet they refuse point blank to explain how a local authority in Runnymede's position should respond to the situation in which it finds itself. This is bad government imposed for cynical pre-election political reasons. As a result, for a saving of just £7.23 a year—14p a week after rebilling costs—people in Runnymede face service cuts totalling about £800,000 over the next couple of years. That will fall on the elderly who use day centres, communities who rely on CCTV security provision, and voluntary organisations that depend on the council's grant support programme. I am pleased to say that tomorrow

[Mr. Philip Hammond]

Runnymede's Conservative councillors will each make a donation equivalent to their own personal savings as a result of the capping exercise to start a fund to make up the loss of grant for those local voluntary organisations. We hope that that will establish a local trend.

This is a bad day for local government and for central Government, but I assure the Minister that it will also turn out to be a bad day politically for the Labour party, because nobody in Runnymede supports these cuts and the Government will reap the cost of what they have sown today.

3.38 pm

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): I concur with much of what my right hon. and hon. Friends have said this afternoon.

The Government's decision to cap the council tax of Huntingdonshire district council is nothing less than a travesty of what local government should be about. This debate has illustrated the senseless inability of this Labour Government to differentiate effective and inefficient or high-spending and low-spending councils, or even to understand the basic motivators of effective local government.

Let me make it clear at the outset that no one says that Huntingdonshire district council is anything but well run. Indeed, it is one of the few councils in the east of England that the Government rate as excellent. It represents the sort of premier league council that the Government said only recently should be awarded greater freedoms—words that now resemble some hollow joke. Rather than awarding more freedom, the Government are taking a sledgehammer to the council's carefully set plans and thereby undermining the concept of local democracy.

Huntingdonshire should be congratulated rather than capped. It has delivered the Government's agenda for recycling targets, e-government, providing better local transport and regeneration. It has excelled in all those. Even with the increase in tax, the band D rate of £106.54 is the 19th lowest of the 238 districts—in the bottom 8 per cent. in the country.

Earlier, the Minister said that the order was intended to prevent unreasonable increases. What is unreasonable? That has still not been explained to me today. It is bizarre to penalise the council simply because it has a higher percentage increase on a low historical base, when high-taxing, inefficient councils, which have increased council tax by more than Huntingdonshire district council, are ignored.

Huntingdonshire's budget is set to increase by only 3.2 per cent. next year. That is well within the Government's target. However, because it has reduced the subsidy from its reserves this year when compared with last year, the increase in "budget requirement" becomes a figure that is caught by the capping regime. Capping therefore effectively forces the council to maintain a high council tax subsidy. That is simply not sustainable in practice and not honest to my constituents. The Government are forcing my local council to indulge in Mickey Mouse accounting.

I shall explain my deeper fears for Huntingdonshire, its local government and the district's future development in one of the fastest growing populations and business environments in the country. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara), who cannot be here this afternoon, shares not only the district with me but my concerns that the Government are forcing us to build thousands more houses while not only withholding grant but capping a modest council tax increase. So much for joined-up thinking in government.

Huntingdonshire has a low council tax, which reflects the council's careful and efficient management of resources and the significant amounts that are earned by investing its reserves following the transfer of its housing stock in 2000. The council is slowly spending those reserves on service improvements and they will reduce to a minimum in approximately 2011. As the council spends its reserves, its interest income reduces. Despite efficiency savings, which have happened, most of the balance will need to be made up by an increase in the council tax.

With that in mind, the council sensibly decided to make the increase gradual—£12 a year—starting in 2004–05 and continuing for five years. There was none of the stick-your-finger-in-the-air stuff on a yearly basis that happens with poor or deceitful councils. Huntingdonshire district council looked five years ahead and honestly told its residents what it needed to do to continue to provide a decent local service.

That was a good example of efficient budgeting by officers and effective political leadership by the majority party councillors. They consulted widely and the majority party took the plan to the electorate in the all-up elections and received a thumping majority—and therefore an endorsement for their spending policies. Last year, the council was not capped, despite a similar increase in tax.

The Minister is effectively telling me that he does not give two hoots for what my local council has done or planned, for what the local residents—my constituents—think or even for what the Government thought last year. He is sticking to a bizarre formula and ignoring reason. He shows contempt for local democracy.

What is the effect of all that on Huntingdonshire? It means an average decrease of £6.82 a year—about 13p a week—for band D ratepayers. The cost of rebilling them is £60,000 of wasted taxpayers' money. I ask the Minister whether at least the rebilling can be postponed until next year to save that huge waste of money on administration costs. However, my main concern is that, unless the Government accept the poverty of their own argument, this problem will simply arise again in the future.

In Huntingdonshire, this measure will ultimately result in service cuts of up to £5.6 million a year by 2011–12, which represents 22 per cent. of the council's planned net spending and a similar proportion of its staffing budget. And all this is happening at a time when the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is still withholding £750,000 a year of grant, which, by its own calculations, the council is due. It seems ridiculous to cap its council tax on top of that.

I have expressed my concerns today, and I sincerely believe that the Government have got this very badly wrong. Capping is a blunt and wholly inappropriate measure for Huntingdonshire. I hope that the Minister will withdraw the order, but of course it is likely to be passed. In which case, I ask the Government to review their position, to ensure that this unfair and irrational situation is not repeated next year.

3.45 pm

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): After this debate, the Government should go away and ask themselves what the purpose of capping is. We heard very little from the Minister about the point of this exercise. The hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) said that the original point of capping was to ensure that local government could not challenge national economic policy. However, we are dealing here with £4 million out of a total local government expenditure of £80 billion, and national Government spending of five or six times that. The amounts that we are talking about are trivial.

The hon. Gentleman was quite amusing about how trivial and pathetic this situation was, but it is more serious than that. Here we are in a place that used to legislate for half the world. Now it is reduced to telling Aylesbury Vale council what it can do with 4p per resident per week. How the mighty have fallen! The only reason that the Minister gave for capping these councils was that it was to protect council tax payers, but again we are talking about tiny amounts. Even in South Cambridgeshire—where the sum involved amounts to almost half the figure that we are talking about today—the cap will benefit local council tax payers by less than £1 a week. How an expensive re-billing exercise will protect local council tax payers is entirely beyond me.

As many hon. Members have said, this is really about simple contempt for local democracy. If council tax payers in the areas concerned believe that these increases are beyond the pale—or "excessive", in the words of the Minister—they will take the obvious route and vote out the councillors who brought in those levels of council tax. Given the amounts that we are talking about, it seems unlikely that that would happen, but that is their prerogative. The Minister said that members of the public had made their views known. I want to know how many of those members of the public there were, and how many of them voted in the most recent local government elections. One of the effects of capping seems to be to disempower local government, to give local voters less reason to vote, and to allow national Government to take over even the most trivial local decisions.

I expected the Minister to say that one of the points of capping was to advance national policy in some way. However, we look in vain to discover which aspects of national policy would be advanced by this exercise. As hon. Members have said, three of the councils involved have been rated "excellent" in their comprehensive performance assessment rating. So how does capping those councils further the Government's policy to improve the local delivery of services?

The measure is even undermining important national policies. In South Cambridgeshire, for example, an important growth area, cuts will be made in planning, community policing and in other new, important Government initiatives. Why is that? One reason, which the Government do not seem to understand, is that if a council leader is faced with having to reduce his budget, the one thing he cannot do is cut existing programmes, as that involves making people redundant and adds to the cost because savings cannot come from redundancies. He must therefore remove from the budget all the new programmes, a vast number of which have come from national initiatives. The Government are therefore undermining their own policies by capping such councils.

Mr. Lansley: A further unhappy consequence is that one is forced by this logic also to restrict grants to voluntary sector bodies and partnership organisations. Sometimes, therefore, the consequentials lie outside the budget of the local authority, but the damage in the community is if anything enhanced.

David Howarth: That is absolutely right, and many councils will be forced, because of the logic of the situation and the short time frame, to reduce expenditure by cutting grants to voluntary bodies. Certainly, that is the unfortunate position in South Cambridgeshire.

The other aspect of national policy to which one might have expected a reference was the overall level of taxation. As the Minister said, however, the Government have succeeded in keeping the council tax rise across the country down to 4.1 per cent. As that goal seems to have been achieved, I cannot see the point of this exercise. He says that all local authorities have been in receipt of grant increases higher than RPI—I expected him to make that point. RPI is no measure of local government costs, however, especially for district councils, which have small budgets subject to wide variation. Most of their budgets are staff costs, and councils must compete with the private sector for professional staff. One cannot expect them to hold down salaries in a competitive situation in which if they did so they would lose their planners, lawyers and accountants.

Another aspect of the problem that Ministers do not seem to have taken into account—which brings me back to the point raised by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley)—is that district councils often have to work together to provide services. South Cambridgeshire district council, for example, works with Cambridge city council in relation to many of the voluntary bodies that it funds. One of the effects of the cap on South Cambridgeshire is to hit residents of neighbouring authorities—the citizens advice bureau in Cambridge will find itself £66,000 short, employment development grants will be £47,000 short, and there will be cuts in grants to homelessness organisations, the arts and community groups. All those groups are jointly funded by South Cambridgeshire district council and Cambridge city council. The pain that the Minister seems to intend for one council will therefore fall on the residents of a large number of councils.

I must admit that for several years I had the dubious pleasure of being leader of Cambridge city council, South Cambridgeshire's neighbour. In many ways, South Cambridgeshire was an infuriating neighbour. It followed a financial strategy that I would never have followed. I thought that it could have used its reserves in a more constructive way. But that was the way it chose to use its reserves, and it should be judged at the ballot box, not by the Minister.

[David Howarth]

If national policy goals are not the reason for the Government's policy, what is? There might be one last reason: pour encourager les autres—to pick on a few small councils, and to bully them as a warning to others. The sheer arbitrariness of what is happeping is an advantage from that point of view. When the Minister was trying to explain why the criteria had changed, and why councils that are capped this year would not have been capped last year, or are having their budgets reduced from last year's levels, he referred to councils being allowed to second-guess. In other words, they would know what the rules were, and the Minister cannot allow councils to know what the rules are. That is extraordinary, and, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) pointed out, it is an abuse of power. It is a refusal to treat local authorities as rational beings, rather than as objects of manipulation. There is no chance of a stable constitutional settlement between central and local government on the basis of such manipulation. It is the ultimate in centralisation.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister seems to be treating councils as unruly circus animals that must be induced to perform tricks. It is disgusting to watch, and should not be the basis of a mature democracy. The House should reject this contemptible order, and look to a democratic system of local government and a fair system of local government finance to restore the proper balance between local and national Government.

3.55 pm

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): About 20 per cent. of my constituents live in the Daventry district council area, and they are extremely concerned about the order. I also speak on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), who unfortunately cannot be with us but who has written to the Minister expressing his concern, and has met him recently.

Within the Daventry district part of the Kettering constituency lies the battlefield of Naseby, where in 1645 the forces of Parliament overcame an over-mighty Executive. I invite the Minister to travel up to Naseby for a re-enactment of the battle. I am sure that members of the district council would be willing to take him on with me, and teach the Executive a lesson 460 years later.

The order is particularly absurd in the case of Daventry district council. The Government wish to limit the council's budget to £7.8 million, and to reduce the band D requirement from £109.62 to £102.41, which would save £200,000. That is the equivalent of 14p a week, or £7.20 a year. For 14p I could not even buy half a copy of the Daventry Express, the local weekly, or half a copy of the daily Chronicle and Echo, which local residents read.

As other speakers have said, Daventry district council would not have been caught out under past capping regimes. It spends £412,000 less than the formula spending share guidelines, and is well into the bottom half of the league table of total council tax bills. One of the effects of the order is to disrupt the long-term financial planning that the Government require of local authorities. They require authorities' medium-term financial strategies with projections of at least four years.

The Daventry Express quotes council leader Chris Millar, one of the most exceptional council leaders in the country:

"It's scandalous that the Government is able to undermine our ability to develop and implement robust services and long-term financial planning . . . the Government is effectively dictating future local service cuts which is an affront to local democracy."

In short, the Government want to micro-manage some of the very best local authorities in the country, which means that there will indeed be a severe impact on local services. Council leader Chris Millar also said:

"There will be a long-term negative impact on services."

That will be a direct result of the Government's action.

As was pointed out earlier, there has been no regulatory impact assessment, and the Government have admitted that they cannot make assumptions about which local services and activities may be affected. So they are prepared to cap authorities' revenue budgets, but they shrug their shoulders when it comes to the damaging effect on the services provided to local people. Although this is obviously a party political attack on Conservative-controlled local authorities, so far as Daventry district council is concerned, there has been cross-party condemnation of the Government's actions.

Two issues perhaps affect Daventry rather more than some other authorities mentioned, the first being negative housing subsidy and the associated transitional recovery scheme, which the Government have approved. I submitted a written parliamentary question to the Minister, to which he was good enough to respond, saying that the order does not affect the authority's entitlement to benefit from the transitional measures under this scheme. That is certainly not the local authority's understanding, and I should welcome the Minister's confirming whether the negative housing subsidy and the transitional recovery arrangements have indeed been fully taken into account in applying this order.

Daventry district council wanted to increase its council tax by 13.6 per cent., which is an increase in cash terms of £13.12 a year. Some £10 of that—10.4 per cent.—is in accordance with the transitional recovery arrangements that apply to the negative housing subsidy. These arrangements have been approved by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, and yet, because the authority has now been capped, it will no longer be able to recover the amount it was previously promised. The council says that, to judge by the full implications of this order, by 2009–10 it could well have a cumulative deficit of £1.9 million, which will place it in an extremely perilous position. Councillor Christopher Millar says:

"The time has come to say enough is enough. If the Government are serious about devolving powers and responsibilities to local communities as part of their"

supposed

"localism agenda, then they need to stop playing 'silly politics' such as happened in this instance".

by which he means this order. Our spending so much time debating these ridiculous orders and micro-managing well-run local authorities does not enhance the image of the Government or of local government.

The most absurd aspect of this order is the Government's forcing Daventry district council to re-bill local residents. The Government want to save £198,000, but the cost of rebilling will be £100,000, so half the benefit will be lost. It might well go to the Post Office through the extra postage spent; however, there will be no benefit to local residents. When the Minister winds up, I hope that he will explain why, if local authorities such as Daventry district council are to be penalised by this order, arrangements cannot be made for the saving in grant to be carried forward to the next year to avoid the cost of rebilling, instead of imposing this additional requirement.

4.3 pm

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am new to this House. I have been told that the new Minister, who is currently leaning backwards over the Front Bench, is a good guy, that he will be all right and that he can be relied on. [Interruption.] If he will be kind enough to listen, I should like to point out that I am really sorry that his predecessor left him in this mess. It seems that this good guy—this "all right" guy—has little appetite for this measure. However, he will be able to improve and to deal with more important matters as time goes by. Sadly, the members of Daventry district council will be left with the residue of what is for them a quite disastrous measure, which will impact on council services for many years to come. I hope that when the Minister thinks of these matters in the future, he will take that into account.

Let us see what the Minister's predecessor actually did. On 23 March this year, just 43 days before the general election, the then Minister for Local and Regional Government made a statement to the House on council tax for the year 2005–06. He outlined the actions that the Government proposed to take in response to the authorities that had set what he described as "excessive budgets". The Minister thereafter named nine district councils—seven of which were Conservative controlled, with the Conservatives as the largest party in the remaining two—and gave them 21 days to tell him why they should not be capped. He added that he would "carefully consider the information . . . along with other representations they make".

He subsequently said:

"We shall welcome representations as well as information . . . and we shall take that into account when we make our final decision."—[Official Report, 23 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 884–86.]

The then Minister for Local and Regional Government repeated that promise on three further occasions, during a speech that lasted, if we exclude the interjections, just 26 minutes. In other words, he made the promise virtually every five minutes. One might think that that was a pretty meaningful commitment, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Consequently, the question that comes to mind is whether the Government who made that promise have kept that promise.

Let us consider the evidence for just one council—Daventry district council, which is part of the county council that I happen to be proud to serve. If the promise was not kept for one council, it was simply not kept. Daventry district council responded as requested and made a case rather similar to that made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) earlier today.

First, Daventry's council tax level remained in the lowest 30 per cent. of all districts and boroughs in England, equating to a band D council tax of almost 20 per cent. less than that of nearby Corby, which, as the Minister well knows, is a Labour-controlled council. Secondly, the annual increase for Daventry residents amounted to just £13.12, or 25p a week. How the Minister must be delighted to be in charge of an order that deals with such important matters! Thirdly, the band D council tax level was £15.28 per annum below what the Government assumed that it should be and the total budget was £854,000 below the Government's estimation of what it should have been. Fourthly, the average increase of the aggregate council bill for the residents of Daventry district council area totalled just 4.3 per cent.—well within the Government's proclaimed and stated objective of "an average increase" of less than 5 per cent.

Many would think that that is an enviable record and I hope that the Minister thinks that it is. The real clincher, however, relates to the Government's own decision to take housing grant subsidy away from the council. Indeed, £10 of the average annual increase of £13.12 was levied to compensate for the Government's decision, leaving just £3.12 per annum, or a 3.2 per cent. increase for all other council expenditures. Again, that is well in line with the Government's requirements and I suggest that most fair-minded people would think that that was a very creditable performance.

Most fair people would think that the council's specific status as a former negative housing subsidy authority should be well understood by the Government. Most would think that a council that consistently utilised the Government's negative subsidy transitional measures introduced in April 2001, which allowed for a phased and planned increase in council tax income to 2008–09 to compensate for the stepped loss in negative subsidy funding, would be fully understandable to the Government. They would think that the Government would listen to Daventry and understand its situation. They would expect the Government to act fairly in those circumstances and take Daventry off the capping list. Sadly, the Government did not do that.

Did the Government keep their promise to consider the information carefully and take all the factors into account? The evidence suggests that they did not. Based on the figures that I have given, Daventry's council tax levy would be welcomed by more than 70 per cent. of the people of this country. Its record as a financially well controlled council is among the best.

So why did the Government go ahead with their decision to cap once the full facts were made known? Daventry does not present a case for capping on any reasonable criteria. The only motive was the Government's wish to create political scapegoats—and preferably Conservative ones—before the general election, in an attempt to show that they were tough on council tax increases, and tough on the causes of council tax increases. The Government are going ahead with this order because not to do so would give away their political game, and that would not spin very easily.

The truth is well documented, not least by the all-party local government association. It has stated that council taxes have risen almost solely because of the Government's actions, and especially those actions related to the continual shortfall in local government funding. That is the true cause of council tax increases, but the Government could not face up to that truth before a general election and had to find others to blame. They picked on local government, and Conservative-controlled local government at that.

The Government continually say that they want to give local government greater freedoms, but they persist in capping for their own political ends. That is unacceptable. Capping, at best, is a crude Government instrument. However, used in the way the Government have used it, it becomes a weapon of the bully and a device of the political charlatan. That does not make for good government—in fact, the reverse is true.

I am proud to be a local county councillor, and I know how hard my colleagues work to provide good services for their citizens. Sadly, this measure demeans both them and their work. It demeans local government by trying to create the impression that it is inefficient and wasteful, and that it does not care about value for money. None of that is true. How does the Minister hope to encourage good local government when he treats some of the best local councils in such a disgraceful way?

This is a mean and nasty little measure. It demeans local government and this House. It demeans the Government in particular and, I am sad to say, this Minister. That is why I shall vote against it.

4.13 pm

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) and I share the same district council, Mid Bedfordshire, and he has already done an excellent job in fighting our corner. The House can imagine how I feel, as a new Member of Parliament, attempting to follow the experienced and knowledgeable defence that he presented.

It is important to highlight the excellent value that Conservative-controlled Mid Bedfordshire council provides for its council tax payers. It is efficient, well run, locally responsive and successful. It is a low-spending authority, with band D council tax bills well below the national average—they are the 16th lowest in the country, and, the lowest in Bedfordshire. Government inspectors who visited the council praised it for its robust financial planning and awarded it three marks out of four for financial prudence, but it appears that this Government choose to ignore their own inspectors when it is a matter of political convenience. Let me explain what I mean by "political convenience": there is not one Labour councillor on Mid Bedfordshire district council. That does not mean that the council has done anything other than attempt at all times to work with the Government and all their many impositions and directives, despite the fact that they have unnecessarily burdened the council both financially and in terms of morale.

The council, its political leadership and officers have always been committed to delivering genuine efficiency savings. For example, over the past three years, as my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire has said, the council has made savings worth approximately £2.4 million, ahead of the saving requirements expected by Gershon. The council has also identified further savings of £809,000 to be achieved in 2005, with additional targets included for future years. It is always sensitive to Government concerns. Only this year, it has used almost £500,000 of balances to cushion the increase in council tax.

Despite all that hard work and officially endorsed excellent management, Mid Bedfordshire council finds itself being treated like a reckless and irresponsible local authority. People might think that professional, well run Mid Bedfordshire council, commended by Government inspectors for its financial management, was the equivalent of the Labour-run Liverpool city council in the 1980s. The council is and always has been committed to securing value for money for local taxpayers and is actively delivering high-value and well-received services.

It is not just in prudent financial management that Mid Bedfordshire has proven its worth. There are many other areas where it is improving the quality of life for local people. It has taken environmental issues head on. For example, consistent with Government targets, its waste collection service has increased recycling from just 6 to 32 per cent. in just 18 months. How efficient is that? It has thereby reduced the amount of residual waste ending up as landfill. It is indeed an efficient council.

This is a practical statement of an efficient council, working in partnership with local residents to improve the environment and delivering on central Government targets. The council has worked hand in hand with the Government and has bent over backwards to satisfy the Government's whims and wishes in every way possible. As the Minister is aware, Mid Bedfordshire is recognised by the Government office for the east of England as a leading council. It has secured regional centre of excellence funding.

To cap a council that is recognised as a good one, that has set its council tax rate for band D at £102, that is in the bottom 10 per cent. of all taxing councils, that has the 16th lowest rate in the country and the lowest in the county, and whose real-terms increases equate to an increase of £1 a month or 23p a week per resident represents Government interference gone mad. It is an affront to democracy. It is demoralising and distressing to those who have been elected by the people to run the council and those who work for it. Why? Because of the capping injustice, the council must spend £85,000 to refund each resident just 14p a week. For that reason, I consider the Government's decision to cap Mid Bedfordshire district council wholly disproportionate, perverse and draconian. Whatever happened to common sense?

As a new Member of Parliament, I receive many letters and e-mails from constituents, as well as visits to my surgeries. To date, I have not received a single representation that expresses concern about having to pay an extra 23p a week. In fact, the Minister made a point of saying that he had a file brimful of letters. When we challenged him, he indicated that those letters were on the Bench. Can we see them? Can we see that file brimful of letters that you have had from people, complaining about this issue? Where are they from?

I should like to give Ministers the benefit of the doubt. I want to help you out. I do not think that you fully appreciate or recognise the context in which Mid Bedfordshire operates. We all know that you are a very busy Government—in fact, there are far fewer of you today, which is probably why. You have a tendency to become bogged down by statistics. You have probably seen the percentage increase and think that it is high. We can forgive you this, as you obviously do not understand the historically low base from which the increase is being made. How can you on the Government Benches expect council officers to work and give you their all when they are rewarded in such a humiliating way?

As my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire already stated, Tricia Turner, the council leader is no Derek Hatton. In fact, she and her councillors are the embodiment of professionalism and diligence. They are the foot soldiers of our society and the community. I beg you to reconsider, because your decision is far reaching and damaging.

Let me explain why the baseline is artificially low and why the Government have made a mistake—a big mistake. In recent years, Mid Bedfordshire district council, like other councils, has been reducing its revenue balances by returning money to the taxpayer; by doing that, reserves have been kept to a financially acceptable minimum of £2 million. As soon as balances have been used once, they cannot be used again, the outcome being that council tax has been kept artificially low, with the council's costs not reflected in the amount that they have taxed. The council has been moving its council tax closer to the actual costs of delivering the range of services it provides, with the aim of bringing council tax and spending commitments into line by 2007. That makes Mid Bedfordshire a model council.

Hon. Members will recall a speech made earlier this month by the Minister of Communities and Local Government to the Local Government Association conference in Harrogate. He said:

"It is not sensible for government to micro-manage".

Perhaps he can explain what terminology he would use to describe a council being instructed by central Government to incur £85,000 in costs to return 14p a week to residents. That, Minister, is micro-management, and someone in such a senior position should understand that. Sir Sandy Bruce-Lockhart, chairman of the LGA, has described the Government's capping proposals as "centralised stupidity". Now that is a man who knows his terminology. I imagine that hon. Members on both sides of the House are inclined to agree with him—or perhaps not, given that all the councils being capped are Conservative, despite the fact that Conservative councils in England cost less and deliver better public services, charging £74 a year less on band D properties.

I should also mention that the eight capped authorities received a mere 12 per cent. increase in funding this year, whereas Sedgefield—I wonder who the MP for that constituency is—received a staggering 68 per cent. increase. As the Minister of Communities and Local Government said to the LGA:

"The centralisation of power . . . is both a symptom and a cause of voter dissatisfaction."

If Mid Bedfordshire district council did not perform well, the voters would have voted it out. They did not.

Please pay heed to your own words—look a little closer at what you are doing—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I had hoped that the hon. Lady would steer out of using the form of address that she has been using. All remarks are made to the Chair, so that when she says "you" she is referring to the Chair, not to the Minister.

Mrs. Dorries: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that the Minister for Local Government will look a little closer at what the Government are doing. This pernicious measure will be regarded by many as politically cheap and unworthy—a sledgehammer to crack a nut. Ministers should do themselves a favour and rethink now, before it is too late.

Mr. Woolas: I thank hon. Gentlemen and hon. Ladies who have taken part in the debate and put the views, as they see them, of their constituents and local authorities in a generally constructive way, despite some of the language used. I am grateful that most of the insults—not all—have been directed against the collective "we" rather than the individual "I". I shall try to answer some of the detailed points as well as those on general policy.

A theme running through the debate has been the question of why the Government have chosen to concentrate on percentage increases in council tax rather than on real-terms cash increases. I have a couple of points to make in that context. If we had adopted a different policy—one that focused on cash increases—the debate would have been the opposite of today's. MPs from other parts of the country would have argued the inequity of such a policy as it affected their local council—perhaps a unitary council or a metropolitan borough council with a significant budget of more than a third of a billion pounds and council tax band D rates running at £800 or more a year.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) has made his arguments in correspondence and in meetings with me. To him I say that the Government made two points clear. The first was that council tax increases should not be excessive—5 per cent. was the benchmark. The second point—this crucial point has been missed in today's debate and in some representations—was that the council tax increase was only one criterion to which my predecessor referred. Another requirement was to set a budget that was not excessive, and a limit of 6 per cent. was given. We have been consistent in our application of those criteria.

Mr. Pickles: I am sorry to have tell the hon. Gentleman that it is not the case that the 5 per cent. limit was flagged up by the Government. There were some winks and nods to the specialist press, but his predecessor never mentioned 5 per cent.

Mr. Woolas: I take the point that the hon. Gentleman is making—"low single figures" was the phrase that was used. However, none of the councils that we are considering today was close to such figures, so his argument is a case of angels dancing on the head of a pin.

[Mr. Woolas]
